"7. Assuming the Act of 1903 to be unconstitutional, have the Protestants the right under the present state of the Quebec law to allow children professing the Jewish religion to attend the schools—

"(a) as a matter of grace;

"(b) as of right?

"(c) Can the Province force the Protestants to accept children professing the Jewish religion under such conditions?"

An Act passed by the Quebec Legislature on April 3, 1925 (15 Geo. V., c. 19), authorized an appeal as to the matters so submitted from the Court of King's Bench to the Supreme Court of Canada, and from that Court (subject to leave being obtained) to his Majesty in Council.

The Court of King's Bench (Appeal Side), subject to certain reservations and dissents, which it is not necessary to set out in detail, answered the above questions numbered 1, 2 (a), and 7 (a) and (b) in the affirmative, and the remaining questions in the negative; but on appeal by the present appellants (being two of the Jewish members of the Commission above referred to) to the Supreme Court of Canada, that Court (consisting of Chief Justice Anglin, and Mr. Justice Mignault, Mr. Justice Newcombe, Mr.

Justice Rinfret, and Mr. Justice McLean) agreed upon the following answers :—

"QUESTION NO. 1.—Answer. No, except in so far as it would confer the right of attendance at dissentient schools upon persons of a religious faith different from that of the dissentient minority.

"QUESTION NO. 2.—Answers. To part (a), No. To part (b), No.

"QUESTION NO. 3.—Answers. To part (a), No. To part (b). This Committee is the creature of post-union legislation, and, therefore, its personnel is subject to provincial legislative control ; but, as it is presently constituted, only Protestants are eligible for appointment to it. To part (c). This question can be answered only when the powers and duties of such advisory members shall have been defined.

"QUESTION NO. 4.—Answer. No.

"QUESTION NO. 5.—Answer. No.

"QUESTION NO. 6.—Answer. Yes. Such legislation would not necessarily interfere prejudicially with rights and privileges enjoyed either by Roman Catholics or Protestants as a class at the Union. Such interference, of course, could not be allowed.

"QUESTION NO. 7.—Answer. It is impossible to answer this question categorically and difficult to answer it intelligently. We deal with it as follows :—

"We assume that the question is to be answered having regard to the law of the Province of Quebec bearing on educational matters, in so far as such law is valid, exclusive of the Act of 1903, and that 'Protestants' in the question means the Protestant Board of School Commissioners of the City of Montreal and the Trustees of the Protestant dissentient schools in rural municipalities.

"To part (a) the answer is : Yes.

"To part (b). Further, assuming that the inquiry intended is whether Jewish children have the right to attend Protestant schools, with a correlative obligation on the part of the Boards of Protestant School Commissioners and Trustees to admit children professing the Jewish religion to the schools respectively under their control and to provide therein for their education, the answer is :—

In the City of Montreal : Yes.
In the rural municipalities : No.

"To part (c). The words 'Under such conditions' are quite unintelligible. It is impossible to discern what conditions are meant to be imported. Eliminating them from the question, the answer is :—

In the City of Montreal : Yes.
In the rural municipalities : No."

The appellants have obtained special leave to appeal from this decision to his Majesty in Council.

The solution of the main question to be determined on this appeal, namely, the question whether the Quebec statute of 1903 above referred to is or is not ultra vires, depends upon the effect to be given to section 93 of the British North America Act of 1867, which provides as follows :—

"In and for each province the Legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject and according to the following provisions :—

"(1) Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law in the province at the union ;

"(2) All the powers, privileges, and duties at the union by law conferred and imposed in Upper Canada on the separate schools and school trustees of the Queen's Roman Catholic subjects shall be and the same are hereby extended to the dissentient schools of the Queen's Protestant and Roman Catholic subjects in Quebec. . . ."

The succeeding two paragraphs of the section provide for an appeal to the Governor-General in Council from any act or decision of any provincial authority affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the King's subjects in relation to education ; but it was not contended before this Board that these provisions—which were the subject of discussion in a Manitoba case (Brophy v. Attorney-General for Manitoba, 11 The Times L.R., 198 ; [1895] A.C., 202)—had the effect of ousting the jurisdiction of the Courts, and it is unnecessary to refer to them again.

In order to determine whether the restrictions imposed by section 93 of the Act of 1867 are infringed by the Quebec statute of 1903, it is necessary to consider, first, whether any and which of the schools referred to in that statute were denominational schools in which any class of persons had by law any right or privilege at the union, and, secondly, whether and to what extent that statute prejudicially affects any such right or privilege. For the purpose of this inquiry it is not necessary to recite the earlier statutes of Lower Canada dealing with public education, which are effectively summarized in the judgment of Mr. Justice Flynn in this case, and it will be sufficient to state shortly the provisions of the consolidating statute of 1861 (21 Vict., c. 15), which was in force at the date of the union.

The effect of the statute of 1861 was to establish two somewhat different educational systems, namely, one system for Lower Canada outside the cities of Quebec and Montreal (which may be referred to as the "rural area") and another system for those two cities.

In the rural area there were set up two classes of schools for the elementary instruction of youth, that is to say, (a) in each municipality, one or more common schools managed by School Commissioners elected by all the landholders and householders of the municipality other than the dissentient inhabitants to be hereafter referred to, and (b) in any municipality in which any number of inhabitants professing a religious faith different from that of the majority had signified such dissent, one or more schools managed by Trustees appointed by the dissentients. These schools were maintained partly by monthly school fees, partly by allowances out of the common school fund, and partly by a school rate levied by the School Commissioners, or, in the case of dissentients, by their Trustees. The teachers at each school were appointed by the Commissioners or Trustees in charge of the school, having first been examined by a Board of Examiners for the county, which might (if the Governor in Council so ordained) be organized in two divisions, one Roman Catholic and the other Protestant. The course of study to be followed in each school was regulated by the Commissioners or Trustees (as the case might be), but it was provided (by section 65 of the Act) that "the curé, priest, or officiating minister shall have the exclusive right of selecting the books having reference to religion and morals for the use of the schools for children of his own religious faith." The schools in each municipality were to be visited periodically by Visitors consisting of the resident clergy and other official persons ; but no priest, minister, or ecclesiastic was to visit a school belonging to inhabitants not of his own persuasion except with the consent of the Commissioners or Trustees of the school (section 121). Children from five to 16 years of age residing in any school district were to have a right to attend "the school thereof" upon payment of the monthly fees (section 66) ; but this provision does not appear to have applied to the dissentient schools, which were reserved (except as a matter of favour) for children of the dissentient faith residing in the district and (if there was room) for children from other school districts "of the same faith as the dissentients for whom the school was established" (section 56). This reservation, though not clearly stated in the Act, appears to be deducible from its terms; and if there be any doubt upon the point, it is removed by paragraph 2 of section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867, which extends to dissentient schools in Quebec all the powers and privileges by law conferred on the Roman Catholic schools of Upper Canada, including the provisions of the Upper Canada Act of 1863 (26 Vict., c. 5).

It is convenient at this stage to deal, as regards these schools in the rural area, with the first of the two questions above formulated, namely, whether any and which of them were denominational schools in which any class of persons had by law any right or privilege at the union. That the dissentient schools in the rural area fall within that category can hardly be doubted. Where a school is founded by a body of Protestants and is maintained by their contributions and managed by Trustees appointed by them, where its teachers are chosen by those Trustees after examination by a Protestant Board of Examiners, where its religious books are selected by the Protestant minister and admission to the school is confined (except by favour) to the children of Protestant parents, it would be affectation to call that school anything but a denominational school; and the same is equally true of a like dissentient school under Roman Catholic control. It is plain also that the dissentient supporters of such a school, who are bound together by a common religious faith, form a "class of persons" having special rights and privileges with respect to the school, including the right to appoint the managing Trustees and through those Trustees to select the teachers at the school, to control the course of study and to exclude children of another faith. But the same cannot (their Lordships think) be said of a common school in the rural area not being a separate or dissentient school. Such a school, if in a single school district, is under the management of Commissioners appointed by the whole body of landholders and householders in the district without regard to their religious faith; and even in a district where a minority has established its own separate school, the electors who remain need not be all of the same religious persuasion. No doubt it is true, as stated by the Canadian Courts, that in most of the school districts in the rural area the majority of the landholders and householders are Roman Catholics, and, accordingly, that the common schools in those districts (other than the dissentient schools) are in fact controlled by members of that religious community; but, if so, the result is due to the circumstances of the particular school districts, and it is not a right or privilege to which any class of persons are "by law" entitled. In a New Brunswick case (Maher v. Town Council of Portland, 1874, reported in Wheeler's Confederation Law of Canada, page 338 note, at page 367), Lord Justice James, who delivered the judgment of this Board, dealt with a similar contention as follows:—

"It has been contended on the part of the appellant that de facto they became denominational schools in this way—that is to say, that whereas the whole machinery was left local, that the ratepayers had the power of appointing the master, the ratepayers had the power of appointing the trustees of the schools, but where the whole inhabitants of a district, or the great majority of a district, belonged to the Roman Catholic faith, or belonged to a Protestant sect, there they could so work the school practically as to give it a denominational character or a denominational hue; that is to say, if all the children were Roman Catholics, Roman Catholic teaching would be found in that school; but the fact that that might be the accidental result of the mode of working the Act under the old system is not to give a legal right to that denomination, which was the right alone which was intended to be protected by the Federation Act of the Dominion of Canada. It is an accident which might have happened to-day, and might have been reversed to-morrow by a change of the inhabitants of the district, or a change in their views; and that is not a thing to which it is possible to give the colour of a legal right."

It appears to their Lordships that this reasoning, although relating to a different statute, applies to the common schools (other than dissentient schools) in the rural area, and accordingly that as regards that area the separate or dissentient schools alone come within the protection of section 93 (1) of the Act of 1867.

Turning now to the cities of Quebec and Montreal, it appears that, while the public educational system established in those cities by the Act of 1867 was similar in many of its features to that of the rural area, there were important differences. It may be (as suggested by Mr. Justice Rivard) that it appeared to the Legislature that in these centres, where there was already a dense population and a mixture of religious beliefs, it was unnecessary to require a minority to declare its dissent, and that two kinds of school should at once be set up. But, however that may be, the statute, so far as it applied to the two cities, did not divide the schools into majority and minority schools, but into Roman Catholic and Protestant schools. Each city was to be considered for the purposes of the Act as one municipality, and each school was to be considered a school district. In each city the schools were to be managed by twelve School Commissioners appointed by the Corporation, of whom six were to be Roman Catholic and six Protestant; and such Commissioners were to "form two separate and distinct corporations, the one for Roman Catholics and the other for Protestants" (section 130). No special school rate was to be levied, but payments were to be made by the City Treasurer to the respective Boards of Commissioners "in proportion to the population of the religious persuasion represented by such Boards respectively" (section 131). Each Board was to manage its own schools and appoint the teachers; but such teachers were to be previously examined by a Board of Examiners appointed by the Governor in Council through the Superintendent of Education, one-half of such Board being Roman Catholics and the other half Protestants, and each of such halves acting separately from the other (section 103). The provisions of section 65 as to the choice of books having reference to religion and morals apparently applied to the City schools, so that the religious books for Roman Catholic schools would be chosen by the Roman Catholic curé or priest and the religious books for the Protestant schools by the Protestant priest or minister. Any school managed by either Board could be attended by any child in the city of the specified age (sections 66, 128, and 129).

Then, were the common schools in the cities of Montreal and Quebec denominational schools in which any class of persons had by law a right or privilege at the union? In their Lordships' opinion they were. Every common school in either city was under the management and control of a Board of Commissioners chosen from persons of a particular religious faith, and each of these Boards is referred to (in section 131) as "representing" a religious persuasion. The school fund contributed by the corporation was to be apportioned between the two Boards in proportion to the religious persuasions which they respectively represented, and therefore roughly (although not precisely) according to the religious faiths of those who contributed to the fund. The examination of teachers, the selection of religious books, and the right to visit the schools were based on a like separation of faiths. It is true that in the two cities a school belonging to either Board might before the date of Confederation be attended by children of a faith different from that represented by the Board: but it appears to their Lordships that the provisions for the management and control of the schools by persons of a particular religious persuasion set upon them a denominational stamp which could not be effaced by the attendance of a certain number of children of a divergent faith. The Roman Catholics in Montreal or Quebec formed a class of persons who had the right and privilege of having their schools controlled and managed by Commissioners of that religious persuasion and their teachers examined by examiners of the same persuasion; and like privileges belonged to the Protestants of each city with regard to the schools controlled by the Protestant Board of Commissioners. This view is confirmed, not only by expressions contained in the judgments of this Board in the Manitoba cases, (City of Winnipeg v. Barrett, 8 The Times L.R., 745; [1892] A.C., 445, at pp. 453 to 456, Brophy v. Attorney-General for Manitoba, supra), and in the Ottawa case (Ottawa Roman Catholic Separate School Trustees v. Mackell, 33 The Times L.R., 37; [1917] A.C., 62, at p. 69), but also by the emphatic statements of the experienced Judges who dealt with this matter in the Canadian Courts. Chief Justice Anglin, in delivering the unanimous judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada, said that "under the Act of 1861 there were no dissentient schools either in Montreal or Quebec, although no doubt the schools in those cities were denominational schools," and, again, that "nobody doubted that the Roman Catholic and Protestant separate schools of Quebec and Montreal were denominational schools or that the Protestants were a class of persons whose rights and interests were protected"; and similar expressions may be found in the judgments delivered in the Court of King's Bench. Their Lordships cannot but assent to the views so expressed.

It may be added that, in their Lordships' opinion, the contention, put forward by counsel for the appellants, that the word "Protestant" in the statutes must be construed as meaning non-Catholic and so as including Jews, is quite untenable; and also that the Protestant community, although divided for some purposes into different denominations, is itself a denomination and capable of being regarded as a "class of persons" within the meaning of section 93 of the Act of 1867.

It appears that the boundaries of the cities of Montreal and Quebec have since the union been extended, and that the Roman Catholic and Protestant Boards of Commissioners have carried their operations into the added areas. The Supreme Court refrained from pronouncing an opinion as to the effect of any such annexation on school rights in the annexed territories, and their Lordships accordingly do not deal with that question; but it is clear that no post-union annexation of territory could deprive any class of persons of the protection afforded to them by section 93 of the Act of 1867.

It is now possible to deal with the second of the questions formulated above, namely, whether and to what extent the Quebec statute of 1903 prejudicially affects any right or privilege to which any class of persons was by law entitled at the union. Section 1 of the Act provides that "any provision to the contrary notwithstanding, in all the municipalities of the Province . . . persons professing the Jewish religion shall for school purposes be treated in the same manner as Protestants and for the said purposes shall be subject to the same obligations and shall enjoy the same rights and privileges as the latter." This is very wide and comprehensive language, and, notwithstanding the forcible reasoning of Chief Justice Anglin to the contrary, their Lordships incline to the view that it would authorize the appointment of professing Jews to the Protestant Boards of Commissioners and Examiners in Montreal or Quebec, and might even justify a claim on the part of Jewish inhabitants in the rural area to join with Protestants in forming a dissentient school and appointing its Trustees. If so, the section plainly infringes the rights and privileges of Protestants in the Protestant schools in the city areas and in the dissentient schools elsewhere. Further, section 6 of the Act, so far as it purports to enable a professing Jew to send his children as of right to a Protestant dissentient school in the rural area, is an infringement of the rights belonging to Protestants at the union and so goes beyond the legislative authority of the provincial Legislature. With regard to sections 2 to 5 of the Act, while they may no doubt require consideration by the Quebec Legislature in view of the decision of the present case, their Lordships agree with the view taken by the Supreme Court that they are not in themselves void as infringing section 93 of the Act of 1867.

For the above reasons their Lordships are of opinion that the answers to questions 1 and 2 (a) should be varied so as to run as follows:—

"QUESTION NO. 1.—No, except so far as it would enable persons professing the Jewish religion to be appointed to the Protestant Board of School Commissioners in the City of Quebec or Montreal or to any Protestant Board of Examiners or to take part with Protestants in the establishment of a dissentient school outside those cities, and except so far as it would confer the right of attendance at dissentient schools outside the cities of Quebec and Montreal upon persons of religious faith different from that of the dissentient minority.

"QUESTION NO. 2 (a).—On the construction of the statute, yes."

The above observations enable their Lordships to deal shortly with the questions numbered 2 (b), 3, 4, 5, and 7; and it is sufficient to say that they agree with the answers to those questions given by the Supreme Court.

There remains for consideration the sixth question, which asks whether the provincial Legislature can pass legislation to establish separate schools for persons who are neither Catholics nor Protestants. This question is framed in very general terms, and their Lordships have from time to time expressed their reluctance to give an opinion upon abstract and hypothetical questions which have not yet arisen in a concrete form; but the question now under consideration bears so close a relation to those which have been already dealt with that it would be difficult to arrive at a conclusion as to those other questions without forming an opinion upon the subject matter of the sixth question, and their Lordships think it right to say that upon this question also they are in accord with the opinion expressed by the Supreme Court of Canada. While section 93 of the Act of 1867 protects every right or privilege with respect to the denominational schools which any class of persons may have had by law at the union, it does not purport to stereotype the educational system of the Province as then existing. On the contrary, it expressly authorizes the provincial Legislature to make laws in regard to education subject only to the provisions of the section; and it is difficult to see how the Legislature can effectively exercise the power so entrusted to it unless it is to have a large measure of freedom to meet new circumstances and needs as they arise. The statute protects the rights which at the union belonged to the Roman Catholic population as a class, as well as those belonging to the Protestant population as a class; but to treat members of both denominations, who substantially made up the whole population of the Province at the time of the union, as forming together a "class of persons" with a right to object to the establishment of any school not under Christian control, would be to give a meaning to the statute which its words will not bear. It appears to their Lordships that it would be possible to frame legislation for establishing separate schools for non-Christians without infringing the rights of the two Christian communities in their denominational schools; and they agree with the Supreme Court that legislation confined within those lines would be valid. It is hardly necessary to add that this Board, like the Supreme Court, have dealt with all the questions as questions of law and have in no way concerned themselves with any question of policy.

For the above reasons their Lordships are of the opinion that the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada should be affirmed with the variations above set out, and they will humbly advise his Majesty accordingly. The appellants should pay the costs of the respondent Boards of School Commissioners and of the respondent Joseph Schubert of this appeal. The Protestant Committee of the Council of Public Instruction for Quebec, who obtained special leave to intervene before this Board, and the Attorney-General for Quebec should bear their own costs; but the sum of £150 deposited by the Protestant Committee should be returned to them.

KERR v. MARINE PRODUCTS, LIMITED.*

Companies—Director—Remuneration fixed by Board—Not confirmed by company—Validity of agreement—Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII., c. 69), Table A, Art. 69.

The plaintiff was a director of the defendant company (which had adopted Table A with some modifications), and at a meeting of the board a service agreement was approved, signed, and sealed appointing the plaintiff "overseas director" at a salary of £1,800 a year. The plaintiff proceeded overseas and performed his duties under the agreement till differences arose and he resigned. In an action by the plaintiff for salary due under the agreement,

Held, that the agreement was ultra vires the board, and since the plaintiff's remuneration had never been determined by the company in general meeting, as required by Art. 69 of Table A, he could not recover, but must repay to the company on their counterclaim the money paid to him under the agreement.

This was an action tried by Mr. Justice Finlay. The facts appear from the judgment.

Mr. J. B. Melville, K.C., and Mr. Robert Fortune appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Merriman, K.C., and Mr. F. W. Wallace for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE FINLAY read the following judgment:—This action is brought to recover a sum of £1,470 15s. in respect of salary alleged to be due to the plaintiff by the defendants, under an agreement dated September 16, 1926. The defendants, Marine Products, Limited, were incorporated as a private company on July 28, 1926, the main object of the company being to exploit certain inventions and patents of Dr. Ehrenreich with reference to shark fisheries. The plaintiff, who is a retired naval commander, was one of the first directors of the defendant company.

The question which I have to determine is as to the validity of an agreement whereby the plaintiff, who was a director of the defendant company, was employed as "overseas director" of that company at a salary of £1,800 per annum.

There is a minute of a meeting, on August 23, 1926, of the directors of the defendant company at which there were present the plaintiff, who was chairman, Dr. Ehrenreich, Mr. Thynne, and Mr. Seale, showing that until the company was in a revenue-earning condition it was resolved that the drawings of directors on account of salaries be limited as therein defined and be payable as from July 1, 1926, that is, from a date some weeks prior to the formation of the company. The drawings of the plaintiff were by that resolution limited to £30 per month, while the drawings of Dr. Ehrenreich were limited to £125 per month. On September 7, 1926, was held the statutory meeting of the shareholders of the defendant company, and at that meeting the directors' fees were fixed at the rate of £180 per annum for the chairman, that is, the present plaintiff, and £150 per annum for the other directors. It is, of course, perfectly obvious that the drawings authorized on August 23 were not drawings in respect only of the salaries fixed on September 7, but that the directors had in their minds that they were to receive other remuneration. At a meeting of the directors held on September 16 service agreements were approved, signed, and sealed with Mr. Thynne as joint managing director, with Dr. Ehrenreich as joint managing director, with the plaintiff as overseas director, and with Mr. Seale as commercial director. These four gentlemen were the four directors of the company, they were present at the meeting, and there is no doubt that they all voted in favour of the approval of each and all of these agreements. I was informed that the total remuneration agreed to be paid under these four agreements to the four directors was £7,000 per annum. In this action I am directly concerned only with the agreement with the plaintiff.

There is no doubt at all that it was necessary for the proper management of the company's business that there should be in Australia one or more representatives of the company. Much of the business had to be transacted in Australia, and, as I have said, it was no doubt essential either to send out some person from England authorized to carry on the company's business in Australia, or else to appoint some agent in Australia to carry on that business. There was at the same time issued to the plaintiff a letter of instructions of September 17, which shows what duties he was required to perform. He went to Australia, and I have no doubt that he there performed to the utmost of his ability the various duties entrusted to him. At a later date Dr. Ehrenreich also went to Australia, and it appears from the evidence before me that differences then developed first between Dr. Ehrenreich and some members of the staff in Australia, and later between Dr. Ehrenreich and the plaintiff.

By resolutions of the shareholders of December 22, 1926, confirmed on January 6, 1927, the capital of the defendant company was greatly increased, and it was turned into a public company. It should be mentioned, although it is not directly relevant to the issue before me, that in the statement in lieu of prospectus issued on that occasion no reference was made to these service agreements. The plaintiff said —and I accept his evidence—that he knew nothing about this until long after the event had happened.

On the plaintiff's return from Australia further differences seem to have developed, and finally, at a meeting of October 13, 1927, the plaintiff's resignation, which had been tendered before, was finally accepted.

The whole question is whether the agreement is enforceable. No question of quantum meruit arises. The defendants say that the agreement is unenforceable, and their main ground is that, whatever might have been done by the company itself, this agreement was not one which could validly be entered into by the directors. This matter, of course, depends upon the general law applicable to companies, and upon the Articles of Association of this particular company.

As to the law, my attention was called to several cases, and I may refer to two—Benson v. Heathorn (1 Y. and Coll. C.C., 326) and In re George Newman and Co. (11 The Times L.R., 292 ; [1895] 1 Ch., 674). The law appears to me to be stated in a single sentence in the judgment of the Court of Appeal delivered by Lord Justice Lindley in In re George Newman and Co. (supra), where at page 686 he says this : "Directors have no right to be paid for their services, and cannot pay themselves or each other, or make presents to themselves out of the company's assets, unless authorized so to do by the instrument which regulates the company or by the shareholders at a properly convened meeting." It was not suggested before me that there was any authority by the shareholders, and the whole question is whether the directors were authorized to enter into this agreement by the instrument which regulates the company. Table A is, with some exclusions not material to the present purpose, applied to the company, and the point before me appears to depend upon Article 69 of Table A, and Articles 14, 15, and 17 of the articles of the company.

Article 69 of Table A provides : "The remuneration of the directors shall from time to time be determined by the company in general meeting."

Article 14 of the company's articles provided : "The directors from time to time, and at any time may provide, through local boards, attorneys, or agencies for the management of the affairs of the company abroad, and may appoint any persons to be members of such local boards or as attorneys or agents, and may fix their remuneration. . . ."

Article 15 : "The directors from time to time, and at any time may delegate to any managing director, local board head manager, manager, attorney or agent any of the powers, authorities, and discretions for the time being vested in the directors. . . ."

Article 17 : "A director shall be capable of contracting and participating in the profits of the company in the same manner as if he were not a director, subject, nevertheless, to the following restrictions, namely : (1) Before the contract is entered into, or so soon thereafter as he becomes interested therein, he shall disclose in writing to the board his interest in the contract, and (2) after he has become interested he shall not vote as a director in respect of the contract or any matter arising thereout, and if he do so vote his vote shall not be counted. . . ."

It was contended on behalf of the plaintiff that the effect of Articles 14, 15, and 17 read together was that the directors could appoint local boards, attorneys, and agencies, and appoint any persons to be members of such local boards or as attorneys or agents, and could fix their remuneration. It was further contended that even if Article 14 (and the same observation in my opinion applies to Article 15) would not in itself be sufficient to justify the appointment of a director as an agent and the fixing of his remuneration by the directors, Article 17 shows that Article 14 ought to be construed as applying to directors. I am unable to accept this argument. The meaning of Articles 14 and 15 is, in my opinion, that the directors may appoint local boards or agencies, such local boards or agencies being of course subject to the directions of the board of directors, and it is in my view impossible to suppose that it was contemplated that the directors should appoint themselves to remunerative positions of this character and should vote themselves salaries for performing this work. This view seems to me to be inconsistent with principle and with the authorities as to the duties of directors. I may on this point refer to the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor in Benson v. Heathorn (supra). There appears to me to be a close analogy between the appointment of the director in that case to be ship's husband and the appointment of the director in this case to be overseas director. I cannot see that any assistance is to be derived from Article 17. That article enables a director, subject to certain restrictions and qualifications, to contract and participate in the profits of a contract with the company. One of the restrictions is that a director after he has become interested shall not vote in respect of the contract or in any matter arising thereout. It appears to me that this restriction is applicable in the present case. See on this Foster v. Foster ([1916] 1 Ch., 532), and particularly the observations of Mr. Justice Peterson at page 547. It does not seem to me that there is in that article anything which would authorize what was done by the directors here.

With regard to Article 69 I will only say this : It refers, I think, to the remuneration of directors in respect of their work as directors, but it appears to me to confirm the view which I have taken. It would be a remarkable result if the remuneration of the directors for their work as directors was to be determined by the company in general meeting, but the directors had power to vote themselves unlimited salaries in respect of work done or proposed to be done by them outside their work as directors of the company. When the figures in the present case of the remuneration voted by the company to the directors for their services as directors are compared with the remuneration voted by the directors in respect of these special services this comparison may be thought to afford a striking commentary.

I cannot hold that the directors had authority by virtue of the articles, or in any other way, to approve these service agreements whereby they and each of them were voted large salaries in respect of services as overseas director or commercial director or otherwise. I ought perhaps to add that I was satisfied upon the evidence that there were at the date when this agreement was entered into and approved a substantial number of shareholders of the company who were not in any way consulted upon the subject. The case may seem a hard one from the point of view of the plaintiff, who has, I am sure, done his very best for what he conceived to be the interests of the company, but I am, of course, compelled to decide the question in accordance with what I believe to be the law, and I must hold that this agreement is one which cannot be enforced against the company.

The defendant company counterclaim for £800, being moneys paid to the plaintiff under the agreement which I have held to be unenforceable. In the circumstances I see no answer to this counterclaim if the view which I have formed on the main question is correct. It therefore follows that I must give judgment for the defendant company on the claim and also for the defendant company for £800 on the counterclaim. The plaintiff must pay the costs.

BRITT v. GALMOYE AND NEVILL.*

Master and Servant—Servant's negligence—Journey not on master's business—No liability on master.

The first defendant, who had the second defendant in his employment as a van-driver, lent him his private motor-car, after the day's work was finished, to take friends to a theatre. The second defendant by his negligent driving injured the plaintiff.

Held, that as the journey was not on the master's business and the master was not in control he was not liable for his servant's act.

His Lordship, after hearing legal argument, gave judgment for the defendant Galmoye in this action, which raised a new point on the liability of the owner of a motor-car for injuries caused to a third person by the negligent driving of a servant to whom the owner had lent the motor-car for the servant's own purposes.

The plaintiff, Mr. Harold Britt, was a painter employed by the Southern Railway Company. On December 23, 1926, he was standing at night on a trestle under a bridge at Lewisham in order to paint the under-side of the bridge. The trestle was protected from traffic by a barrier with red lamps. A motor-car belonging to the defendant, Mr. Lawrence Henry Galmoye, of 62, Barrington-road, Brixton, and driven by the other defendant, Mr. Horace Nevill, of Finchley-road, Kennington, collided with the trestle and injured the plaintiff. The jury found that the defendant Nevill was negligent and assessed the damages at £300.

Mr. Galmoye was a contractor employing a number of vanmen. Nevill, who was one of them, was a trusted servant, and, as Mr. Galmoye said, a friend as well as a servant. In addition to the vans, Mr. Galmoye had a Morris Cowley motor-car for his personal use, and had on a previous occasion lent it to Nevill at his request. On the day of the accident Nevill asked for the loan of the motor-car to take two women to the theatre, and Mr. Galmoye gave him the key of his garage and told him that he might take the motor-car. It was while Nevill was driving his friends home that the accident occurred.

Mr. E. F. Lever appeared for the plaintiff ; Mr. E. Duke for the defendants.

Mr. Lever contended that inasmuch as Nevill was in the general employment of Mr. Galmoye for the purpose of driving motor-cars, and was driving his motor-car with his authority, the liability of Mr. Galmoye was not affected because the journey was for Nevill's own benefit.

Mr. Duke, while arguing to the contrary, was stopped.

Mr. Justice Shearman, in giving judgment, stated the facts and said that he was asked to say that Mr. Galmoye was responsible. The principle of law as to the liability of a principal had been expressed in many ways. The Latin maxim : Qui facit per alium facit per se did not help him, for the question was : "Is this Mr. Galmoye's act ?" The principle was better expressed in the shorter maxim, Respondeat superior, because the gist of it was that the agent was doing something for his principal. The cases like Storey v. Ashton (L.R., 4 Q.B., 476) on diverted journeys did not help him here, because in those cases the servant began on his master's business and continued on his own. But here the servant, though admittedly in general employment as a driver of vans, was authorized to drive women who were not friends of the master. The journey was not on the master's business. The master was for the nonce a stranger.

Nor was much assistance to be got from the cases in which it had been held that where the master or his driver was present while the authorized person drove they retained sufficient control to make the master liable. He could find no remnant of control in the present case ; for control meant that the journey was the journey of the principal. The whole law of the liability of employers was considered in Lloyd v. Grace, Smith and Co. (27 The Times L.R., 409 ; [1911] 2 K.B., 489 ; 28 The Times L.R., 547 ; [1912] A.C., 716).

In Dyer v. Munday (11 The Times L.R., 282 ; [1895] 1 Q.B., 742) and in Lloyd v. Grace, Smith and Co. (supra), it was said in the Court of Appeal that the principal was responsible if the servant was employed to do the class of act in which the tort was committed. The servant here was not employed to do this class of act ; he was in the position of a stranger after his work was finished. In the result there must be judgment for Mr. Galmoye, with costs. The plaintiff was, of course, entitled, if he chose, to ask for judgment against Nevill for what it was worth, but to do so now might prejudice his position in the event of an appeal as to Mr. Galmoye.

IN RE ANDERSON—PUBLIC TRUSTEE v. BIELBY.*

Will—Construction—"All my stock or shares in the Great Eastern Railway Company"—Railway amalgamation—Falsa demonstratio—Purchase of stock in new company.

By his will, dated March 9, 1922, Mr. Joseph Anderson, of 60, Carnarvon-road, Stratford, bequeathed to Mr. Percy George Bielby all his stocks or shares of whatsoever kind in the Great Eastern Railway. In November, 1922, the testator owned £3,000 Ordinary stock in that company. In January, 1923, the amalgamation scheme of the North-Eastern, Eastern, and East Scottish group came into operation, and, in return for his holdings of Great Eastern stock, the testator received £1,050 Five per Cent. Ordinary stock and £1,350 Deferred Ordinary in the London and North-Eastern Railway.

Between August, 1923, and March, 1925, after the amalgamation, the testator bought £3,800 Deferred Ordinary stock in the London and North-Eastern Railway.

The testator died on December 5, 1926. The question was whether, under the terms of the bequest in the will of all his stock in the Great Eastern Railway, the £1,050 Ordinary stock and the £5,150 Deferred Ordinary in the London and North-Eastern Railway passed to Mr. Percy Bielby. Mr. Justice Russell held that the £3,800 Deferred did not.

Mr. R. H. Hodge appeared for the plaintiff: Mr. Greenland for the specific legatee, Mr. Bielby; and Mr. W. M. Hunt for the residuary legatees.

MR. JUSTICE RUSSELL, in giving judgment, said that the testator, having made a codicil to his will dated May 12, 1926, died leaving a testamentary disposition of his property of that date. At that date the testator had £1,050 Five per Cent. Ordinary stock and £5,150 Deferred Ordinary stock of the London and North-Eastern Railway, of which £3,800 had been acquired after the amalgamation of the companies. The only way to construe the bequest of "all my stock or shares in the Great Eastern Railway Company" was to treat it as falsa demonstratio and a bequest of stock owned by him which had formerly been Great Eastern Railway stock. Clause 16 of the amalgamation scheme which was authorized under the Railways Act, 1921, made no difference. That clause ran:—

"Stock of the company substituted by virtue of this scheme for stock of the six companies shall be held upon and subject to the same trusts liens charges powers and other legal or equitable rights privileges and restrictions as affected the stock for which by virtue of the scheme the same is substituted and any reference in any Act of Parliament deed will codicil book document instrument or writing to stock of the six companies shall be deemed to be a reference to the stock of the company substituted therefor by virtue of this scheme."

But the £3,800 new stock was not substituted for any stock of the six companies. The £3,800 fell into residue, and Mr. Bielby took under the will only the £1,050 Five per Cent. Ordinary stock and £1,350 Deferred Ordinary.

HANDS v. SIMPSON FAWCETT AND CO., LIMITED.*

Contract—Commercial traveller—Use of motor-car — Motoring offence — Suspension of licence — Dismissal — Claim for damages—Non-disclosure of motoring offence before the agreement.

The plaintiff, who was a commercial traveller, was employed by the defendants under an agreement which provided that the plaintiff was to use a motor-car for the carriage of samples. The plaintiff was convicted of driving the car to the common danger and was fined £10 and his driving licence was suspended for three months. The defendants thereupon terminated the plaintiff's employment on the ground that these facts constituted misconduct justifying dismissal.

In an action for wrongful dismissal the defendants also pleaded that before the agreement was made the plaintiff ought to have informed them that he had previously been convicted of being drunk when in charge of a motor-car and been sentenced to imprisonment for driving it in a manner dangerous to the public.

Held, that in the case of such an agreement as the plaintiff had with the defendants there was no obligation on him to disclose his previous conviction for a motoring offence, and that the conviction during the currency of the agreement, even although the plaintiff's licence was suspended, was not a ground for terminating the agreement, as the plaintiff could have got someone to drive the car. The plaintiff was therefore held entitled to damages.

In this action Mr. Harry Arthur Hands, a commercial traveller, of Sussex-square, Brighton, sought to recover damages from Messrs. Simpson Fawcett and Co., Limited, perambulator and toy manufacturers, of Blackbull-street, Hunslet, Leeds, for alleged breach of a written agreement entered into between the parties on December 1, 1926. The plaintiff also claimed damages for alleged wrongful dismissal and a declaration that he was entitled to commission at the rate of 2½ per cent. on the net value of all goods sold to persons introduced by him during a period of three years from December 1, 1926.

The point raised in the case was whether there was a duty on the part of a man, when applying for the position of commercial traveller, to inform his prospective employers that he had been convicted of motoring offences.

The defendants said that they were justified in putting an end to the contract because of the concealment of the motoring offences by the plaintiff, which, they said, was concealment of material facts.

Sir Walter Schwabe, K.C., and Mr. Eric Sachs appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. J. A. Greene, K.C., and Mr. Wynn Werninck for the defendants.

SIR WALTER SCHWABE, in opening the case, said that the plaintiff was employed by the defendants as a commercial traveller under the agreement in question which provided for a commission with a guaranteed minimum. His ground covered practically the whole of the South of England, including London. Under the agreement he was to be employed for seven months certain at 6 per cent. commission. He was then to have an option to continue on a yearly agreement on the same terms. If the defendants terminated the agreement the plaintiff was entitled to 2½ per cent. for three years on the orders from customers whom he introduced.

In January, 1927, a month after the contract was made, the plaintiff became involved in a collision in Sussex when driving a motor-car at night, and upon being summoned before the Haywards Heath magistrates his answer was that he had been dazzled by the bright headlights of the other car. The Bench found that he was driving on the wrong side of the road when the accident occurred and he was convicted of driving to the common danger and fined £10, his licence being endorsed and suspended for three months. That, said counsel, was pleaded as misconduct which entitled the defendants to terminate the plaintiff's employment.

The other defence was that before entering into the agreement the plaintiff had been convicted at Bow-street of having been drunk when in charge of a motor-car on Constitution Hill on Derby Day, 1925. He was fined £10, his licence was suspended for seven months, and he was sentenced to a month's imprisonment in the second division for driving in a manner dangerous to the public. In regard to that matter, said counsel, the plaintiff had a strong view that he was wrongly convicted.

The defendants said that they ought to have been informed of that conviction and that if they had known of it they would not have entered into the agreement with the plaintiff. They also set out another motoring offence, when the plaintiff was fined £3 for exceeding the speed limit. The question was whether the defendants were entitled to dismiss the plaintiff in January, 1927, because he had been convicted. He (counsel) submitted that it was no excuse for getting out of an agreement which the defendants did not like. He contended that the plaintiff was not bound to inform the defendants that he had been previously convicted of a motoring offence.

His LORDSHIP.—It would be otherwise if he were applying for a post as chauffeur.

SIR WALTER SCHWABE.—Very different indeed.

Counsel submitted, on the point of misconduct justifying dismissal, that it was a question of the extent of the misconduct, and that, in the circumstances, this case fell on the right side of the line in favour of the plaintiff. He cited Fletcher v. Krell (28 L.T., 105), where the defendant pleaded concealment by the plaintiff, a governess, of the fact that she was a divorced woman as justification for her dismissal, and it was held on demurrer that the plea was bad.

The plaintiff, giving evidence, said that in his career as an agent he had effected a turnover of £100,000 in one year. He had motored for 28 years. He was told by the defendants that a turnover of £200,000 could reasonably be anticipated in the South of England district. For the purpose of his business he mainly used the railway. He calculated that in the first year he would easily have procured a turnover of £20,000. He had about 1,000 customers on his agency book and probably 300 or 400 of them would have been buyers of the goods he was selling for the defendants. He had done business with Harrods, Whiteleys, and other big firms, and had done £36,000 in one year for Selfridges. A new man on his ground would have had a hopeless chance for a few years.

In cross-examination by Mr. GREENE, the plaintiff said that before his agreement with the defendants he had not done business in perambulators, but had been engaged in the cycle and allied trades. He told the defendants that he had a good connexion and knew the district very well. They told him that they had not done business in the South of England for 20 years and that they wanted to compete with a rival firm which had the trade principally in their hands. The motor-car in which he was travelling when the collision took place on January 6, 1927, was one which he had purchased from the defendants. When the police were called he gave the name and address of the defendants as the people for whom he was driving, because theirs was the only card he had with him at the time.

The plaintiff said that the motor-car was sold to him and he treated it as his property. He used it for business which he did for other firms. When his licence was endorsed he employed a man to drive for him.

Mr. GREENE, for the defendants, said that the issues in the case were of fact and not of law. If the contract could not be fulfilled on one side, the question for determination was whether the breach was small or whether it went to the root of the contract. It all became a question of degree. Under the contract the plaintiff was to do active work to sell the defendants' goods, and an essential part of the agreement was that a motor-car supplied to the plaintiff by the defendants under the contract on certain terms should be used to carry samples, for which purpose a special platform had been erected. The motor-car and the way in which the plaintiff used it were part of the objects of the agreement. If he had refused to drive the motor-car at all, that clearly would have been a breach of the contract; so, if he put himself into the position by his own conduct that he could not use the motor-car on account of the suspension of his licence, that in law was the same thing. Was the plaintiff in the position to say on January 27 that what he had done did not prevent him from carrying out his work? It might well be that the non-disclosure of convictions of motoring offences before his appointment did not of itself entitle the defendants to say that it put an end to the contract, but it was a very different thing when in fact there were actual motoring offences during the period of the agreement.

MR. JUSTICE FINLAY.—You cannot say that a motoring offence and a fine of £10 entitled you to break the contract; you have to show that it was the three months' suspension. Isn't it perfectly obvious that he could have continued his duties by employing a chauffeur?

Mr. GREENE.—The expense of employing a chauffeur would have been too great. If the plaintiff's financial position at that time was that he could not fulfill the contract, were not the defendants entitled to put an end to it, since his suspension prevented him from driving himself?

Mr. Walter B. Dow, manager and secretary of the defendant company, said that the company's trade was largely in the North. The total turnover for 1926 was £83,523. Referring to interviews with the plaintiff, he said that he was told nothing of his motoring troubles, and said that he would not have employed him if he had known of them.

MR. JUSTICE FINLAY, after stating the facts, said that it was suggested that the non-disclosure by the plaintiff of certain motoring offences justified the defendants in repudiating the agreement. The authority on the subject was Fletcher v. Krell (28 L.T., 105). In his opinion there was no such obligation in the present case as existed in contracts of insurance to state all the material facts.

Dealing with the prosecution, conviction, and consequent suspension for three months of the plaintiff's motoring licence for dangerous driving while on a journey from London to Brighton in the defendants' interests, his LORDSHIP said that, in order to see if that formed a justification for the defendants' repudiation of the agreement, it was necessary to look at the contract itself. He thought that it was reasonably clear that the conviction of the plaintiff of a motoring offence of that kind was not a ground for terminating the agreement. The defendants were influenced by the suspension of the plaintiff's licence for three months, but it was impossible to say that the plaintiff could not have got someone to drive the motor-car during that time.

In some cases it might be of the essence of the contract that the man himself had to drive the motor-car, but there was nothing in this case to show that the plaintiff had put it out of his power to perform his duties. There must be judgment for the plaintiff. He assessed the damages at £400.

Judgment was accordingly entered for the plaintiff for £400, with costs.

COMPAGNIE CONTINENTALE D'IMPORTATION v. HANDELSVERTRETUNG DER UNION DER S.S.R. IN DEUTSCHLAND.*

Contract—Sale of goods — Conditions — Notice of appropriation — Date of bill of lading to be stated—Notice to be given within seven days from such date—Provisional invoice—Whether a good notice of appropriation—Whether despatch within the seven days sufficient.

The respondents in Rotterdam contracted to buy from the appellants in Hamburg 6,000 tons of South Russian wheat, the conditions of the contract providing that notice of appropriation with ship's name and date of bill of lading should be given by the shippers to the buyers within seven days from date of bill of lading, and that provisional invoice with ship's name and date of bill of lading should be sent by the shippers' London house to the buyers within three days from the arrival of the documents in London. The sellers shipped the wheat at Novorossisk, and within the seven days the sellers sent to the buyers a telegram and confirming letter, which the sellers alleged to be a notice of appropriation, but neither document stated the date of the bill of lading. On the same day the sellers posted to the buyers a provisional invoice which gave the date of the bill of lading, but the provisional invoice was not received by the buyers until after the expiry of the seven days. The buyers contended that there had been no tender in conformity with the contract, and it was found by the Appeal Committee in an arbitration that there had been no good notice of appropriation in the telegram and confirming letter and that the provisional invoice was not intended as a notice of appropriation, and that it was a recognized custom that notice of appropriation and provisional invoice should be separate documents, and that therefore the buyers were under no liability to the sellers.

Held, on a case stated, that even if the provisional invoice constituted a notice of appropriation, yet, as it was not received by the buyers within the contract time, the sellers had not satisfied the contract, since despatch within that time was not a compliance with the condition that the notice should be given to the buyers within that time.

Semble, the provisional invoice was not a notice of appropriation.

Decision of Wright, J. (44 The Times L.R., 10), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the sellers from a decision of Mr. Justice Wright (44 The Times L.R., 10) on an award stated in the form of a special case by the Appeal Committee of the London Corn Trade Association. The appeal raised a question of the construction of a condition printed on the back of a formal contract for the sale of grain.

On November 26, 1926, the sellers, the German representatives of the Russian Soviet Republics, carrying on business at Hamburg, entered into a contract with the buyers, a company carrying on business at Rotterdam, to sell to the buyers 6,000 tons of South Russian wheat. The contract was in the form of the London Corn Trade Association, Black Sea and Danubian Grain Contract, and was subject to a number of conditions printed on the back thereof. The sellers shipped the wheat on a steamer at Novorossisk, and the bills of lading were dated December 30, 1926. It was agreed that the period of seven days from the date of the bills of lading included January 6, 1927. On January 4, 1927, the sellers telegraphed, and confirmed the telegram by letter:—

"Contract twenty-sixth November tender 6099 .737 ke wheat no. K.O.5 S.S. Marigo L Novorossisk Gibraltar for order."

On January 6 the buyers wrote in reply that they could not accept that as a notice of appropriation because the date of the bill of lading was not stated. On the same day the sellers posted to the buyers a provisional invoice (which did give, inter alia, the date of the bill of lading), which the buyers received on January 7. On receipt of it the buyers returned it on the ground that no tender had been made in conformity with the contract.

The dispute was then referred to arbitration, and the arbitrators decided that the sellers had given a proper and sufficient notice of appropriation. The buyers appealed from that decision to the Appeal Committee of the London Corn Trade Association, and the Appeal Committee awarded, subject to the opinion of the Court on a special case, that the buyers had not received a proper and sufficient notice of appropriation within the meaning of condition 1 of the contract, and were, therefore, under no liability to the sellers, and that the award of the arbitrators should be set aside.

Condition 1 on the back of the contract was as follows :—

"Notice of appropriation with ship's name, date of bill or bills of lading, and approximate quantity loaded shall be given by the shipper of the grain tendered under this contract direct or through his house or representative or agent in London to his buyer within seven days from date of bill of lading and by each other seller within the seven days, or in due course if received by him after that time ; . . . Provisional invoice based on bill of lading weight with ship's name and date of bill or bills of lading shall be sent by shipper's house or representative in London to his buyer within three business days after arrival of documents in London . . ."

The Appeal Committee found as facts that the letter of the sellers confirming their telegram on January 4 was intended to be a notice of appropriation, but that it was not a good notice of appropriation because it did not state the date of the bills of lading, and was properly rejected by the buyers. They also found that the provisional invoice of January 6 was not intended as a notice of appropriation, and that it was a well-recognized custom that notice of appropriation and provisional invoice were separate and distinct documents.

Mr. Justice Wright held that, even if the provisional invoice constituted a notice of appropriation, yet, as it was not received by the buyers within the contract time, the sellers had not satisfied the contract, and that, as the custom was not unreasonable and was not inconsistent with the contract, the provisional invoice was not a notice of appropriation, and the award of the Appeal Committee must be upheld.

The sellers appealed.

Mr. Somervell appeared for the appellants ; Mr. Le Quesne, K.C., and Mr. C. W. Lilley for the respondents.

LORD JUSTICE SCRUTTON, in giving judgment, said that the point raised was quite a short one. The sellers in Hamburg sold to buyers at Rotterdam 6,000 tons of South Russian wheat. The contract, which was in the form of the London Corn Trade Association, Black Sea and Danubian Grain Contract, was subject to a number of conditions printed on the back. Condition 1 on the back of the contract provided that notice of appropriation "shall be given by the shipper of the grain . . . to his buyer within seven days from date of bill of lading."

The date of the bill of lading was December 30, 1926, and it was common ground that the buyers had not received a valid notice of appropriation within seven days from that date. By January 7, 1927, no valid notice of appropriation had been given by the sellers to the buyers in accordance with the condition, unless Mr. Somervell's contention was a good one.

Mr. Somervell contended that a notice was given by the shipper when a communication was sent off to the buyer, and that it was immaterial that it did not reach the buyer within the seven days if it had been despatched by the seller within that period.

But when the contract said that a notice should be given by the seller to the buyer within a certain time, it meant that the notice should be given to the buyer within the time specified and not merely to the Post Office, or to a messenger who might lose it on the way. The notice must reach the buyer within the time specified. He agreed with Mr. Justice Wright, and he was gratified to find himself in agreement with the commercial gentlemen who formed the Appeal Committee of the London Corn Trade Association.

It was unnecessary to deal with a second point raised by Mr. Somervell, but without giving a final opinion on it, as the point had not been argued, he (Lord Justice Scrutton) would have thought that it was quite clear that a notice of appropriation and an invoice were two different things. However, the first point was sufficient to dispose of the appeal, which must be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE SANKEY agreed. The Court was asked to construe a short sentence in the contract. The contract provided that notice of appropriation should be given by the sellers to the buyers within seven days. Mr. Somervell contended that the word "given" was susceptible of two meanings : (1) That the sellers should cause the notice of appropriation to be despatched within seven days ; or (2) should cause it to be received by the buyers within seven days. Counsel contended that the first alternative was the correct interpretation. But in his (his Lordship's) view, the second of the two alternatives was right. The word "given" meant given to the buyers, so that the buyers should receive it within the seven days. That was the plain and proper meaning of the word and it was the one which Mr. Justice Wright had put on it.

If there had been any doubt with regard to the construction of the word, they were entitled to look at the other conditions of the contract, and these other conditions of the contract tended to support the same construction. The appeal must be dismissed.

MR. JUSTICE ASTBURY agreed for the same reasons.

MEADE-KING v. USHER'S WILTSHIRE BREWERY, LIMITED.*

Companies—Debentures—Compromise of rights of holders—Power of majority to alter terms—Redemption at less than par—Redemption figure above market price — Validity of scheme.

This was an action which raised the question whether the defendant company, Usher's Wiltshire Brewery, Limited, could insist on a compromise of the rights of the plaintiff as a holder of debenture stock.

Mr. Swords appeared for the plaintiff ; Mr. Owen Thompson, K.C., and Mr. Greenland for the defendant company.

MR. SWORDS said that the plaintiff was the registered proprietor of £200 A debenture stock, part of an issue of £120,000 4½ per cent. debenture stock created by a resolution of the directors of May 23, 1902, and secured by a trust deed of March 13, 1903. The certificate provided, among other things, that interest should be paid half-yearly, and that repayment of the debenture stock could be made only at a premium of 5 per cent. and on six months' notice. By an extraordinary resolution of the holders of three-fourths in value the terms might be increased or reduced as they thought fit. In 1925 a circular was issued to the stockholders stating that it was proposed to consolidate the A, B, and C debenture stock and to issue £350,000 6 per cent. debenture stock, and that, as the stock then known as the A stock only paid 4½ per cent. and was only redeemable at the company's option, and as this affected its market price, it was proposed to redeem it at 80 per cent. The company at that time was not in any financial difficulties. A meeting of these stockholders was held in pursuance of this circular in January, 1926. At this meeting the plaintiff was not present, and this proposal to redeem at 80 per cent. was passed unanimously. Counsel submitted that that was mere confiscation of the plaintiff's rights. The point was raised in an unreported case before Mr. Justice P. O. Lawrence in October, 1923, but the decision was given on another ground.

Counsel cited Mercantile Investment and General Trust Company v. International Company of Mexico (7 The Times L.R., 616 ; [1893] 1 Ch., 484, n) and In re Alabama, New Orleans, Texas and Pacific Junction Railway Company (7 The Times L.R., 171 ; [1891] 1 Ch., 213), per Lord Justice Bowen at page 243.

Mr. THOMPSON, for the defendants, said that there was no confiscation. This stock was irredeemable while the company was a going concern except at the company's option, and as a result its market price at the time of the agreement was from £66 to £73. So the plaintiff was getting more than he would otherwise get. The conditions were of such a wide nature as to include compulsory repayment of the holding of a secured creditor at less than par. The effect of the agreement was to release the rights of the stockholders against the company. The Mercantile Investment case (supra) was distinguishable. This compromise was a reasonable compromise of rights. Under the Joint Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870, now repealed by the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, debenture holders had been required to take shares in In re Empire Mining Company (44 Ch.D., 402). The carrying through of this agreement was a relief of the company from a Stock Exchange difficulty. There was of course no financial difficulty. He submitted that the defendants' case was clear.

Mr. SWORDS replied.

MR. JUSTICE EVE (after stating the facts) said that the proposal in the circular of 1925 was undoubtedly a modification of the rights of the debenture stockholders. At the meeting of the different classes of holders the proposal was approved by the necessary majorities. These powers which the company proposed to exercise were said by the plaintiff to amount to confiscation. The scheme was in fact a release of the rights of the holders under their conditions. It could not be said to be so unreasonable as to call for the intervention of the Court. It was in the nature of a business transaction, and having been agreed to by substantial majorities it was sufficient to bind the minorities. The plaintiff's claim therefore failed and the action must be dismissed with costs on the appropriate County Court scale, the proceeding having been begun in the County Court and transferred here.

M. v. M.*

Divorce—Judicial separation—Wife's petition—Alimony pendente lite — Interlocutory proceeding delayed—Decree of judicial separation—Court's refusal to proceed with petition for alimony pendente lite—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 49)—Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1924, Nos. 57-59 and 61.

After a wife has been granted a decree of judicial separation it is too late to proceed with her petition for alimony pendente lite, even though it may have been commenced before the decree was pronounced.

This was an appeal by a woman petitioner from the refusal of the registrar to make an order for alimony pendente lite after she had been given a decree of judicial separation. The petition for judicial separation was filed on March 26, 1927, and the petition for alimony pendente lite was filed soon afterwards. The respondent filed his answer to the latter petition on May 27, 1927, and after considerable delays filed an affidavit of documents on October 5, 1927. On November 27, 1927, the wife was granted a decree of judicial separation. The registrar made an appointment for the hearing of the petition for alimony pendente lite on January 28, 1928, but declined to proceed farther with that petition on the ground that it was contrary to the current practice.

Mr. T. BUCKNILL, for the petitioner, referred to the following passage in Mr. Clifford Mortimer's last edition of Rayden on Divorce at page 188 :—

"After decree absolute in suits for nullity or dissolution of marriage or after a decree in suits for judicial separation, it would seem to be too late to obtain an award of alimony pendente lite, even upon a petition presented before the final decree, for there is no suit pending. There seems to be no reported decision upon the point."

Counsel read the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1924, which gave the wife a right of inquiry into her husband's means for the purposes of alimony pendente lite, and said that on the analogy of the practice in suits for restitution of conjugal rights he was still entitled to an order in this case. It was held in Ver Mehr v. Ver Mehr ([1921] P. 404) that the jurisdiction of the Court to provide alimony for a wife pendente lite extended until the proved disobedience of the husband to a decree for restitution, and that this right of the wife was not affected by the fact that the order was made after the restitution decree, but before the time for compliance therewith had expired. In this case, he submitted, the suit for judicial separation was not at an end, as the decree might be set aside if there were renewed cohabitation, and such decrees had been set aside on the ground of false evidence. Moreover there could be an appeal from a decree of judicial separation.

LORD MERRIVALE.—Means might have been taken to expedite the inquiry, or to defer the hearing till the wife secured the inquiry as to her husband's means. There is no precedent for what you are asking me to do, and that is an argument against it.

* Reported by WILLIAM LATEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. BUCKNILL said that if his contention were wrong the sooner the law was altered the better. It was a monstrous thing if a woman who proceeded with due diligence against a husband of substantial means could be kept at arm's length in this way.

LORD MERRIVALE.—That assumes that the Court has no power to allow for the period before decree.

Mr. GRAZEBROOK, for the respondent, submitted that this petition was too late and could not be entertained after a decree of judicial separation, which was based on the old Ecclesiastical Courts' practice. He referred to Brisco v. Brisco (2 Hagg. Consist., 199) and pointed out that under the old practice the question of alimony pendente lite was disposed of at the earliest possible stage. There was no jurisdiction now to hear this petition.

LORD MERRIVALE.—Permanent alimony was substituted by the Matrimonial Causes Acts for the decree in the ecclesiastical courts which fixed the alimony.

LORD MERRIVALE delivered a considered judgment as follows :—

The applicant was petitioner and her husband respondent in a suit for judicial separation instituted in March, 1927. With due diligence after her petition was filed she sought an order for alimony pendente lite, apparently upon sufficient grounds, but there was delay in the interlocutory proceedings, not due to any default in her solicitor, and the suit came to trial in November, 1927, and a decree for judicial separation was made before the interlocutory application had been brought to a hearing. Ten weeks later it was brought on and the learned registrar made no order save that the respondent should pay the wife's costs of the application up to the date of the decree. The wife appeals and asks that directions shall be given for inquiry with a view to such an order as the facts may warrant for payment of alimony pendente lite. In support of the appeal reliance is placed upon the general terms in which the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1924, Rules 57, 58, 59, and 61, direct proceedings in respect of alimony pending suit. It is contended that the suit was not at an end on January 11, inasmuch as the marriage is subsisting and the decree is subject by statute to be reviewed or rescinded in certain events, and it is argued that this case is governed by a decided case of Ver Mehr v. Ver Mehr ([1921] P., 404). Further, there is a suggestion that the right of a wife to maintenance, which is in question, is a substantive right, asserted by this petition for alimony and proper to be enforced irrespectively of the position of this suit. The case for the husband was that after the pronouncing of this decree, which is the final judgment of the Court in the suit, there is no longer any lis pendens, and therefore no such order as is sought can be made. This case of Ver Mehr v. Ver Mehr (supra) does not govern this dispute. That was a wife's suit for restitution of conjugal rights. The order for restitution had not been obeyed, and although no steps had been taken under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1884, the husband was guilty of desertion and of disobedience to a subsisting order, and this decree had the effect of a like decree in the Ecclesiastical Courts, save in so far as the statute of 1884 otherwise provides. What was said was that inasmuch as in the Ecclesiastical Courts the husband cited in such a suit remained subject to the jurisdiction of the Court until there had been obedience to the decree or the decree was discharged the husband was liable. The existing practice of long standing was thus confirmed. The rules of practice which are in question must be construed with due regard to the subject matter and the law relating thereto. The powers of the Court were conferred by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, in sections consolidated in the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925. The Court in all suits and proceedings, other than proceedings to dissolve a marriage, must proceed to act and give relief on principles and rules which in the opinion of the Court shall be, as nearly as may be, conformable to the principles and rules on which the Ecclesiastical Courts acted and gave relief. Under the practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts, as now, two distinct powers existed in respect of enforcement of the husband's duty to maintain his wife. Pending suit for judicial separation the coercive authority of the tribunal was available to secure to the wife means of subsistence and necessary money for costs while the parties were proceeding with the litigation. When the questions between them had been determined by decree the wife, if she were the successful party, might obtain on a new petition a decree to ensure her permanent maintenance according to her husband's means.

The interlocutory proceedings for alimony and costs were coercive means of securing, if need be, by monition and excommunication, that the wife should be heard in the cause. How purely transitory they were appears upon even a slight examination of the text books and the authorities. The older writers described the payments for maintenance as hebdomadal. In case of appeal new provision was obtainable in the Court of Arches. The current expression which described the means of securing money for costs was "taxation from day to day." In Westmeath v. Westmeath (2 Hagg. Ecc. Supp., 1, at p. 73) the answer made to an attempt to secure a taxation after a decree was that the costs were unpaid because of neglect to procure taxation de die de diem while the suit was in progress. While the position of the wife pending a suit for judicial separation remained, in principle, very much the same after 1857 as it was before, her rights, if she were successful in obtaining a decree, were strengthened by definite provisions of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, which gave her, during separation, rights as a feme sole, as well as by statutory recognition of the practice under which she became entitled to a permanent provision for her maintenance.

Under the practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts and ever since, alimony upon judicial separation is ordered to be paid as from the date of the decree. To accept the suggestion that the suit for judicial separation is a pending suit after the decree, would involve the absurd consequence that alimony pendente lite and permanent alimony might be accruing at the same time and indeed a petition in respect of each might proceed simultaneously.

The practice of this Court as illustrated by the order made in the registry rests upon the fact that the process resorted to before decree is a privileged procedure limited by the necessities of the case, and not the exercise of a substantive right such as gives a cause of action.

The necessity which can be so dealt with ceases when the decree is granted. To give a direction now for inquiry as to the wife's maintenance from March to November, 1927, while the litigation proceeded, would be a new departure, and in view of the hardships which often arise where a husband is petitioner it would involve mischievous consequences. The application therefore is refused.

His Lordship made no order as to costs.

REX v. EDITOR OF THE NEW STATESMAN—EX PARTE DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC PROSECUTIONS.*

Contempt of Court—Distinction from criticism—Imputation of partiality.

Observations on the distinction between legitimate criticism of a Judge and such an imputation of unfairness and lack of impartiality as constitutes contempt of Court.

This was a rule nisi calling on Mr. Clifford Dyce Sharp, the editor of the New Statesman, to show cause why he should not be attached for contempt of Court in respect of the following paragraph published in the New Statesman on January 28, 1928, which, it was alleged, was calculated to lower the authority of Mr. Justice Avory and bring him into contempt.

"We cannot help regarding the verdict given this week in the libel action brought by the Editor of the Morning Post against Dr. Marie Stopes as a substantial miscarriage of justice. We are not at all in sympathy with Dr. Stopes' work or aims, but prejudice against those aims ought not to be allowed to influence a court of justice in the manner in which they appeared to influence Mr. Justice Avory in his summing-up. Dr. Stopes found one of her advertisements in the Morning Post suddenly stopped. Accordingly she wrote to the Duke of Northumberland suggesting that Roman Catholic influence was at work. The Duke passed the letter on to the Editor, who chose to regard it as a reflection upon his own honesty—which was patent nonsense—and brought an action. He was awarded £200 damages. The sum is not large, but the principle is important. We do not think the action ought to have been brought. Dr. Stopes' letter was foolish, partly because it is always foolish to write to a proprietor behind a trusted editor's back and partly because it is always foolish to talk of 'Catholic plots'—or of 'Bolshevik plots' for that matter. But Dr. Stopes obviously intended no reflection upon the Editor personally—did not even know who he was. And from what we ourselves know of newspaper practice there could be no injurious reflection upon him, first because he may never have heard of the censoring of the advertisement, and, second, because the suggestion that a man is influenced by Catholic ideas of right and wrong is surely not an 'injurious reflection.' That certain advertisers threaten to boycott any paper which accepts Dr. Stopes' advertisements is a fact for which we can vouch. Their exclusion may therefore be no more than a matter of commercial policy, implying no reflection at all upon an editor—since he may not even know what has happened. The serious point in this case, however, is that an individual owning to such views as those of Dr. Stopes cannot apparently hope for a fair hearing in a Court presided over by Mr. Justice Avory—and there are so many Avorys."

Mr. Jowitt, K.C., and Mr. St. John Hutchinson showed cause for Mr. Sharp; the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. Giveen supported the rule.

Mr. JOWITT said that there was recently tried before Mr. Justice Avory the case of Gwynne v. Stopes, a libel action in which the plaintiff was the editor of the Morning Post. The defendant was Dr. Marie Stopes, who was known as an advocate of birth control. It was unnecessary to discuss that subject beyond saying that on the one side it enlisted the sympathy of those who considered that the welfare of society was deeply bound up with those doctrines, and on the other side it aroused the antagonism of those who thought that those doctrines and the way in which they were inculcated were contrary to morality and even to decency.

He desired to say at once that if, on a fair reading of the paragraph, there was raised the inference, or if there might even be thought to be the inference, that Mr. Justice Avory had deliberately allowed his likes or dislikes to influence him, nothing of the sort was intended or had entered Mr. Sharp's mind. If the paragraph might be thought to bear that meaning he unreservedly apologized both to Mr. Justice Avory and to the Court. What it was intended to convey was that the subject was so controversial that no one who held strong views on one side or on the other could prevent his judgment from being unconsciously influenced by them. Judges were only human and, until we had a sort of "Robot" Judge, being human might be quite unconsciously influenced by their personal views.

MR. JUSTICE SHEARMAN.—These compliments are very interesting, but do they help us?

Mr. JOWITT said that there had been no case of this kind since Reg. v. Gray (16 The Times L.R., 305; [1900] 2 Q.B., 36), and what was there complained of was scurrilous abuse, which could not possibly be called criticism, and in a case in the previous year, McLeod v. St. Aubyn (infra), it had been said that this remedy was now obsolete. He was not there to justify the language of the article; it was infelicitous and far from seemly. But it appeared from the affidavit of Mr. Sharp that it was in fact the last piece of "copy" sent to the printer. It was written in great hurry, and had there been time for reconsideration he had not the slightest doubt that it would not have appeared in those terms at all. But the report of the verdict in Gwynne v. Stopes appeared in the newspapers on a Thursday morning, and the paper went to press on the same day.

It had been said, continued counsel, that when a case was over Judge and jury were given over to criticism, and Jeremy Bentham had said that the Judge presiding over the trial of a case was himself on trial. He repeated that he was not there to justify any allegation of partiality on the part of Mr. Justice Avory, if the Court thought the article bore such a meaning.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—How, if we should think that the only reasonable meaning is the meaning which you repudiate?

Mr. JOWITT.—Still more should I wish to apologize.

Mr. Sharp, in his affidavit, which counsel read, said that he had no personal knowledge of any individual concerned in the case, or in either of the opposing views of birth control, and wrote entirely from a sense of public duty. The affidavit stated:—

"In writing the said paragraph I meant to express the opinion that the feelings of those who believe in birth control on the one side, and those who oppose it on the other, are so strong that it is humanly impossible for anyone, adhering to the one side or the other, to take an entirely unbiased attitude or to express an entirely unbiased opinion, in a case in which these issues were involved. I never meant to suggest any intentional unfairness or bias on the part of Mr. Justice Avory. I realize that the paragraph as it stands might appear to imply reflections upon the judicial integrity of Mr. Justice Avory. I wish unreservedly and completely to withdraw any such personal reflections and to express my deep regret to the Court and to Mr. Justice Avory that, owing to the exigencies of time, such reflections may appear to have been made in the said paragraph."

Mr. JOWITT, continuing, said that in Dallas v. Ledger (4 The Times L.R., 432) it was said that "there was an undoubted right to make comments upon the conduct of Judges or jurors," and a distinction was drawn between comments before trial which might require summary intervention, and comments after trial which, though improper, did not amount to contempt of Court. In the Bahama Islands case ([1893] A.C., 138) a violent attack had been made on the then Chief Justice of the Bahamas. It appeared that a successful litigant before him had sent him a present of pineapples, which he naturally refused. In the Nassau Guardian a letter signed "Colonist" appeared which said this, among other violent criticisms :—

"Search the annals of the bench of every country, of every age, and I defy creation to produce a more noble, more self-denying, and more virtuous exhibition of a tender conscience than was afforded by our Chief Justice in refusing to accept a gift of pineapples ! Some cynic has said : 'Every man has his price.' It is assuring to this community to know that the 'fount of justice' in this colony is above the price of even one dozen pineapples."

The editor refused to disclose the name of the writer of that letter, and the Chief Justice committed him to prison and imposed a fine. The Governor released him, and the Privy Council held that the letter, though it might have been made the subject of proceedings for libel, was not in the circumstances calculated to obstruct or interfere with the course of justice or the due administration of the law, and did not constitute a contempt of Court.

In McLeod v. St. Aubyn (15 The Times L.R., 487 : [1899] A.C., 549, at p. 561) it was said that the power to commit for contempt "is not to be used for the vindication of the Judge as a person," and "committals for contempt of Court by scandalizing the Court itself have become obsolete in this country." He suggested, not that that meant that the jurisdiction had gone, but that the conduct of the public in recent years and the position of the Bench in public esteem were such as to render its exercise unnecessary. In the last case of this kind, Reg. v Gray (supra), the matter was mere scurrilous abuse. In conclusion he repeated, on behalf of Mr. Sharp, his unreserved withdrawal and apology.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL, supporting the rule, said that he did not desire to say much in reply. He did not suggest for a moment that a Judge should be exempt from the criticism which the subject had a right to direct at persons holding public offices, but there was a great difference between criticism and an attack on the fairness of the Judge as a Judge. That was restrained, not from tenderness to his feelings, but because it was of the utmost importance to the administration of justice that public confidence in the impartiality of the Bench should not be impaired. The Bahama Islands case (supra) was not much nearer to this than the Bahama Islands themselves. In Wilmot's "Opinions," at page 255, there was a clear, if rather archaic and stilted, statement of the principle :—

"The arraignment of the justice of the Judges is arraigning the King's justice ; it is an impeachment of his wisdom and goodness in the choice of his Judges, and excites in the minds of the people a general dissatisfaction with all judicial determinations and indisposes their minds to obey them ; and whenever men's allegiance to the laws is so fundamentally shaken, it is the most fatal and most dangerous obstruction of justice, and in my opinion calls out for a more rapid and immediate redress than any other obstruction whatsoever ; not for the sake of the Judges as private individuals, but because they are the channels by which the King's justice is conveyed to the people. To be impartial, and to be universally thought so, are both absolutely necessary for the giving justice that free, open, and uninterrupted current, which it has, for many ages, found all over this kingdom, and which so eminently distinguishes and exalts it above all nations upon the earth."

It was worse, the Attorney-General submitted, to say that a Judge was so steeped in prejudice and bias that he could not try a case of a certain kind fairly than to say that on a particular occasion he had deliberately allowed his private views to influence him.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE, in delivering the judgment of the Court, said that in the opinion of the Court the meaning of the words complained of was quite free from ambiguity. They meant what they said, and said very plainly—namely, that a person who held certain views could not hope for a fair hearing in a Court presided over by the learned Judge who was named.

Mr. Jowitt, in his extremely able argument, had used from time to time phrases beginning with a conditional clause : "If on the fair meaning of the words they mean so and so" ; then he expressed regret and apology. In the Court's opinion there was no room for those conditional clauses. The words meant that in the opinion of the writer it was impossible for a person holding certain views to get a fair hearing before that Judge. If the expressions of regret had ended with those conditions it would have been necessary to take a very serious view of the matter, but before the end that which had been conditional and reserved became unconditional and unreserved, and, indeed, was in that form in Mr. Sharp's affidavit.

The principle which was applicable to those fortunately very rare cases was stated in Reg. v. Gray (16 The Times L.R., 305 ; [1900] 2 Q.B., 36), where, at page 40, Lord Russell, delivering the unanimous judgment of the Court, said :—

"It cannot be doubted . . . that the article does constitute a contempt of Court ; but, as these applications are, happily, of an unusual character, we have thought it right to explain a little more fully than is perhaps necessary what does constitute a contempt of Court, and what are the means which the law has placed at the disposal of the Judicature for checking and punishing contempt of Court. Any act done or writing published calculated to bring a Court or a Judge of the Court into contempt, or to lower his authority, is a contempt of Court."

And a little later, after stating that the contempt there dealt with belonged to the class described by Lord Hardwicke as "scandalizing a Court or a Judge," Lord Russell said :—

"That description of that class of contempt is to be taken subject to one and an important qualification. Judges and Courts are alike open to criticism, and if reasonable argument or expostulation is offered against any judicial act as contrary to law or the public good, no Court could or would treat that as contempt of Court. The law ought not to be astute in such cases to criticize adversely what under such circumstances and with such an object is published; but it is to be remembered that in this matter the liberty of the press is no greater and no less than the liberty of every subject of the Queen."

Applying those canons, and all of them, to the present matter, the Court had no doubt that the article complained of did constitute a contempt. It imputed unfairness and lack of impartiality to a Judge in the discharge of his judicial duties. The gravamen of the offence was that by lowering his authority it interfered with the performance of his judicial duties.

If they had come to the conclusion that that was intended by the writer, who was also the editor, the only proper course would have been to commit him to prison for contempt. But it was right to look at the circumstances. [His Lordship referred to the haste with which the article was written as set out in Mr. Sharp's affidavit.] Although, therefore, the words that were in fact employed seemed to the Court to be free from ambiguity, the Court accepted the explanation and apology, and abstained from committing the respondent.

The COURT ordered and adjudged that he was guilty of contempt. Feeling as they did that if the true analysis of the case had exhibited its graver aspects it must have been punished by committal, in the circumstances they abstained from imposing a fine, but ordered Mr. Sharp to pay the whole costs of the proceedings as between solicitor and client.

1928. Feb. 10.

REX v. EDITOR OF THE DAILY MAIL—EX PARTE FACTOR.*

Contempt of Court — Pending proceeding — Publication prejudicing fair trial — Absence of intention — Proceeding not genuine — No attachment.

A publication made with the clear intention of prejudicing the fair trial of an issue pending before a Court is obviously a contempt of Court and will be punished as such. But where the Court is satisfied that there was no such intention and yet the publication might prejudice a pending trial, the Court will, in considering whether a writ of attachment should issue, take into account the circumstances of the case, and no attachment will be granted unless (inter alia) the Court is satisfied that the pending proceeding is a genuine proceeding, brought and intended to be prosecuted to effect its avowed purpose.

This was a rule nisi for a writ of attachment for alleged contempt of Court against Mr. Walter George Fish, the editor of the Daily Mail, in respect of an article which appeared in that newspaper on December 23, 1927.

The rule had been obtained on behalf of Mr. John Factor, of 91, Jermyn-street, W., who complained that on December 15 an article was published in the Daily Mail which was headed: "'Aristocrat' of the Underworld. 'Varsity Man's 50 Years' Frauds. Jacob Factor's Associate. To Prison Again." The first paragraph of the article of December 15 was as follows:—

"By sentencing a man who calls himself James Montgomery, a bogus solicitor, aged 77, to 12 months' hard labour at the Old Bailey yesterday, the Common Serjeant, Sir Henry Dickens, K.C., has rid society for a time of a leader of the gang of share-pushing pests who, in association with the notorious Jacob Factor, have for several years been defrauding people all over Great Britain."

On December 15 Mr. John Factor issued a writ against the Associated Newspapers, Limited, the proprietors of the Daily Mail, claiming damages for an alleged libel contained in the article in the Daily Mail, in which he had been referred to as "Jacob" Factor. The writ was duly served, and on December 23 the following article appeared in the Daily Mail:—

"JACOB FACTOR AND THE 'DAILY MAIL.'
"A WRIT FOR LIBEL.

"The British public will be surprised to learn that Jacob Factor, the notorious share-pusher, who found England too hot for him after the Daily Mail exposure, is once again back in London. Through his solicitors, Messrs. Zeffert and Heard, of 17, Coleman-street, London, E.C.2, he has issued a writ against the Daily Mail claiming damages for libel.

"We thought we had succeeded in chasing this arch-swindler back to his haunts in America for good, but it appears that he has managed to get into this country again and is living for the time being at 91, Jermyn-street, London.

"The writ is issued in the name of John Factor. His solicitors have informed Messrs. Lewis and Lewis, who act for the Daily Mail in these matters, that he is the Jacob Factor with whom we are familiar. His fraudulent share dealings have been repeatedly exposed in this newspaper and in our courageous contemporary Truth.

"If Jacob Factor imagines that the issuing of the writ will muzzle us while he is engaged on some new deal he is labouring under a misapprehension."

That article, counsel submitted when the rule was obtained, was calculated to interfere with the administration of justice. In his affidavit in support of the application for the rule Mr. Factor said that the contents of the article were false. He did not know Montgomery and had had no business transactions with him of any kind, and his alleged association with Montgomery and his gang was imaginary. The suggestion that the writ was issued to muzzle the Daily Mail was entirely untrue. Mr. Factor said that he intended to press the libel action to trial with the utmost expedition.

Mr. Jowitt, K.C., and Mr. H. M. Giveen appeared to show cause against the rule; Sir Henry Maddocks, K.C., and Sir George Jones supported it.

Mr. JOWITT, in showing cause, said that the case raised a question of some importance with regard to the rights of newspapers to publish articles, which were part of a series of articles, in spite of the fact that a writ had been isued in connexion with those articles, and whether the issue of such a writ effectually sealed the lips of the newspaper until the trial of the action.

* Reported by G. F. L. BRIDGMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Unfortunately, there had been certain migrants to this country who had gone round from house to house seeking to induce credulous and ill-informed persons to buy shares in companies with fine-sounding names which were said to hold lands containing minerals or oil in vast quantities. One of the persons concerned in those activities was named John, or Jacob, Factor. From March, 1926, to the end of July, 1926, there had been published at frequent intervals in the Daily Mail a series of articles dealing with Factor and his activities and accusing him of the gravest frauds which it was possible to imagine. If one tithe of the statements made by the Daily Mail about Factor were true it was quite obvious that it was most undesirable that he should be at liberty. One of his methods was to ask a person in such a position as that of a country parson or schoolmaster to buy ten 4s. shares in one of his companies. Those shares were stated to confer on the buyer the privilege of subscribing at the same price for another 490 shares. After payment of the initial £2 good news was received by the company and was handed on to the shareholders; for example, that oil had been struck, and it was intimated that an additional £98 should be sent immediately to enable shareholders to share in the company's good fortune. In many cases the Daily Mail had shown that the telegrams stating that oil had been struck, or bearing other good news, were nothing more than wicked and fraudulent lies. During the Daily Mail campaign a committee set up by the Government recommended that "share-pushing" should be prevented. No one who had read the evidence could doubt that steps should be taken with that end in view. In spite of the terrible accusations made against Factor between March and July, 1926, he took no steps to clear his character and instituted no proceedings for libel. In July, 1926, this country became too unpleasant for him and he transferred his activities elsewhere.

In December, 1927, Montgomery was convicted at the Central Criminal Court. On December 15 the Daily Mail published the article on which Factor issued his writ. That article dealt with Montgomery, and Factor was mentioned only incidentally. In the statement of claim in Factor's action the innuendo had been drawn with the express object of keeping the action to the issue that Factor was not associated with Montgomery. Factor said in effect: "I will swallow all the camels you have said about me, but I strain at this gnat." The article published by the Daily Mail on December 23, 1927, appeared months before the action could come to trial and in no way referred to Factor's association with Montgomery. Perhaps Factor had thought that the Daily Mail would not be able to justify the allegation of his association with Montgomery, but he was wrong. The newspaper adhered to the statement that Factor was a man of very bad character, and they regretted that the libel action was not sufficiently wide in its issues to bring all the matters to which he (counsel) had referred within its scope.

There was good ground to suppose that Factor had issued his writ, not with a view to the action ever being brought on for trial—that was almost inconceivable—but in the hope that the Daily Mail would have to give him a free hand to do whatever he wanted.

Mr. JOWITT then read the affidavit of Mr. W. G. Fish. In it Mr. Fish said that the business of share-pushing had assumed serious proportions in this country. Shares generally worthless were peddled out in small parcels to credulous persons, often in a humble position of life, who were frequently induced to part with the savings that they had accumulated. Those persons were in many cases completely ignorant of the elementary principles of business caution and were persuaded into buying shares by the dazzling prospects often fraudulently held out to them. When in course of time those prospects were completely falsified, the investors were in many cases reluctant to come forward and make a complaint which would certainly result in an exposure of their own folly, but which would probably not result in a recovery of their money even though it might lead to a conviction.

In those circumstances Mr. Fish submitted that newspapers with a large circulation among all classes of people could perform a very useful public service in putting members of the public on their guard against the activities of share-pushers and in exposing their plans, and it was with that object in view that he pursued the course which he had taken.

He had known of the existence for upwards of two years of John Factor, who, to the best of his knowledge, information, and belief from information supplied to the Daily Mail, was throughout that period a thoroughly undesirable person. He (Factor) had been connected with a large number of companies the object of which had been the sale of plots of land in Arkansas and elsewhere in America and oil shares. At the end of 1925 and the beginning of 1926 the Daily Mail published a number of articles attacking by name certain of those companies and warning the public against investing money in them. Between March 29 and July 24, 1926, the Daily Mail published a large number of articles attacking John Factor under the name of Jacob Factor.

In spite of the gravity of the accusations made in those articles and the frequency with which they had been made in the Daily Mail, Factor had never dared to bring an action with reference to them until he issued a writ with reference to the article which appeared on December 15, 1927. In the statement of claim delivered by John Factor no reference was made to any of the earlier articles.

On March 31, 1926, an American adventurer, whose original name was Baum but who had changed it to Leon Britton—an associate of John Factor in his business of share-pushing—issued a writ against the Associated Newspapers, Limited, claiming damages for libel with reference to an article which appeared in the Daily Mail on March 30, 1926. The innuendo attributed by the statement of claim to the words complained of was "that the plaintiff was a business associate and/or partner with a notorious rogue and swindler and fugitive from justice named Factor in many schemes to defraud the public."

On April 1, 1926, Leon Britton issued another writ against the Associated Newspapers, Limited, for libel contained in an article published in The Evening News on March 31, 1926. The innuendo attributed by the statement of claim to the words complained of was "that the plaintiff was a business associate or partner with a notorious rogue and swindler named Factor, and had aided him in schemes to defraud the public."

On August 9, 1926, another American adventurer, Maurice Singer, who was also an associate of John Factor in his business of share-pushing, issued a writ against the Associated Newspapers, Limited, for a libel contained in articles which appeared in the Daily Mail on May 21 and July 24, 1926, and the Continental Daily Mail on July 24, 1926. The innuendo attributed by the statement of claim to the words complained of was

"that the plaintiff had in the past and was still participating in and/or was and had been privy to or responsible for the sales and dealings with Jacob Factor and/or of the Westminister Finance Company, Limited, in the shares of the company and was still associating with Jacob Factor."

The articles complained of in those three actions were articles dealing with the activities of Factor and his associates. None of those three actions was ever brought to trial. In the case of the first two the defendants obtained an order dismissing the action for non-compliance with orders for security for costs. Singer never proceeded with his action after delivery of a defence pleading justification.

"In fact," continued Mr. Fish, "I am informed and believed that the plaintiffs issued the writs in the hope of muzzling the Press while they endeavoured to complete their fraudulent designs of swindling the public and that as soon as they had done this they left the country, and that it was in these circumstances that they refrained from proceeding with their actions. Having regard to the foregoing, I believe that the writ in this action has been issued in the hope of stopping the Daily Mail and other newspapers from commenting on the activities of Factor. I further believe that it is highly probable that Factor will pursue the same course as that adopted by his associates, Leon Britton and Maurice Singer, in their respective actions and leave this country before this action can be brought to trial, after bringing his activities pendente lite to a successful conclusion."

The statement of claim in the present case, Mr. Fish said, was delivered on January 17, 1928, and it must be many months before the action could be brought on for trial. He submitted that it would be contrary to the interests of justice and of the public that he should be restrained from commenting on Factor and his activities for that length of time. He was authorized by the defendants, the Associated Newspapers, Limited, to state that they intended to justify the allegations complained of, including in particular the allegation of the association between Montgomery and Factor. The writ had been issued not because of the libel which was alleged, but in the hope of sealing the mouths of the newspapers, and in those circumstances the Court ought not to interfere. If, by the issue of a writ, all publications with regard to the person who issued it must cease, it would be easy for fraudulent persons to issue writs to enable them to carry on their mischievous business unharmed by any comments in the Press.

He had not, since the issue of the writ in the action, in any way commented on the question of the association of Factor with Montgomery, which appeared to be the only point in issue in this action, nor did he intend so to do. He desired, however, if the Court thought it proper and expedient, to retain the liberty to expose the past and present activities of Factor if in the interests of the public it should seem desirable so to do. He was informed by the Montreal correspondent of the Daily Mail that Factor had left this country and was on January 23, 1928, in Montreal in connexion with his business activities. He was further informed by that correspondent that since the issue of the writ in the action Factor had granted an interview to the representative of the Quebec newspaper Minier, in which he dealt with he matters in issue in this action.

Factor, continued Mr. JOWITT, was a man of very bad character whose activities ought to be restrained. It was a most useful function of a newspaper to warn the sort of people who would be trapped by his lies. Had it not been for the timely exposure of Factor in the Daily Mail, he and his associates would have got away with a very large sum of money. If he came to England again and took the trouble to issue a writ it boded ill—if he were right in the present matter—for the innocent British public who were seeking new investments for their savings. It was highly desirable that the activities of such a man as Factor should be shown up. There might well be a limit to that doctrine, but, whatever line might be drawn, in the present case the Daily Mail had not committed any contempt of Court.

SIR HENRY MADDOCKS, in support of the rule, said that the Daily Mail had tried Factor in his absence, and had published to the world that he was guilty of all manner of offences. Because he had not chosen to issue a writ the Court was asked to assume that all that had been published about him was true. The fact that the Associated Newspapers, Limited, proposed to justify in their defence to Factor's action made no difference. The question was whether the fair trial of that action had been prejudiced.

The case involved the application of a very serious principle. That principle, which appeared from numerous cases to have existed from time immemorial, had been violated. The course adopted by the Daily Mail was an extreme one. He did not suggest any improper motive, but the Daily Mail had deliberately done what they had done to bring the matter before the Court. They expressed no regret and made no statement that the editor had been unaware of what he was doing. It was stated boldly that Mr. Factor had been attacked by the Daily Mail so often over a period of months that the newspaper was justified in what it had done. The editor's affidavit went further and contained an application to the Court to sanction the continuation of the attacks until the trial of the libel action.

The fact that the person attacked might well be assumed by anyone who had read the attacks on him to be a man of undesirable character, and the fact that the proprietors of the Daily Mail were going to plead justification in the libel action, only emphasized the violation of the principle that a man, whoever he might be and however bad his character might be, was entitled in this country to a trial by a jury who were not biased by anything said outside the Court by one of the parties.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—If you put the principle in that unqualified form, you are forced to say that there are not, nor can there ever be, any circumstances which can justify the continuance of criticisms if the person criticized has issued a writ.

SIR HENRY MADDOCKS.—I do not think that it goes quite to that extent, but the continued criticism must not be calculated to interfere with the trial of the action begun by the writ. There might be a statement which would not direct the minds of possible jurors to the fact that it was connected with the action. That might be unobjectionable.

Counsel added that in the defence which the proprietors of the Daily Mail had filed to Mr. Factor's action they pleaded that the words complained of were true in substance and in fact, but they had not yet condescended to deliver any particulars of justification. They had also denied that Mr. Factor had any credit or reputation and that he had been injured in either of them.

The discretion vested in the Court was very wide, but it must be exercised by applying the long-established principle. Where that principle had been relaxed, as in Reg. v. Payne (12 The Times L.R., 321; [1896] 1 Q.B., 577, at p. 580), it was because the matter written was innocuous, or because the person responsible had not known of it.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—Is it your proposition that, no matter what the true facts may be, no matter what long-continued attempts have been made by a newspaper to exhibit those facts to the public, by the simple process of issuing a writ the person criticized, however guilty and however worthless, can be quite sure of putting an end to criticism?

SIR HENRY MADDOCKS.—I should not attempt to argue that for a moment; but is it to be assumed against the person referred to that he is guilty? The plea of justification has still to be tried and the onus to prove that plea is on the parties who have set it up. Whether the plea of justification is made out is a matter for the jury.

MR. JUSTICE BRANSON.—You say that it is all one whether there is a plea of justification or not.

SIR HENRY MADDOCKS.—Yes. That plea raises an issue which has to be tried by a jury.

Counsel submitted that it did not matter whether or not the alleged contempt of Court referred to the subject-matter of the action if it were calculated to prejudice its fair trial—Higgins v. Richards (28 The Times L.R., 202). If the rule was discharged in the present case it would mean that a newspaper need only plead justification to a libel action, and then it would be free to continue its adverse comments on the plaintiff.

The Daily Mail had referred to Mr. Factor as an arch-swindler, and that meant that he was a criminal.

MR. JUSTICE BRANSON.—He did not seem to mind very much.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—He was most patient.

SIR HENRY MADDOCKS replied that the value of criticism depended on the critic. Commendation by some persons was condemnation, and criticism in some quarters was advertisement. If every one who was criticized in the Daily Mail took action the Courts would require to be enlarged. The fact that Mr. Factor had taken no action with regard to the earlier articles did not amount to an admission by him that their contents were true. If the Daily Mail had taken seriously half of what they had said about Mr. Factor their proper course was to have informed the Director of Public Prosecutions. Neither the newspaper nor the Director had taken any action. The advisers of the Daily Mail knew quite well that a plea of justification was valueless unless it was supported by particulars.

The Daily Mail had thrown down a challenge to the Court regarding how far they could go with impunity. There was no evidence that Mr. Factor had been engaged in any fresh deals in this country, but they nevertheless associated him with Montgomery. Was he to be pursued for ever because he had once been engaged in share-dealing operations?

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE, in delivering the considered judgment of the Court, said that the principle on which the Court acted in cases of this nature had been clearly stated in many cases. It was necessary to refer only to a few. In Reg. v. Payne (12 The Times L.R., 321; [1896] 1 Q.B., 577, at p. 580) Lord Russell said:—

"The applicant must show that something has been published which either is clearly intended, or at least is calculated, to prejudice a trial which is pending."

And again at page 581, quoting Lord Justice Cotton in Hunt v. Clarke (5 The Times L.R., 650; 58 L.J., Q.B., 490), he said:—

". . . there should be no such application made unless the thing done is of such a nature as to require the arbitrary and summary interference of the Court in order to enable justice to be duly and properly administered without any interruption or interference."

A publication made with the clear intention of prejudicing the fair trial of an issue pending before a Court was obviously a contempt of Court, and would be punished as such. But where the Court was satisfied that there was no such intention, and yet the publication was one which might conceivably prejudice a pending trial, the circumstances of the particular case must be taken into account. The nature of the proceedings which were pending, the conduct of the parties, the time, the manner, and the locality of the publication in relation to the time, the mode, and the locality of the trial had all to be considered, and the Court must be satisfied that a case for its "arbitrary and summary interference" had been made out.

Some of those considerations had been mentioned in the case of Rex v. Blumenfeld—Ex parte Tupper (28 The Times L.R., 308). There were others also. The Court must be satisfied that the pending proceeding, the trial of which it was alleged was being prejudiced, was a genuine proceeding, brought and intended to be prosecuted to effect its avowed purpose. Otherwise no attachment would be granted.

The editor of the Daily Mail had contended that the present case was one in which the writ for libel was not issued by Factor with the genuine intention of proceeding to trial and clearing his character of the aspersions cast on it by the article of December 15, 1927, but was issued to enable him to procure immunity from further attacks while the action was pending. It appeared from Mr. Fish's affidavit that, from March 29, 1926, to July 24, 1926, the Daily Mail published a series of articles attacking the applicant under the name of "Jacob" Factor. The language was unequivocal. It included such expressions as "smooth-tongued thief," "arch-swindler," "out-and-out-swindle," "fleecing the public," "career of fraud," "robbing the unwary," and "confidence dodge." Those attacks ceased only when Factor left the country.

Factor, however, took no proceedings on any of them, defamatory though all of them undoubtedly were. Nor had he, in the proceedings now pending, made any complaint of any of those charges made against him. On the contrary, in his statement of claim his complaint was most carefully confined to the allegation that he was carrying on his frauds in conjunction with Montgomery. In other words, his complaint was not that it was said of him that he was defrauding people all over Great Britain, but only that he was doing so in association with Montgomery. The Court found it impossible to believe that an action so framed could have been launched in order that a jury might vindicate Factor's character and award damages for the injury done to it—the avowed and legitimate object of an action for libel.

That view was emphasized by the fact that the article of December 23, 1927, was full of defamatory matter, and yet no writ for libel had been issued in respect of it. It was also emphasized by the language of Factor's affidavit in support of the rule, which again was carefully framed to deny specifically only so much of the allegations complained of in the alleged libel as charged an association of Factor with Montgomery.

The Court was not satisfied that the article of December 23—coming as it did, after a long series of similar articles, being but a repetition of charges already often made against Factor and not complained of, and avoiding, as it did, any further mention of the alleged association of Factor with Montgomery—was calculated to prejudice the trial of the only issues which Factor had chosen to raise—namely, that of his association with Montgomery and of the damages which he should obtain if that issue were found in his favour.

In those circumstances the case was not one in which the Court would intervene. On the contrary, to adopt an expression employed by Mr. Justice Phillimore in Rex v. Blumenfeld—Ex parte Tupper (supra), if half of what the Daily Mail had said about Factor (which had not been complained of by him) were true, it was very much for the public benefit that his unmasking should not be delayed.

The rule would be discharged with costs. But the discharge of the rule was not to be taken as authorizing the Daily Mail to publish further and different charges against Factor up to the trial of the action, if it should be proceeded with.

DUCKER v. REES ROTURBO DEVELOPMENT SYNDICATE, LIMITED.

INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. SAME.*

Revenue—Income-tax—Excess profits duty—Profits of trade—Syndicate for development of patented invention — Agreement with foreign company for grant of licence and option of purchase—Exercise of option of purchase for sum in cash—Whether a profit of trade or the realization of a capital asset—Finding of Special Commissioners affirmed—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Sched. D, Case I.

A syndicate formed to work and develop a group of English and foreign patents carried on business mainly by granting licences to manufacturers at royalties. Certain foreign manufacturers, however, refused to take licences, unless they were also given an option of purchase exercisable within a given period. The syndicate entered into a contract with an American company to grant it a licence to use and work the syndicate's American patents, with an option of purchase thereof. The company exercised its option of purchase and paid to the syndicate the sum of £15,898 for the purchase of the American patents out and out. The syndicate having been assessed to income-tax and excess profits duty upon this sum, the Special Commissioners found that the profits made on the sale of the patents were profits of the syndicate's trading.

Held, that as the Special Commissioners had not misdirected themselves in law and had in effect found the sum received for the patents to be a receipt of the syndicate's business in contrast to the realization of a capital asset, and as there was evidence to support this finding, their decision must be affirmed.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (43 The Times L.R., 796) reversed.

These were two appeals from orders of the Court of Appeal (43 The Times L.R., 796) reversing orders of Mr. Justice Rowlatt, who affirmed decisions of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts, to the effect that the respondent company was liable to pay income-tax and excess profits duty upon a sum of £15,898.

The question was substantially the same in each case, and was whether, for the purposes of the taxation of the profits of the respondents' trade or business, a sum received by the respondents for the disposal of certain foreign patent rights was to be taken into account as a receipt of their trade or business, or was to be treated as a realization of a capital asset and, consequently, not liable to tax.

The respondent company was formed in 1906, and proceeded to acquire, under an agreement of October 22, 1906, the British patent rights in respect of an invention relating to centrifugal turbine and similar pumps, of which one Edmund Scott Gustave Rees was the inventor, and which became known as the Rees Roturbo pumps; and also a two-thirds share of the foreign patents in respect of the invention, the inventor, Mr. Rees, retaining the other third share.

The respondent company was formed at the instance of the inventor, Mr. Rees, primarily for the purpose of taking over the existing patents and any future development patents based on the Roturbo principle, and for the purpose of providing additional working capital for the company which manufactured the pumps. The manufacturing company was at first Thomas Parker and Co., Limited, to whom the respondents granted an exclusive licence under the agreement of October 22, 1906. But in 1908 a new company, the Rees Roturbo Manufacturing Company, Limited, was formed, with the inventor, Mr. Rees, as managing director, to take over the business of Thomas Parker and Co., and that company had since that date carried on the whole manufacture of pumps in the United Kingdom, and the sale of pumps in the United Kingdom and elsewhere, except as regarded countries for which exclusive licences had been granted to other concerns, or where the foreign patents had been sold.

Throughout the respondent company's existence its assets had consisted entirely of the group of patents relating to the original invention or to the improvement or development of it, and of investments.

Foreign patents in regard to the invention were granted for many foreign countries. The development of the patents by the granting of manufacturing licences was always the main business of the respondent company, but the possibility of the sale of foreign patents or rights had always been contemplated by the company. The evidence showed that foreign manufacturers usually required to be given an option to purchase the patent rights as a condition of agreeing to take a licence.

* Reported by H. B. Hemming, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By an agreement of March 15, 1912, the respondent company and Mr. Rees (who still owned a one-third interest in the foreign patent rights) granted to the Manistee Iron Works Company an exclusive licence to manufacture and sell the patented articles in the United States and Canada for the unexpired terms of the patents in consideration of a cash payment of £10,000 and royalties of 10 per cent. on the selling price, with a guaranteed minimum, coupled with an option, exercisable within fixed dates, to purchase the United States and Canadian patents for a lump sum.

The Manistee Company paid the £10,000 but not the minimum royalties, and ultimately, by a supplemental agreement of January 23, 1917, the Mainstee Company was excused royalties up to January 1, 1917, and its option was changed into one to purchase the United States patents only for a sum of £26,500. The Manistee Company exercised its option, and the respondent company received £15,898 as its share of the purchase price, which was written off the value of the patents. That was the sum in dispute in this case.

The Special Commissioners decided that the profits on the sale of patents arose in the course of the company's business and were chargeable to income-tax and excess profits duty.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt affirmed the decision of the Special Commissioners, but the Court of Appeal, by a majority (the Master of the Rolls and Lord Justice Sargant, Lord Justice Scrutton dissenting), reversed the decision of the Judge.

The Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.), the Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.), and Mr. R. P. Hills appeared for the appellants; and Mr. Latter, K.C., Mr. J. H. Stamp, and Mr. J. H. Bowe for the respondents.

LORD BUCKMASTER, in giving judgment, said that the view of the Court of Appeal was that the sum in respect of which the respondents had been assessed was part of the capital assets of the company and ought not to be brought into the account for income-tax. The company was formed in 1906 for the general purpose of purchasing and acquiring patents and for the special purpose of acquiring particular patent rights from Mr. Rees, the inventor, who retained a one-third share in the foreign patents in respect of his invention. It was one of the purposes of the company to improve, manage, develop, or sell or otherwise deal with any part of the property and rights of the company. The company acquired several foreign patents in connexion with the Rees invention and, as regarded its patent rights in the United States, it granted the Manistee Company a licence to use the patented articles with an option to purchase, and that option was exercised.

Although the company preferred to grant licences and to retain the patents in its own hand it always contemplated the possibility of the sale of its foreign patent rights. The contention of the company was that the sale to the Manistee Company was a solitary disposition of part of its capital assets and that the purchase price was not a trade receipt.

He thought that it was undesirable in cases of that kind to attempt to repeat in different words a rule or principle which had already been found applicable and which had received judicial approval. In Californian Copper Syndicate v. Harris (5 Tax Cas., 159, at p. 166), the Lord Justice-Clerk, in considering that class of case, said that the question to be determined was :—

"Is the sum of gain that has been made a mere enhancement of value by realizing a security, or is it a gain made in an operation of business in carrying out a scheme for profit making ?"

That principle was approved by the Privy Council in Commissioner of Taxes v. Melbourne Trust, Limited (30 The Times L.R., 685; [1914] A.C., 1,001) and was, he thought, the right principle to apply. Two questions arose in this case : (1) Did the Special Commissioners in the exercise of their powers properly direct themselves in accordance with that test ? (2) Did they in fact find that this purchase money was a trade receipt ? It was suggested that the Special Commissioners, who had delayed their decision in this case until after Mr. Justice Rowlatt had given judgment in a somewhat similar case of Collins v. Firth-Brearley Stainless Steel Syndicate (9 Tax Cas., 520), had been misled by some language of Mr. Justice Rowlatt into applying the wrong test, and that subsequently his decision had been reversed by the Court of Appeal. But Mr. Justice Rowlatt in that case had upset the finding of the General Commissioners, which was in favour of the taxpayer, and the ground of the decision of the Court of Appeal was that the finding of the General Commissioners was a finding of fact and ought not to have been upset.

He thought that the Special Commissioners did mean to find that the sum received from the Manistee Company was a receipt of the company's business, as the Crown contended. It was impossible to say that the Special Commissioners had wrongly directed themselves, or that there was not ample evidence to support their finding.

The other noble and learned Lords concurred.

Chan. Div. (Russell, J.) 1928. Feb. 9.

REIGATE CORPORATION v. SURREY COUNTY COUNCIL.*

Highway—Main road through tunnel—Tunnel out of repair—Annual payment by Council towards cost of repair—Local Government Act, 1888 (51 and 52 Vict., c. 41), ss. 11 (2), 97.

The Reigate Corporation were liable for the repair of all the highways within their district repairable by the inhabitants at large. Tunnel-road was a main road running through a tunnel. It was necessary to repair the tunnel, and the question was whether the cost of the repair was part of the cost of the repair of the road towards which the Surrey County Council was bound to make an annual payment within s. 11 (2) of the Local Government Act, 1888.

Held, that the walls and roof of the tunnel were necessary to keep the road open, and might properly be said to be part of the road, and that even if the walls and roof were not part of the road yet their repair and maintenance were necessary to the repair and maintenance of the road, and the costs of such repair and maintenance were costs within the meaning of s. 11 (2) of the Local Government Act, 1888.

The question raised by this special case related to a road at Reigate called "Tunnel-road," which ran north and south from London-road into the Market-place, Reigate. The road was some 290 yards in length and for a distance of about 56 yards it ran through a tunnel. The tunnel walls and roof consisted of brick, the roof being arched. The soil above the crown of the arch was about 20 feet deep.

Tunnel-road was constructed in 1823 by Earl Somers on, through, and under his own lands—namely, Castle Hill. It was constructed as a private road and the tunnel, with its walls and roof, was constructed at the same time. At that time an ancient highway, a footway, ran along and across part of Castle Hill. This footway passed over the extreme southern end of the tunnel, having on its southern edge the south parapet wall of the tunnel. Tunnel-road continued to be a private road until 1858, in which year it would appear to have come under the control of the Turnpike Trustees as a result of a bargain with Earl Somers. According to the facts as alleged in paragraphs 11, 12, and 13 of the special case, Reigate on September 11, 1863, was created a municipal borough, and the Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of that borough were incorporated by charter. On August 21, 1865, the Corporation resolved to adopt the Local Government Act, 1858. On June 4, 1866, the Corporation, by virtue of the powers conferred upon them by section 41 of the Local Government Act, 1858, entered into an agreement with the Turnpike Trustees whereby the Corporation undertook the maintenance and repair of the road, including the walls of the tunnel and banks, and the agreement contained a provision for its termination on 12 months' notice given by either party. No such notice was given, and the agreement continued in force until the expiration of the Turnpike Trust in 1881. After the Local Government Act, 1888, came into force until January 9, 1923, Tunnel-road was treated as a district assisted road, the Surrey County Council making voluntary contributions under section 11 (10) towards the cost of its maintenance and repair. No repairs were during this period made to the walls or roof of the tunnel. The Tunnel-road became a main road on January 9, 1923; and on October 15, 1923, the Reigate Corporation, in pursuance of section 11 (2) of the Act of 1888, claimed to retain the powers and duties of maintaining and repairing it. The Surrey County Council thereupon became liable to make to the Corporation an annual payment "towards the costs of the maintenance and repair, and reasonable improvement connected with the maintenance and repair of such road."

In 1924 it became necessary to carry out, at a cost of £317, certain repairs and works to the tunnel.

The substantial question for decision was whether the costs incurred by the Reigate Corporation in keeping the roof, walls, and parapets of the tunnel in repair were costs within the meaning of section 11 (2) of the Local Government Act, 1888.

Since February 16, 1922, the Corporation had been owners of all the land on each side of the road and over the tunnel, with the exception that they did not own the property on the eastern side of the road from the southern end of the tunnel to the Market-place. On the soil over the tunnel there was a cottage, erected about the year 1867, which was now the property of the Corporation. In the walls of the tunnel there were doors and gates leading into vaults, owned by the Corporation, which led out of the tunnel in and under the adjacent soil.

Mr. Maurice Fitzgerald appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. R. A. Glen for the defendants.

Mr. Justice Russell delivered the following considered judgment:—

The Corporation contend that the walls and roof of the tunnel are part of the road, having been constructed simultaneously with the road and as part and parcel of it. Alternatively they say that if the walls and roof of the tunnel do not form part of the road they are works which it is necessary to maintain in order efficiently to maintain and repair the surface of the road, and the cost of such maintenance is properly part of the cost of the maintenance and repair of the road.

The Council, on the other hand, say that the walls and roof of the tunnel cannot be said to be and are not part of the road, nor are they works erected for the protection of the surface of the road, or for any other purpose than the support of the land above. They say that the case is simply one of a highway having been dedicated with an existing inconvenience attached thereto, and that the authorities establish the proposition that all repairs required to be done to such an existing inconvenience must be done by its owner, that is, by the Corporation as the owner of the adjacent land which it supports.

A subsidiary point was also urged—namely, that in no event could the Council be liable to repair the southerly portion of the tunnel which supports the ancient footpath.

I will first of all deal with the main point. There is no direct authority that I can find or that has been cited to me in relation to highways running through tunnels, and no doubt much must depend upon the facts in each case. Here the landowner made the road on his own land, in part running through it by means of a tunnel. Simultaneously he erected the brick walls and roof. These ensure that no part of the soil (which would otherwise form the walls and roof of the tunnel) can fall on to the surface of the road. The fall of large quantities of soil would choke up and obstruct the road; even the risk of the fall of smaller quantities would deter people from using the road.

There is authority for the view that a wall supporting a road made on the slope of a hill forms part of the roadway, Reg. v. Inhabitants of Lordsmere (2 The Times L.R., 623). On the same principle I can see no logical reason for holding that a wall whose purpose is to keep the soil on the higher levels of the slope from coming on to the road should not also be held to be part of the road. It is suggested that the case of Attorney-General v. Staffordshire County Council (21 The Times L.R., 139; [1905] 1 Ch., 336) is an authority to the contrary. I do not so read it. There the road was cut on the side of a hill and had walls on each side. The decision was simply that upon the evidence in the case neither the upper nor the lower walls were out of repair, and that the Court would not make any order as to what steps the road authority should take for the purpose of keeping their roads in repair. There being no authority which prevents me from so holding, I am prepared to hold and do hold that the walls and roof of the tunnel which were erected simultaneously with the making of the road, and which operate to keep and are necessary to keep the surface of the road free from that which would or might otherwise obstruct it, may properly be said to form part of the roadway.

If I am wrong in this, another view is open. If the walls and roof are not part of the road, yet they may constitute something, apart from the road, which it is necessary to maintain and repair for the purpose of maintaining and repairing the road ; something which if allowed to get into disrepair may bring about the obstruction and disrepair of the highway. In other words, the case is analogous to Sandgate U.D.C. v. Kent County Council (15 The Times L.R., 59), the repair and maintenance of the walls and roof of the tunnel corresponding to the repair and maintenance of the sea wall and groynes in that case. Here, in my opinion, the maintenance and repair of the tunnel walls and roof are necessary for the maintenance and repair of the road, even though the walls and roof form no part of the road ; and the costs of such maintenance and repair are costs within section 11, subsection (2), of the Local Government Act, 1888.

I can find no support in the authorities cited for Mr. Glen's proposition that the walls and roof of this tunnel must be regarded as an inconvenience subject to which the road was dedicated as a highway, and that the owner of the inconvenience must repair it. The cases cited by him seem to me to have no bearing upon, or relation to, a case like the present one. He cited several authorities in support of his contention, and the principal one and the real basis of his proposition appeared to be Tarry v. Ashton (1 Q.B.D., 314). All that was decided in that case was that the owner of a heavy lamp attached to his house and projecting over the highway was liable in damages to a passer-by upon whom, owing to its being out of repair, it fell ; and this was held upon the footing that it was his duty to keep in repair the lamp which for his own purpose he kept projecting over the highway. In Fisher v. Prowse (31 L.J., Q.B., 212) it was no doubt held that a highway may be dedicated subject to existing obstructions, such as cellar flaps and steps, and that the owner of the obstruction is not liable for damages caused by it, provided that he maintains it in its original condition as to repair and as to extent of obstruction. Nor, as was pointed out by Mr. Justice Denman in Warner v. Wandsworth Board of Works (53 J.P., 471), is the road authority bound to remove the obstruction. But nowhere in the authorities cited do I find any justification for the view that the walls and roof of this tunnel constitute an inconvenience or obstruction subject to which the highway was dedicated. As already indicated, I take the view upon the facts of this case that they either form part of the highway or are necessary for the maintenance of the highway.

There remains for consideration a subsidiary point raised on behalf of the Surrey County Council, in regard to that portion of the southern end of the tunnel over which the old footpath runs. That arises under section 97 of the Local Government Act, 1888, which runs thus : "Nothing in this Act with respect to main roads shall alter the liability of any person or body of persons, corporate or unincorporate, not being a highway authority, to maintain and repair any road or part of a road." The contention is that Earl Somers having in 1823 tunnelled under an existing highway, the old footpath, he thereupon became liable ratione nocumenti to repair that part of the tunnelled road which went under the old footpath, and that that liability is preserved by section 97 and rests with his successors in title to the soil—namely, the Corporation. The answer to this appears to me to be that section 97 does not preserve the liability ratione nocumenti in the present case, because the Corporation are not only successors in title to Lord Somers but are also a highway authority. Their liability to repair that portion of the tunnel does not arise ratione nocumenti, but arises in the same way as their liability in regard to the rest of the tunnel.

I accordingly declare that the defendants are liable to make an annual payment towards the costs incurred by the plaintiffs from time to time in keeping the roof, walls, and parapets of the said tunnel in repair, and I direct judgment to be entered for the plaintiffs for the sum of £317 without costs.

SIMEONS AND COMPANY, LIMITED v. SHARLES.*

Bankruptcy — Reputed ownership — Sale of goods by bankrupt before bankruptcy—Delivery not taken by purchaser up to date of receiving order—Claim by trustee of bankrupt's property—"Possession, order or disposition of bankrupt"—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (4 and 5 Geo. V., c. 59), s. 38 (c).

A bankrupt, before the date of the receiving order, had sold goods and handed over delivery orders to the purchasers upon payment made. The purchasers did not attempt to take delivery of the goods, which were in store, until after the date of the receiving order, and delivery was then refused upon the instructions of the bankrupt's agent, by whom the delivery orders had been signed, and in whose name and to whose order the goods were held in store. The trustee in bankruptcy claimed that the goods were in the possession, order, or disposition of the bankrupt at the date of the receiving order, and formed part of the bankrupt's estate.

Held, on the facts, that the goods were not in the possession, order, or disposition of the bankrupt in such circumstances that he was the reputed owner thereof within the meaning of s. 38 (c) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, and did not form part of the bankrupt's estate.

In this action the plaintiffs, Messrs. C. Simeons and Co., Limited, claimed the delivery of 200 cases of vacuum flasks or payment of their value, and damages for their detention, in the following circumstances :—Between August 3 and September 7, 1927, the plaintiffs purchased the flasks from Messrs. C. Melin and Co. Upon payment being made for the goods Messrs. C. Melin and Co. handed to the plaintiffs delivery orders, signed by the defendant Mr. Leslie Smith, Messrs. C. Melin and Co.'s agent, and addressed to the superintendent of the Free Trade Wharf, London, in respect of the cases of flasks comprised in the purchase. On September 29, 1927, the plaintiffs applied to the Free Trade Wharf Company, Limited, for the 200 cases of vacuum flasks to be transferred to their name. This was refused by the

* Reported by CHARLES CLAYTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Wharf Company on the ground that they had written instructions from the defendant Mr. Smith not to accept or honour any delivery orders issued by him in respect of the 200 cases of flasks.

Mr. Smith had issued these instructions in consequence of a communication from Mr. Eugene Durand, who traded as Messrs. C. Melin and Co., that he had filed his petition in bankruptcy. The defendant pleaded that he claimed no interest in the cases of vacuum flasks other than the sum of £296 18s. 8d. for charges and costs incurred by him in respect of the Customs clearance, freight, and warehousing of the goods, and he alleged that the right to the flasks was claimed by the present claimant, Mr. Frederick C. Sharles, the trustee in the bankruptcy of Mr. Eugene Durand.

Mr. Frederick C. Sharles had been appointed trustee of the bankrupt's property on October 5, 1927. He claimed that the goods, the subject of the action, were in the possession, order, or disposition of the bankrupt at the date of the receiving order, September 24, 1927, and that as trustee of the bankrupt's estate, and subject to the discharge of any lien thereon to which the defendant might be legally entitled for charges for freight and warehousing, he could claim them as forming part of the bankrupt's estate.

An order was made by a Master directing that all further proceedings in the action against the defendant Mr. Smith should be stayed, and that an issue should be tried between the plaintiffs and the claimant to decide whether the cases of vacuum flasks were the property of the claimant as against the plaintiffs.

Mr. Tindale Davis and Mr. Harry Atkins appeared for the plaintiffs ; Mr. Edward Clayton, K.C., and Mr. Phineas Quass for the claimant.

MR. JUSTICE FINLAY delivered the following considered judgment :—

This case, which is an issue directed by a Master, raises a question under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, section 38 (c), which relates to reputed ownership. By that section the property of a bankrupt is to comprise, among other things, "all goods being, at the commencement of the bankruptcy, in the possession, order, or disposition of the bankrupt, in his trade or business, by the consent and permission of the true owner, under such circumstances that he is the reputed owner thereof."

The facts, as to which there was little, if any, dispute, are as follows :—The bankrupt, Mr. Eugene Durand, had for many years carried on business as a merchant under the name of C. Melin and Co. On September 24, 1927, a receiving order was made against him on his own petition, and his bankruptcy accordingly dates from that date. He had for some time done a considerable business with the plaintiffs in vacuum flasks. These flasks were forwarded from Germany, 40 cases a week, and it was the practice of Mr. Durand to sell these cases to the plaintiffs, sometimes before and sometimes after their arrival in this country. The cases were shipped from Hamburg and the method of business was this : the bill of lading was made out to order and the charges were paid by Mr. Leslie Smith, the forwarding agent employed by Mr. Durand for the purpose of dealing with these goods. The goods on arrival were stored at the wharf in the name of and for the account of Mr. Smith, and when Mr. Durand had negotiated a sale to the plaintiffs he either in writing or by word of mouth asked Mr. Smith for a delivery order. He would then hand it over to the plaintiffs against payment for the goods. Payment was made in one or two instances by cheque, but more usually by acceptances at four months' date. It was the practice of the plaintiffs to leave the goods, sometimes for considerable periods, in store at the wharf, the charges for rent, for insurance, and for carriage on delivery being borne by the bankrupt. With regard to the five consignments of goods material to this case, the goods, duly identified, had been bought by the plaintiffs and payment had been made by acceptance or cheque before the date of the bankruptcy.

It was thus in the power of the plaintiffs at any time to obtain delivery of the goods to them by presenting the delivery orders, but, in fact, delivery orders had not been presented at the wharf in respect of these consignments at the date of the bankruptcy. The result was that the goods were still at the wharf to the order of Mr. Leslie Smith. After the bankruptcy the plaintiffs endeavoured to obtain the goods, but the wharfingers, acting on Mr. Smith's instructions, refused to part with them. It was admitted before me that the property in the cases had passed to the plaintiffs, with the result that section 38 (a) has no application, but it was contended that the trustee in bankruptcy was entitled to claim the cases by virtue of section 38 (c). A considerable number of authorities were cited to me upon the proper construction of this clause. I desire to quote only two passages. In Ex parte Wingfield—In re Florence (10 Ch.D., 591) Lord Justice James, at page 594, said : "The section must, however, be read, as the similar provision in the bankruptcy statutes from the time of James I. has always been read, with some attention to common sense. It has always been construed as meaning this : that if goods are in a man's possession, order, or disposition, under such circumstances as to enable him by means of them to obtain false credit, then the owner of the goods who has permitted him to obtain that false credit is to suffer the penalty of losing his goods for the benefit of those who have given the credit. But, if no such credit has been given, then the maxim applies, Cessante ratione cessat ipsa lex."

In In re William Watson and Co.—Ex parte Atkin Brothers (20 The Times L.R., 727 ; [1904] 2 K.B., 753) Lord Justice Vaughan Williams, delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal, at page 757, said this : "The doctrine of reputed ownership was first embodied in the Bankruptcy Act, 21 Jac. I. It has been couched in various words in the successive bankruptcy statutes, but this principle has run through them all, and the statement of Lord Redesdale in Joy v. Campbell (1 Sch. & Lef., 328, at p. 336) (a case which has been approved and acted on again and again : see Belcher v. Bellamy, 2 Ex., 303, Hamilton v. Bell, 10 Ex., 545, and many other cases), that the true owner must have unconscientiously permitted the goods to remain in the order or disposition of the bankrupt, justifies this statement. This does not mean, as we understand it, that he must have intended that false credit should be obtained by the bankrupt's apparent possession of the goods, but it does at least mean that the true owner of the goods must have consented to a state of things from which he must have known, if he had considered the matter, that the inference of ownership by the bankrupt must (observe, not might, or might not) arise : see Hamilton v. Bell (supra), Gibson v. Bray (8 Taunt., 76), Ex parte Bright 10 Ch.D., 566). The question for us then is, Did Messrs. Atkin consent to the possession by the bankrupts, Messrs. Watson, under such circumstances that customers were entitled to assume that Messrs. Watson were the owners of the goods in their trade or business ? "

These passages lay down the general principles applicable, and it is necessary, applying those principles, to decide upon the facts of each particular case, as it arises, whether the reputed ownership section applies. In this case I have come to the conclusion that I ought not to hold that these goods of the plaintiffs were in the possession, order, or disposition of the bankrupt in such circumstances that he was the reputed owner thereof. I do not doubt that Mr. Leslie Smith must as between himself and the bankrupt be regarded as an agent of the bankrupt, nor do I doubt that, for the purposes of the matters which I have to consider, goods may be in the reputed ownership of a principal although physically in the possession of an agent, but the essential point seems to me to be this, whether the result of what has happened would be that persons having dealings with the parties must draw the inference that the goods were the property of the bankrupt, with the result that the bankrupt would be enabled by reason of such reputed ownership to obtain false credit.

Here the goods were physically in the possession of the wharfingers and were held by them to the order of Mr. Leslie Smith. The delivery order, which is of course a document of title, was in the hands of the plaintiffs. On these facts it would, I think, be wrong to hold that the plaintiffs have by their conduct in any way induced a belief that these goods were in the possession, order, or disposition of the bankrupt in such circumstances that he was the reputed owner thereof. Many variations in the facts may be put, and some were suggested in the course of the argument before me. My decision must necessarily be limited, as every decision on a question of this sort must be limited, to the facts of the case before me, and on those facts, applying the principles of law as I understand them, I decide in favour of the plaintiffs.

K.B. Div. (Rowlatt, J.) } 1928. Feb. 21.

MERCHANTS' MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED v. LIVERPOOL MARINE AND GENERAL INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Insurance (Marine) — Total loss—"Immediate consequence"—Chain of causation.

The plaintiffs, having undertaken the reinsurance of a risk under a marine policy, reinsured their own risk with the defendants, the policies being subject to the following conditions :—"In the event of the vessel not being at the place of destination on the date of the expiration of the policy the insurance shall continue in force till the end of the day when the vessel arrives at her first place of destination.

"If the insured object is in a damaged condition at the time when the insurance expires . . . the risk shall continue for the immediate consequence of such damage until the object without unnecessary delay has been repaired or sold."

On the date of the expiration of the original policy the vessel was on a voyage and had not reached her first place of destination, and after that date and before reaching such place she grounded on a reef but got off and proceeded. When she reached her first place of destination, it was found that she was badly damaged and temporary repairs were effected. She then proceeded but began to leak badly and had to be run ashore to prevent sinking and was subsequently sold as a wreck. The original insurers paid as for a total loss, and the plaintiffs, having paid them, claimed against the defendants.

Held, that the loss was not an "immediate consequence" of the damage caused by the original stranding, as the chain of causation was broken when the vessel reached her first place of destination, which was a place of safety, and that therefore the action failed.

The plaintiffs in this case claimed under a policy of reinsurance, dated March 9, 1925, on a Norwegian steamer, the Maradal.

Mr. Raeburn, K.C., and Mr. Simey appeared for the plaintiffs ; and Mr. A. T. Miller, K.C., and Mr. H. Atkins appeared for the defendants.

Mr. RAEBURN, in opening, said that the steamer Maradal was insured against marine perils for a period from January 1 to December 31, 1925. The insurers reinsured their risk with the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs reinsured their risk with the defendants. The policies were subject to conditions, of which two were here material :—

"In the event of the vessel not being at the place of destination on the date of the expiration of the policy the insurance shall continue in force till the end of the day when the vessel arrives at her first place of destination.

"If the insured object is in a damaged condition at the time when the insurance expires . . . the risk shall continue for the immediate consequences of such damage until the object without unnecessary delay has been repaired or sold."

At the beginning of January, 1926, the Maradal was on a voyage from the Baltic to South Africa with a cargo of timber. Her first place of destination was Luderitz. On the evening of January 9, before she reached her destination, she grounded on the Angra Reef during a fog. After a short time she got off and went into Luderitz. It was then found that she was badly damaged. There were no facilities for repair at Luderitz, and a diver was sent from Cape Town and temporary repairs were effected to enable the vessel to proceed to Cape Town. She started, but, though the weather was good, she began to leak badly again, and to prevent sinking she was run ashore on Possession Island. Subsequently she was sold as a wreck for £500. The original insurers paid as for a total loss, and the plaintiffs, as reinsurers, paid the original insurers and claimed over against their reinsurers, the defendants, who refused to pay. The plaintiffs accordingly brought this action.

Mr. RAEBURN submitted that in view of the first of the above conditions the policies continued in force until the Maradal reached Luderitz on January 10, and the vessel was therefore in a damaged condition at the time when the insurance expired. By the second condition the policies were still in force at the date of the loss. The risk was to continue for the immediate consequences of the original damage until the vessel was repaired, and the word

* Reported by W. B. THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"repaired" in that connexion must mean "completely repaired and made able to do her work again." As the original damage was the "proximate cause" of the final loss within the meaning of those words in Reischer v. Borwick (10 The Times L.R., 568 ; [1894] 2 Q.B., 548) and Leyland Shipping Company, Limited v. Norwich Union Fire Insurance Society, Limited (34 The Times L.R., 221 ; [1918] A.C., 350), the loss was an immediate consequence of the original damage, the insurances continued, and the claim was properly paid.

Mr. MILLER said that, though but for the original injury the loss might have never occurred, the vessel on entering Luderitz had reached a place of safety. By sending her out to sea again to make her way to Cape Town the insured exposed her to new perils which were not covered by the policy.

Evidence having been called, Mr. MILLER submitted that the defendants were not liable. The policy was an English one incorporating provisions of the Norwegian Insurance Plan, and should be interpreted in accordance with English law. The second of the clauses referred to had been construed by the Norwegian Supreme Court in a case in which a ship had been damaged and had put into a port of refuge and, while lying at that port after the expiration of the policy, had been wrecked by a storm. The Court held that the ultimate loss was not an immediate consequence of the original damage and that the underwriters were not liable. The question was not whether the loss was proximately caused by the original damage ; for the real cause was the fact that the vessel was lying at a point in the port of refuge where she was exposed to the subsequent storm.

The two clauses should not be read together. One dealt with place and the other with condition ; one spoke of the expiration of the policy and the other of the expiration of the insurance. The second clause merely declared the existing law.

On the facts of the case the ultimate loss here was not caused proximately by the original damage ; the vessel reached her destination safely, and could have stayed there in safety until thoroughly repaired. Someone there, however, decided to send her out again after temporary repairs, and the interposition of that act of volition distinguished this case from the Leyland Shipping Company case (supra) and Reischer v. Borwick (supra) relied on by the plaintiffs.

Mr. RAEBURN replied.

MR. JUSTICE ROWLATT, in giving judgment, said that the case turned on the terms of the original insurance. The vessel was at sea on the day on which the policy would have run out, and by the continuation clause the policy was continued and was still in force when the vessel stranded. She was got off, and went into harbour at Luderitz and there anchored. A diver was brought from Cape Town and he succeeded in locating various holes, which he patched. The result was that the vessel appeared watertight ; they tried her up and down, and as she seemed safe they concluded that she might go on to Cape Town. After she had been out some hours water began to come in, and it rapidly became worse, so that the position became desperate and the vessel had to be run ashore.

The question was whether on these facts the defendants were liable. The fact that the first insurers had considered themselves liable and had paid the claim did not affect the right of the defendants to dispute their liability. Mr. Miller's first point was that the vessel was not in a damaged condition at the time when the insurance expired—namely, on December 31. But when the policy was continued under the continuation clause, the insurance went on with all its incidents and he (his Lordship) thought the point a bad one.

The real point of the case was the allegation that, after leaving Luderitz, the vessel was lost as an immediate consequence of the damage which she had suffered by the original stranding. When she was in the harbour at Luderitz the water was under control and she was safe. The people there might have taken out all the cargo and inspected the tank cover and margins ; they might have secured further assistance and more elaborate salvage appliances. But as it was, she was no longer in danger of sinking in deep water as a consequence of the casualty which she had suffered.

He passed no judgment on the wisdom of what in fact was done, but the vessel had evidently suffered some injury to her structure which, in spite of the repairs which had been effected, developed further during the voyage from Luderitz. No doubt she was lost owing to weakness caused by the casualty, but in his view the loss was not an "immediate consequence" of that casualty. The cases which had been cited, Reischer v. Borwick (10 The Times L.R., 568 ; [1894] 2 Q.B., 548) and Leyland Shipping Company, Limited v. Norwich Union Fire Insurance Society, Limited (34 The Times L.R., 221 ; [1918] A.C., 350) were quite different, for in those cases the injured vessel never reached a place of safety. Here the vessel had reached a place of safety but was lost when on a new voyage which set going again the chain of causation which had stopped when she reached that place of safety. Judgment, therefore, must be given for the defendants.

A stay was granted on the usual terms.

Prob., Divorce, and Adm. Div. (Hill, J.) } 1928. Feb. 14.

BLANCHARD v. BLANCHARD.*

Divorce—Judicial separation—Wife's petition—Husband's adultery—Powers of Court—Limited discretion to refuse decree—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 and 21 Vict., c. 85), ss. 16, 31—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1923 (13 and 14 Geo. V., c. 19), s. 1—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 49), ss. 178, 185.

Where a wife petitions for judicial separation on the ground of adultery proved to have been committed by her husband since July, 1923, the Court has only a limited discretion to refuse a decree of judicial separation. Such a refusal must be based on some legal ground that constituted an absolute or discretionary bar according to the practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts, or upon the ground that the suit is not brought bona fide but merely for some collateral purpose. The Court's opinion that the relief to be granted should be dissolution of marriage and not judicial separation is not a legal ground for refusing the relief prayed for.

This was a petition for judicial separation by Mrs. Elizabeth Annie Blanchard, née Edwards, of Windmill-road, Brentford, who was married on May 24, 1909, to William Benjamin Blanchard, a lift engineer, at the Bristol Register Office, on the ground of his adultery with a Mrs. Hawkins since 1926 at an address at Twickenham and at other places. The petition also contained charges of cruelty which were abandoned. By his answer the respondent denied the charges of cruelty but admitted the allegations of adultery.

Mr. H. W. M. Potter (with him Mr. Walter Frampton) appeared for the petitioner; Mr. G. C. Tyndale and Mr. Wavell-Paxton for the respondent.

The petitioner in her evidence said that her husband was the co-respondent in a case in which Mrs. Hawkins was divorced by her husband on the ground of her adultery with Mr. Blanchard.

MR. JUSTICE HILL.—Have you any religious scruples against divorce?—No. I don't expect my husband will return to me, but I have no desire for a divorce.

Why do you prefer a judicial separation to a divorce?—The reason is that I am not going to let Mrs. Hawkins marry my husband. She has ruined my home.

Evidence was given that the respondent was now living with Mrs. Hawkins and they wished to marry each other.

Mr. TYNDALE said that in section 16 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, it was provided that "a sentence of judicial separation may be obtained" on certain grounds, but that in regard to divorce (section 31) "in case the Court shall be satisfied on the evidence that the case of the petitioner has been proved [saving connivance, condonation, or collusion] the Court shall pronounce a decree declaring such marriage to be dissolved." The same difference, "may" and "shall," was found in the re-enacting statute, the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925.

MR. JUSTICE HILL.—Could the Ecclesiastical Courts refuse a decree if adultery were proved and there was no absolute bar?

Mr. TYNDALE said that the bona fides of the petitioner could have been taken into account under the old procedure. The present case, he submitted, was an abuse of the process of the Court, and his Lordship had a discretionary power to refuse a decree of judicial separation, until the wife amended her petition to one for divorce. He referred to Matthews v. Matthews (3 Sw. & Tr., 161), in which it was held that in a suit for judicial separation, brought by the wife on the ground of cruelty, lapse of time, though not an absolute bar, yet taken in connexion with other circumstances, e.g., a deed of separation, might show that the application was not made bona fide for the protection of the wife, but for some collateral purpose; and, if the Court was satisfied of this, the petition ought to be dismissed.

MR. JUSTICE HILL.—A judicial separation may be sought bona fide for the protection of the wife. Here she does not need any physical protection, and she would get better financial terms by dissolution.

Mr. TYNDALE.—Yes. Alimony under a judicial separation is only for joint lives. I know of no more pressing question of public policy than that of allowing people in these circumstances to right the wrong, as far as possible, by marrying.

MR. JUSTICE HILL.—Up to now I have always treated myself as having no discretion in this matter, and my impression is that I cannot refuse the relief asked for.

Mr. POTTER addressed the Court for the petitioner.

In this case the petitioner wife seeks a decree of judicial separation on the ground of the respondent husband's adultery. The adultery proved was subsequent to 1923 and the petitioner is therefore entitled to a decree of dissolution, but she seeks only for judicial separation. There was no doubt about the adultery. The respondent left the petitioner and was found living with another woman. The husband of that woman petitioned for divorce, naming the present respondent as co-respondent; a jury found the adultery proved and a decree nisi was pronounced. The respondent and the other woman are still living together. The other woman wants to marry the respondent as soon as the decree against her is made absolute. The respondent, if he is able to do so, wants to marry the other woman. It is probable that they will continue to live together, whether they can marry or not. But the petitioner does not ask for dissolution and, as the law stands, dissolution cannot be decreed unless she asks for it. In cases such as this, I have thought it my duty to inquire why judicial separation and not dissolution is asked for. My reason for so doing is twofold: (1) that, according to law, judicial separation is not to be decreed when it is sought not for the protection of the wife, but for some wholly collateral purpose; and (2) that I am well aware of the evils likely to result when persons bound by the marriage tie are living apart with no real prospect of reconciliation.

In the words of Sir F. Jeune in Johnson v. Johnson ([1901] P., 193), "it is a terrible thing that people should be going about the world, neither married nor unmarried, possibly liable to contract fresh and illegal matrimony, and certainly exposed to temptation to commit adultery," and, as is said in the majority report of the Divorce Commission, and said with the high authority of Lord Gorell, "if a party sues, where there is ground for divorce, the remedy claimed is not one which concerns the party alone, but also the parties, the children, the State, and the interests of morality."

Inquiring the reason why judicial separation and not dissolution is sought, I have found sometimes that it is religious conviction, the belief that, whatever the law may say, marriage is indissoluble. Such a conviction, conscientiously held, I am bound to respect. That I do not share it is apparent from the fact that I administer a law based on the contrary view. Sometimes the reason is ignorance of the law, the mistaken idea that, if she divorces her husband, a wife cannot obtain maintenance from him, whereas, in fact, the powers of the Court in regard to maintenance are greater upon a decree of dissolution than upon a decree of judicial separation. Sometimes, the wife has the hope that some day her husband will return to her and thinks that there will be a better chance of this if the marriage is not dissolved. But sometimes the motive is much less worthy. It is the desire to punish the husband, by making it impossible, during the wife's lifetime, that he should marry anyone else, and to punish the other woman by making it impossible that she should marry the husband. With that desire, so wanting in charity and, it may be, so cruel in its effects, there can be no sympathy. Especially now, when a wife is entitled to relief on the ground of a single act of adultery, I think it shocking that it should depend on her caprice to inflict upon the husband so severe a punishment.

Following my practice, I asked the petitioner why she sought judicial separation and not divorce. She was quite frank about it. She had no religious objection to divorce. She had no expectation or wish that her husband should return to her. Her reason was this : the other woman had ruined her home, and she did not want her husband to marry that woman. In these circumstances I greatly regret that the law gives me no power to decree dissolution. Parliament has not acted upon the recommendation of the Divorce Commission that the Court should have a discretion in these cases. But the petitioner has been grievously wronged by the respondent, and, though she needs no protection against interference by the respondent, yet she wants orders for permanent maintenance and for custody, and this Court has no power to make such orders, except upon a decree. Maintenance and custody are, at any rate, part of the purpose for which the suit is brought. It is not brought wholly for a collateral purpose, as in the case I was referred to, Matthews v. Matthews (3 Sw. & Tr., 161). As the point was argued, I ought to add that, upon the facts of this case and upon the law as it stands, the petitioner, in my opinion, has a right to a decree of judicial separation. The Court has a discretion, but not an unlimited discretion. The discretion must be exercised upon some legal ground. That in my view is the effect of section 185 (1) and (2) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925. It is true that the word used in section 185 is "may," whereas in section 178, which relates to dissolution, the word used is "shall." The same difference in wording is to be found in the repealed sections of the Act of 1857. The reason of the difference in 1857 was, I think, this : As regards judicial separation the Act merely conferred upon the Divorce Court, with certain additions, the jurisdiction formerly exercised by the Ecclesiastical Courts as regard divorce a mensa et thoro and directed the Divorce Court to act upon the principles on which the Ecclesiastical Courts had theretofore acted. But as regards dissolution, the Act created a new right and defined in detail the conditions to which it was subject—the absolute and discretionary bars to a decree. No such detailed definition of the right to judicial separation and its conditions was necessary. They were already regulated by the rules of the law which had prevailed in the Ecclesiastical Courts. The Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, deals with the two heads of relief in the same way. Section 178, as to dissolution, defines the absolute and discretionary bars and uses the word "shall"; section 185, as to judicial separation, uses the word "may," but, instead of setting out the absolute and discretionary bars, requires the Court to be satisfied that "there is no legal ground why the petition should not be granted." The legal grounds are to be found in the cases, and they include the absolute and the discretionary bars, and the ground that the suit is not brought bona fide, but only for some collateral purpose.

But it is not a legal ground that the Court thinks it would be better that the relief to be granted should be dissolution and not judicial separation. Before the Act of 1923, when the only marital offence of the husband was adultery, the wife could obtain no relief other than a decree of judicial separation. But, if there were no legal ground against it, she had a right to that decree. That right has not been taken from her because an alternative remedy was given to her by the Act of 1923.

His LORDSHIP pronounced a decree of judicial separation, with custody of the younger child of the marriage, and costs.

Prob., Divorce, and Adm. Div. (Hill, J.) } 1928. Feb. 7.

FLEMING AND ANOTHER v. HORNIMAN AND ANOTHER (FLEMING INTERVENING).*

Conflict of Laws—Domicile—Abandonment of domicile of choice—Revival of domicile of origin—Reacquisition of domicile of choice only by renewed residence with intention to settle—Domicile sole issue in contesting grant of probate—Costs.

If a man abandons his domicile of choice he can reacquire it only by fulfilment of the same conditions of intention and residence as those by which he previously acquired the same domicile of choice.

There is no authority for allowing costs out of the estate in a probate action to an unsuccessful party who merely seeks to prove, in the case of a will duly executed by a testator of sound disposing mind, that the testator had a domicile under the law of which that party would take a large part of the testator's estate in opposition to his wishes. The costs should follow the event in such a case.

This was a probate action concerning the estate, valued at £137,400, of the late Mr. James Albert Fleming (in this report called the testator), formerly of Estancias Flemington, Gualeguay, Argentina, and of St. James's-court, W., who died in London on July 28, 1926, a widower, in his seventieth year. By their statement of claim the plaintiffs, Mr. Juan Enrique Augustin Fleming and Mrs. Maria Carmen Hawtrey, claimed as the lawful children of the testator to be entitled to share in his estate. They said that he died intestate and domiciled in the Argentine Republic, and asked the Court to pronounce against an alleged will dated July 24, 1926, and to revoke probate thereof, granted in common form on September 16, 1926, to the defendants. They further said that the alleged will was not duly executed in accordance with the law of the testator's domicile, and was not a valid testamentary disposition according to Argentine law, by which they were entitled to four-fifths of the estate.

The defendants, Mr. John Eric Horniman, of 76, Sloane-street, W., and Mr. James Dey, of Carew-road, Northwood, as executors of the will of July, 1926, denied that the testator died intestate or domiciled in the Argentine, and claimed probate of the will in solemn form, together with a declaration that he died domiciled in England. The intervener, Mrs. Elizabeth Knox Fleming, widow of the testator's brother, the late Mr. Samuel Fleming, the London police magistrate, had adopted the defence, but she died on December 28, 1927, at her flat in St. James's-court.

* Reported by WILLIAM LATEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Ernest Charles, K.C., and Mr. T. Bucknill appeared for the plaintiffs ; Sir Ellis Hume-Williams, K.C., and Mr. H. W. Barnard for the defendants ; and Mr. Cotes-Preedy, K.C., and Mr. Noel Middleton for the intervener's executor.

The onus being on the defendants, Sir Ellis Hume-Williams opened.

The testator, who was the son of a Yorkshire miller who left £60,000 at his death, went to the Argentine in 1881, said counsel, and in the course of a 45 years' residence there amassed a large fortune. He married an Argentine lady and on her death in 1918 relations became strained between him and the plaintiffs, his children, owing to the partition of his property which followed, according to Argentine law. He wound up all his affairs in Argentina and left that country finally in April, 1926. At the time of his death in London in the following July he had disposed of all his property in South America except £250.

When it became necessary to submit himself to an operation in July, 1926, he made a will, which was duly executed, in which he declared himself of English nationality and that his children were well provided for. He left to certain members of the Fleming family £17,000, and among other bequests was one of £50,000 to his sister-in-law, Mrs. Elizabeth Knox Fleming, in trust for her life, with a reversion to her three daughters. He also left the residue to Mrs. Elizabeth Fleming, but she committed suicide towards the end of 1927. The operation took place two days after the will was executed, and he died on July 28.

Among the witnesses called was the Rev. Basil Phillips, who attested the signature of the will. He said that he often met the testator during the few months preceding his death, and the testator often said that he was going to leave the Argentine for good and settle down in England. Once he said : "I'm an Englishman, and intend to remain an Englishman to the end of my life."

Miss Suzanne Fleming, a niece of the testator, said that when he visited England in 1925 he declared his intention of disposing of his properties in South America and coming home for good. In 1926, after he had returned from the Argentine, he said that he wished to be buried at Angmering, Sussex, where, in fact, he was buried.

Other evidence was given on the subject of the testator's domicile at the time of his death.

Much of the evidence for the plaintiffs related to the alleged insane hatred entertained by the testator for his son and daughter from very early days, but Mr. Tweedie, the solicitor who took instructions for the testator's will in England, said that he saw no signs of delusions or insane hatred against anybody. The testator was a man of a kindly disposition. It was absolutely ridiculous to suggest, moreover, that he was not of sound mind. In his (the witness's) 50 years' experience he had never known a more capable and clearer-minded man than the testator.

Before the close of the case for the plaintiffs, Mr. Charles intimated that he would not rely on any of the pleas save domicile.

Mr. Justice Hill.—I should have held that there was no ground for suggesting that the testator was suffering from an insane obsession against his children. His accusation against them of robbing him might merely be the picturesque view of a man born and bred in England, whose dislike of the Argentine law affecting the property of married people might easily have been transferred to a hatred of the individuals who benefited by it.

Sir Ellis Hume-Williams read a letter of the testator to show that he had a tender and anxious affection for his children.

Mr. Douglas Fleming, a beneficiary under the disputed will, and a cousin of the plaintiff, of Lightcliffe, near Halifax, said that in June, 1926, the testator, when lying ill in bed, said to him, in reference to income-tax matters : "I am domiciled in the Argentine." The testator said that he was coming to England every year for as many months as his doctors would allow. He said that he had no desire to remain in England, because he did not want to be in a country where it was always raining.

Other essential parts of the evidence are contained in the judgment.

On the conclusion of the arguments, Sir Ellis Hume-Williams said that under the Wills Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict., c. 114), whether the testator's domicile was English or Argentine, the executors were entitled to have the will proved in common form, and the question of administration of the estate would come afterwards. He submitted that the question had only been brought before the Court on pleas which ought never to have been put on the record.

Mr. Justice Hill delivered a considered judgment as follows :—

The testator died on July 28, 1926, in London. He had executed his last will on July 24, 1926. It disposed of all his property. The defendants, the executors, proved that will in common form. This action was begun on January 5, 1927, by the two children of the testator, his son and daughter. Neither of the children takes any benefit under the will of July 24, 1926. By their allegations in the statement of claim the plaintiffs attacked the will as a whole. As to this part of the case the plaintiffs wholly failed. The due execution was proved, the testator's knowledge and approval were proved, and the case as to insane delusions wholly broke down and was very properly withdrawn by Mr. Charles. It follows that the will is entitled to probate in solemn form.

By the statement of claim the plaintiffs further allege that the testator died domiciled in the Argentine Republic. The importance of this in administration lies in the fact that by Argentine law the testator had no power to dispose of four-fifths of his estate except to the plaintiffs ; it must pass to them whatever the wishes of the testator. The defendants allege that the testator died domiciled in England. The plaintiffs claim a declaration of Argentine domicile. The defendants claim a declaration of English domicile.

The testator was born in 1856 near Halifax, Yorkshire, of English parents. His domicile of origin was therefore in England. In 1881 he went to the Argentine and lived there until early in 1926, except that he and his wife and children came to England for a visit in 1899 ; he himself came to England for a visit in 1923 and again in 1925. On March 3, 1926, the testator sailed from Buenos Aires, and, after breaking his journey at Madeira and Portugal, reached England on April 26, 1926. He remained in England till the day of his death. All his life he retained his British nationality.

Two questions are to be determined : (1) Did he acquire a domicile of choice in the Argentine ? The onus of this is on the plaintiffs. (2) If he did, did he abandon that domicile of choice before his death ? If he did, had he reverted to his domicile of origin ? The onus of proving abandonment is on the defendants.

On the first question the matter to be decided is this, as stated by Lord Justice Bowen in In re Marrett

(3 The Times L.R., 707; 36 Ch.D., 400, at p. 408): "When a man takes up his residence in a new country the problem which has to be solved is whether there has been such a fixed and settled intention permanently to reside in the new country as, concurring with the actual residence there, amounts to an adoption of a domicile of choice instead of the domicile of origin." The authorities speak of the change animo et facto. The animus is the fixed and settled intention permanently to reside. The factum is the actual residence.

On the second question the law is thus stated in Dicey under Rule 8: "A domicile of choice . . . is retained until both residence (factum) and intention to reside (animus) are in fact given up, but when once both of these conditions have ceased to exist it is abandoned as well in law as in fact." A mere intention is not enough so long as the person continues to remain within the territory of his domicile of choice. (See In the Goods of Raffenel, 32 L.J., P. and M., 203.) To leave that territory is not enough, so long as the person continues his intention to reside permanently in the country of his domicile of choice (In re Steer, 28 L.J., Ex., 22). But when the intention is formed and the residence is brought to an end, or the residence having been brought to an end the intention is formed, then there is a complete abandonment of the domicile of choice. The intention here meant is a formed intention to leave the country of the domicile of choice for good.

I would only add this. The authorities often speak of a person leaving the country of his domicile of choice sine animo revertendi. That, I take it, means without the intention of returning to it as his permanent home. If a man intends to give up his domicile of choice and in fact gives up his residence there, it is not inconsistent with an abandonment that he has it in mind that he may or will pay a temporary visit to that country at some future time.

For instance, a man with a domicile of origin in England acquires by residence and intention a domicile of choice in France. He then leaves France with the intention to give up permanent residence there but has it in mind that he will make his home in England but occasionally go to the French Riviera for a holiday. Udny v. Udny (L.R., 1 H.L. Sc., 441) settled the point that a domicile of choice may be abandoned though no intention has been formed to choose another domicile in any particular country. In such a case upon the abandonment there is an intended reversion to the domicile of origin. It follows, I think, that if a person leaves the country of his domicile of choice with the fixed and settled intention to give up residence there and thereupon reverts to his domicile of origin, and afterwards changes his mind and forms the intention of returning to that country as permanently residing there, he reacquires a domicile of choice there, only when, with that intention, he again resides there; or, in other words, a domicile of choice must be acquired over again by fulfilment of the same conditions as before.

In this case I have come to the conclusion upon the evidence (a) that the testator acquired a domicile of choice in the Argentine. And, I think he retained it until he left the Argentine on March 3, 1926. But, (b) in my judgment the evidence makes it quite clear that he abandoned it when he so left the Argentine. The intention was already fixed and settled, and with that intention he in fact ceased to reside. In my judgment when the ship on which he travelled set sail from Buenos Aires he reverted to his domicile of origin; and, thereafter, he acquired no new domicile in the Argentine or in any other country. Even if I am wrong in concluding that the intention was already fixed and settled when the testator sailed from Buenos Aires, it became fixed and settled between the time of his reaching England in April, 1926, and his death in July, 1926.

As to my first conclusion, domicile of choice: in 1893 the testator married an Argentine lady in Mendoza, where he was then residing. Between that date and the death of his wife in 1918 he had become the owner of three properties, La Choza, Las Acacias, in Rosario, and Flemington. All these places are in the Argentine. From 1905 he lived at Flemington, which he appears to have named after himself. By 1918 he had built up an important business and owned a great quantity of livestock. In 1918, during his wife's fatal illness, he bought a double grave in the British section of the cemetery at Buenos Aires. His wife was buried there, and as late as 1925 he expressed the wish that if he died in the Argentine he should be buried there.

In 1902, writing to his father, he hoped that he and his family would come home, that is to England. But in 1908 his father died. The testator was dissatisfied with the provisions of his father's will and became, or already was more or less, estranged from his brothers and sisters in England. No further visit was paid to England during his wife's lifetime, and in 1915 (page 35 of the correspondence), the testator is writing to his wife's sister: "I have abandoned my own family and have attached myself to yours." This lady in evidence said that the testator always said that his country was the Argentine Republic and that "we were his family"; her evidence shows that this was said before 1918. Similarly, Miss Carmen Villaneuva, speaking of the years 1917 and 1918, states that the testator said that the Argentine Republic was his adopted country and that he had formed his family circle there. This finds corroboration in the letters of the testator after 1918, in which he says that it had been his intention to found a family.

It further receives some corroboration from the fact that in formal documents as late as February, 1926, the testator described himself, or was described, as "domiciled" in the Argentine or in places in the Argentine. I refer to the certificate of revaccination in 1923 and the certificate of identity in 1925 and to the power-of-attorney executed by him on February 13, 1926. These documents are in Spanish. I refer also to his passport issued on February 25, 1926. I attach more weight to the passport which was issued by the British Consul than to the documents in Spanish, for the evidence of the Argentine lawyers makes it doubtful whether the word domiciliado is not used both to express legal domicile in the strict sense and also merely a fixed place of residence or business. The certificate of revaccination and the certificate of indentity at any rate speak of the testator as domiciliado not in the Argentine Republic, but in a particular place, Gualeguay in the first, and Buenos Aires in the second.

Putting all these things together, I think the proper conclusion is that before his wife's death in 1918 the testator, residing in the Argentine, had formed a fixed and settled intention of permanently residing there. Having so acquired an Argentine domicile of choice he rightly described himself in February, 1926, as of Argentine domicile, for up to that time he had not abandoned that domicile of choice.

I now pass to his abandonment of that domicile. Following upon the death of his wife the testator became completely estranged from his children. By Argentine law they were entitled on their mother's death to half the property acquired during the marriage. The legal proceedings which ensued ended in a partition agreement under the sanction of the Court. The testator was profoundly dissatisfied both with the law which gave the children half of the property which his industry had acquired and with the conduct of the children in the proceedings and the working out of the partition. He thought he was unjustly treated. His undertakings were undoubtedly greatly hampered.

The result was that the testator, who had already lost his wife, was by the end of 1920 completely and finally estranged from both his children. Thereafter he frequently speaks of himself in his letters as leading a lonely, miserable life. In the partition the estate La Choza had passed to the son, after the testator had raised a large sum of money to clear it of a mortgage. The testator still retained the estates Las Acacias and Flemington, but both were subject to mortgage. By the end of 1921, as his letters indicate, he was trying to sell Las Acacias and forming the hope that he might ultimately realize all his property and then leave the country altogether. But there were at this time a commercial crisis and a heavy fall in prices, which made sale difficult; and for the time being he had to get his mortgage debt renewed for another three years at an increased rate of interest. So things continued during 1922.

In June, 1923, he sold Las Acacias with its stock. Part of the price of the land was left on mortgage until June, 1926. He then writes of his intention to run home (that is, to England) for a trip, and "on my return I shall then try and sell this property (that is Flemington) and close my connexion with the Argentine and intend spending the rest of my life seeing my relations and friends," &c. But in another letter he adds: "Much depends upon the impression I may receive at home."

He came to England in July, 1923, and there became on friendly terms with his English relatives. He returned to the Argentine in September. His letters in the autumn of 1923 and early 1924 show that he hoped to sell Flemington and return to England "definitely" in 1924 "in order to enjoy for the few years of life that remain to me the pleasure of seeing my brothers and sisters and the few old friends still remaining." But owing to the commercial crisis and political troubles it was still difficult to sell. He wrote in the same sense during 1924 and in the latter part of the year began to remit money to England for investment there. He was further advised by the doctor that he must not winter again in the Argentine. He ends the year 1924 by saying that if his property is sold he hopes "to leave definitely and come to England for the summer and pass the winter in some warmer climate."

He writes in the same sense in 1925. He again made a visit to England in that year and there became on the most friendly terms with some of his relatives, and especially with his brother Mr. Samuel Fleming and his family. Before he left the Argentine in the spring of 1925 he wrote: "If the sale comes off I shall leave the country for good." That was the sale of Flemington. He states his intentions very clearly on page 257 of the correspondence, April 2, 1925. He has "decided to chuck it and return to my ain folk. Am close on 70 years of age and ailing, so much to my regret I have to close down the page of my life in the Argentine." At the same time he contemplates that should his health improve he may pay his friends in the Argentine a surprise visit. Flemington was not sold that year in the spring, and in April, 1925, the testator left with a return ticket and came to England, and in September, 1925, was back again in the Argentine. He was accompanied by an English niece, Miss Halstead, now Mrs. Dumal. The letters in the autumn of 1925 show that he was still of the same mind—to realize his property in the Argentine and then leave the country for good. In December, 1925, he sold Flemington and the stock. The price (over £80,000) of the estate was paid in January, 1926, and transferred by the testator to London. For the stock a promissory note was given due May 4, 1926.

In December, 1925, he received news of the death of Mr. Samuel Fleming. It is said that the letters show that this altered all his plans and made him give up the idea of leaving the Argentine for good. I do not so read the letters. The death of Mr. Samuel Fleming merely determined him to leave early in 1926. He had been hesitating as to whether he ought not to be in the Argentine in June, 1926, for the final payment of the money secured by mortgage on Las Acacias. He now takes steps to leave sooner and to entrust to others the winding-up of the business still to be done in the Argentine. I refer to page 321 of the correspondence, December 24, 1925: "My camp is sold and in a short time expect to get all ready for my return to England definitely," and page 326, on January 5, 1926: "I am tied down to a business still unfinished but hoping to finish very soon. My last business transaction should conclude on June 24, so if I cannot come before then I am hoping to be with you about the end of July next to remain definitely at home." See also page 331. By the end of January, 1926, he had made up his mind not to stay on till June. On January 30, 1926, he writes: "I am arranging to leave authorization to people here to conduct my business for me as well as they can, and hope no difficulties will arise that will oblige me to return again to the Argentine." Accordingly, on February 13, 1926, he executed a power-of-attorney to his lawyer, Dr. Spangenberg, to execute a receipt for payment and discharge of the mortgage upon Las Acacias. This power-of-attorney recites that the testator executes the power-of-attorney "owing to the fact that he has to leave the country definitely to take up his residence in London." On February 28, 1926, he makes arrangements for the collection of the remaining money due to him in the Argentine, including that due on the promissory note and for the transfer to London of the balance less certain gifts to named persons.

Besides all this, he did other things which show his intention to sever his connexion with the Argentine. He had in December resigned his membership of the Foreign Residents' Club in Buenos Aires, and on leaving he wrote to resign his membership of a Lodge of Freemasons at Buenos Aires. He made a number of parting gifts, for instance, to the British Hospital at Buenos Aires. He arranged for gifts of money to several people, including his lawyers, and Mr. Haxell, a friend in Buenos Aires. He discharged his last outstanding account. Before he left he went through his papers and destroyed all except such as he took with him. He took with him his books. That is the evidence of the niece, Mrs. Dumal. In fact, after he left, his agents did collect the moneys still outstanding, and before his death all moneys had been transferred or were in course of transfer to London. He, with his niece, left Flemington on February 23, 1926, and sailed from Buenos Aires on March 3, 1926.

He thereupon gave up residence in the Argentine in fact, and had carried out the intention so long entertained, "to realize all I have and leave the country altogether."

On February 13, 1926, being still in the Argentine, he executed a holograph will dealing only with the assets that he then had in the Argentine. He had made other holograph wills before. It is apparent that he thought the Argentine law of succession applied to his property in the Argentine, and he was anxious to dispose of the one-fifth which that law left him free to will away from his children. The execution of this will is in no way inconsistent with his intention to leave the Argentine for good in March; and it is significant that having deposited this will with Mr. Haxell, by his letter of February 25, 1926, he asks Mr. Haxell "to send him the will by post to London once all my business is finished in the Argentine."

A good deal of evidence was given by witnesses here and in the Argentine. It does not lead me to a conclusion as to the testator's intention other than that to be derived from the letters and documents. As to the Argentine evidence Mr. Patterson of the Buenos Aires branch of the testator's bankers, the London and South American Bank, confirms that conclusion, and so does Dr. Spangenberg, called for the plaintiffs, who said: "On his departure he said that he was leaving the country, but that if his health improved he would return on a visit."

Dr. Carraoza's evidence that on leaving he said, "Hasta pronto," which is, translated, "We shall soon meet again," and which I still think might also be translated: "To our meeting soon," is a slender fact on which to found any conclusion. It expressed a hope which might equally be fulfilled by Dr. Carraoza paying a second visit to England, or the testator paying a visit to Buenos Aires.

Miss Leonor Villaneuva said that on leaving the testator said: "He had to be back in Buenos Aires in June, and at the commencement of the winter in England he might possibly go to South Africa and from there go on to Buenos Aires." I think her recollection must be in fault as to June. He was told to avoid winter in the Argentine, and he was not going to arrive in England till the end of April. An intention to return in June is quite inconsistent with the letters of February and March. The letters before and after March show that he did not intend to spend winters in England and did contemplate a trip to South Africa. And the letters also show that he did contemplate that he might at some future date pay a visit to the Argentine.

The evidence called before me as to the testator's declarations of intention when in England in 1923 and 1925 to his niece, Miss Halstead, and her evidence as to the time she was with him in Buenos Aires in 1925 and 1926 support the conclusion to be drawn from the letters.

There remains the evidence as to statements made by the testator in England in 1926. They show that his intention was fixed and settled. I refer to the evidence of the Reverend Mr. Phillips and of Miss Halstead (Mrs. Dumal) and Miss Suzanne Fleming. They come to this, that he intended to stay in England to the end of his days but would have to make trips abroad because of the climate, and directed that he was to be buried in Angmering churchyard. He was making arrangements for a trip to South Africa, sailing in August.

Mr. Douglas Fleming said that he spoke of going from South Africa to Buenos Aires and returning to England via Madeira in the following spring. He may have done so, though Nurse Crawford who was to accompany him knew only of a trip to South Africa. But if he did contemplate going on to Buenos Aires, he contemplated no more than a short visit.

There remains only one other piece of evidence. Mr. Douglas Fleming said that in the summer of 1927 the testator told him that he did not pay income-tax, and said: "I am exempt because I am domiciled in the Argentine." In this connexion the plaintiffs further relied on letters of the testator written in 1926. In 1925 the income-tax authorities had been satisfied, and it was a fact, that the testator's place of residence was not in England but in the Argentine. The question seems to have been whether the dividends on colonial securities should be paid to him with or without deduction of tax. The question again arose in 1926. The income-tax authorities were, of course, not concerned with domicile, but with residence. Whether the testator, residing in England from April and intending to make a trip to South Africa in August and return to England in the following spring was, in respect of these dividends, subject to tax I do not know.

It may be that if those facts had been stated to the income-tax authorities they would have been satisfied. They inquired through the testator's brokers "the approximate date on which you expect to return to the Argentine." The testator replied: "Am making arrangements to leave this country on or about August 20 next." That was true, but it was for South Africa and not for the Argentine. He had previously stated to his brokers: "Income Tax. As I am only in London for three or four months and have no residence here I am not liable for this."

I can find nothing in these letters which negatives an abandonment of domicile in the Argentine. The statement to Mr. Douglas Fleming stands on another footing: "I am domiciled in the Argentine." But the question which I have to ask myself is whether that statement is to override the overwhelming evidence to the contrary. I cannot so treat it. It is suggested that having transferred all his investments to England, and being faced with income-tax, he repented leaving the Argentine and contemplated returning there. But even so (and the evidence does not support the suggestion) the result would be, not that he had retained his Argentine domicile of choice all along, but that he intended to reacquire an Argentine domicile of choice, and that intention, if formed, was never carried out. I find that the testator abandoned his domicile of choice and reverted to his domicile of origin, and so died.

It must be a matter of satisfaction to all except the plaintiffs that, in the result, effect will be given to the testator's wishes; and the plaintiffs have small cause to think themselves hardly used, for upon the death of the mother each received in cash, land, or stock, a value in Argentine currency which at the then rate of exchange amounted to about £44,000, and at the present rate of exchange to about £34,000.

His LORDSHIP pronounced for the will, to be proved in solemn form, directed that probate should be handed out to the executors, and made a declaration that the testator died domiciled in England.

An argument took place as to costs.

MR. JUSTICE HILL.—In my view this is a case in which the costs ought to follow the event. I can see no reason for departing from that rule. As I have said, I do not think the case has any merits. It is now established that the will expresses the real wishes of a mentally capable testator, and if it had been defeated this would have led to a result which was contrary to the real wishes of the testator. The plaintiffs were not misled, there was no ambiguity about this document being his last will or about his mental capacity to make the will, but they set out to prove that, although those were his real wishes, in law he was not capable of exercising the power which he expressed in the will. That, no doubt, depended on a mixed question of fact and law. What was his domicile? I have no authority put before me for giving costs out of the estate in such a case as this, and in my judgment the plaintiffs set out to prove that the testator had a domicile which gave them a large share of his property, contrary to his real wishes. They have failed upon that, and it would be unfair that the successful party in such a case should be left to pay his own costs, still more that the beneficiaries under the will should be called upon to contribute to the costs. I give judgment that the defendants recover costs against the plaintiffs.

His LORDSHIP directed that the costs of the intervener should come out of the estate.

K.B. Div. (Wright, J.) 1928. Feb. 17.

SMITH, HOGG AND CO., LIMITED v. BAMBERGER AND SONS.*

Ship — Charterparty — Discharge of cargo—Meaning of "alongside"—Discharge on to quay and into lighters—Custom of Port of London — Respective obligations of shipowners and receivers.

The plaintiffs' steamer was chartered for the conveyance of a cargo of timber from Archangel to London, the charterparty providing, "The cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the steamer at the charterer's risk and expense as customary." The defendants were indorsees of bills of lading which incorporated the terms of the charterparty. On arrival the plaintiffs discharged part of the cargo on to the quay and stacked it there and discharged part of it into lighters and stowed it in the lighters, and they brought this action, alleging that as the defendants did not take the cargo from alongside the steamer they (the plaintiffs) had had to incur the expense of stacking on the quay and of stowage in the lighters. The defendants pleaded that by the custom of the Port of London the shipowners were bound to bear the cost of unloading and stacking timber on the quay alongside the ship, and, in the case of overside discharge, the cost of delivery and stowage in the lighters.

Held, that under a contract of the kind in question, when discharge was on to the quay the cargo was "alongside" when it was available for release from the ship's tackle on the quay, and the obligation of the receiver to take it "from alongside" arose at that moment; but when the discharge was into lighters it was the duty of the shipowner to place the cargo in the lighter and the receiver's obligation only began after that had been done. The plaintiff shipowners in this case succeeded, therefore, in their claim against the defendant receivers in respect of the cargo discharged on to the quay, but their claim failed as regarded the cargo discharged into lighters.

In this action the plaintiffs, Smith, Hogg and Co., Limited, of Victoria-terrace, West Hartlepool, claimed from the defendants, Louis Bamberger and Sons, of Broad-street-buildings, E.C.2, £102 9s. 3d. in respect of the discharge of a quantity of timber from the plaintiffs' steamship Fernhill in Surrey Commercial Dock, London.

Under bills of lading of various dates in September and October, 1926, which incorporated the terms of a charterparty dated September 13, 1926, made between the plaintiffs and the White Sea Timber Trust, it was provided that a quantity of deals, battens, and boards shipped at Archangel should be delivered at Surrey Commercial Dock to the order of the Russian Wood Agency, Limited, or their assigns. The charterparty contained, inter alia, the following clause:—

"The cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the steamer at the charterer's risk and expense as customary."

The property in part of the cargo passed to the defendants as indorsees of the bills of lading. The cargo was discharged in part on to the quay and in part into lighters.

The plaintiffs pleaded that in breach of their obligations under the bills of lading the defendants did not take the cargo from alongside the steamer, and that in consequence they (the plaintiffs) carried the cargo to and stowed it in the usual place in the docks for discharged timber at a cost of £102 9s. 3d.

The defendants contended that the cargo was to be discharged according to the custom of the port of discharge, and pleaded that by the custom and practice of the Port of London the shipowner was, in the case of timber, bound to unload and stack it on the quay alongside the ship. In the case of overside discharge they alleged that the custom was to provide only sufficient open lighters to receive the goods from the ship's tackle, and that the shipowner was bound to do the whole work of delivering the goods into the open lighters. They contended that they were under no liability in respect of the money claimed by the plaintiffs since, by the above customs, the shipowner was under an obligation to bear all costs of the unloading and stacking on the quay and the delivery and stowage in the lighters.

The defendants admitted that the plaintiffs discharged part of the cargo on to the quay and stacked it, but said that it was unsorted to marks or bills of lading. They alleged that the timber was subsequently removed and sorted by the Port of London Authority, labour in respect of which they (the defendants) were charged.

Mr. Le Quesne, K.C., and Sir Robert Aske appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Jowitt, K.C., and Mr. J. Dickinson for the defendants.

Mr. LE QUESNE, in opening the case, said that it raised the familiar question of the "alongside" clause. The defendants were holders of 31 of the 65 bills of lading. He referred to the customs of the Port of London with regard to Surrey Commercial Dock, and said that it was agreed between the parties that no witnesses should be called as to any of the customs. He submitted that the customs were not in the present case binding upon the plaintiffs, because they were inconsistent with the terms of the charterparty.

He referred to Glasgow Navigation Company v. Howard (26 The Times L.R., 247 ; 15 Com. Cas., 88) ; Aktieselskab Helios v. Ekman and Co. ([1897] 2 Q.B., 83) ; Mowbray Robinson and Co. v. Rosser (38 The Times L.R., 413) ; The Turid (38 The Times L.R., 423 ; [1922] 1 A.C., 397) ; W. N. Hillas and Co., Limited v. Rederi Aktiebolaget Acolus (43 The Times L.R., 67 ; 32 Com. Cas., 69) ; The Rensfjell (40 The Times L.R., 458) ; and Aktieselskabet Dampskibsselskabet Primula v. Horsley and Co. (40 The Times L.R., 11).

Evidence having been called, Mr. JOWITT, for the defendants, said that they relied on three points : (1) The question of custom ; (2) if there were no custom the parties would be held to their strict contractual rights, and the shipowner would have to deliver to each consignee under his own bill of lading and could not merely dump all the cargo together on the quay ; and (3), whether there was a custom or not, the plaintiffs had paid money which, on their contention, was due from the defendants, and had done so when they had express knowledge of the fact that the defendants were repudiating the claim, and they could not, therefore, recover from the defendants.

There was a logical distinction between the extent of the services said to be obligatory and the extent of the area over which the services must be rendered. Goods which were put on to a quay alongside a ship were themselves alongside the ship. He referred to The Nifa ([1892] P., 411) ; Northmoor S.S. Co. v. Harland and Wolff, Limited ([1903] 2 I.R., 657). So long as the locality on which the services were to be rendered could properly be described as "alongside," the claimant was entitled to prove a custom that the services must be rendered on that locality. But if the locality was not alongside the custom could not be proved. Where there was a large quantity of timber cargo in a stack the outer edge of the stack was just as much "alongside" as the part of the stack nearest the ship ; the whole cargo could be described as having been discharged alongside.

With regard to the payment which the plaintiffs had made, the mere fact that they had made the payment under protest made no difference. Maskell v. Horner (31 The Times L.R., 332 ; [1915] 3 K.B., 106, at p. 120).

Mr. LE QUESNE replied. The result of the recent cases was that the shipowner had done his part in unloading when the goods had been lifted by the ship's tackle over the ship's rail and had been deposited by the tackle on the lighter, quay, or railway truck. To admit the alleged custom here would be to ignore the words of the charterparty. Brenda Steamship Company, Limited v. Green (16 The Times L.R., 226 ; [1900] 1 Q.B., 518) showed the duty of the shipowner apart from custom. Stowing cargo was no part of the work of discharge.

On the question of voluntary payment by the plaintiffs and their consequent inability to claim against the defendants for the amount, he referred to Fletcher v. Gillespie (3 Bing., 635). The payment in this case was not in fact voluntary, but was made under protest. Wilson's Music and General Printing Company v. Finsbury Borough Council ([1908] 1 K.B., 563, at pp. 568-571) ; Falcke v. Scottish Imperial Insurance Company (3 The Times L.R., 141 ; 34 Ch. D., 234, at p. 249).

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT delivered the following considered judgment :—

This is a claim by the owners of the steamship Fernhill against the defendants, who were receivers of cargo under certain bills of lading. The Fernhill had loaded a cargo of deal battens or boards and delivered that cargo at the Surrey Commercial Dock. The cargo consisted of 1,125 standards, and the planks measured between 10 and 20 or 25ft. in length. Of that cargo the defendants were receivers under 31 bills of lading out of a total number of 65, and the quantity of cargo represented by these bills of lading was 569 standards. Of that quantity they took delivery of 326 standards on quay and 243 standards overside and into lighters. The mode of delivery of the remainder of the cargo was not given in evidence, though probably the same proportions went over on to quay and overside.

The plaintiffs' claim is for certain expenses incurred in the operation of discharging the ship. They say that that part of the operation ought to have been performed by the defendants, and they accordingly claim that these expenses should be borne by the defendants as receivers under the terms of their bill of lading. The plaintiffs say they incurred these expenses under protest—the defendants having repudiated all liability—and under notice that they would claim repayment from the defendants. Their claim is put as for damages for breach of contract, or, alternatively, for money paid at the implied request of the defendants.

The bills of lading were issued under a charterparty dated September 13, 1926, under which the Fernhill was to load a full cargo and deliver the same within a range of ports as ordered. She was in fact ordered to the Surrey Commercial Dock to discharge. The material clause is clause 3, the material parts of which are as follows : "The cargo to be discharged with customary steamship despatch as fast as steamer can deliver during the ordinary working hours of the respective ports and according to the custom of the respective ports, the cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the steamer at charterer's risk and expense as customary." The bills of lading incorporated these terms and conditions of the charterparty so far as they related to discharge.

The method of discharging at the Surrey Commercial Dock has been described by a witness, Mr. Howes. The ship comes alongside the quay, and her rail is about 3ft. distant from the edge of the quay. The Port of London Authority allot a space on the quay appropriated to the cargo which is to be landed on the quay. That space is about the length of the ship, with an open space in the middle about corresponding to the amidships area of the ship where there is no cargo, and extending back over the quay for 30ft. or 32ft. from the side of the quay. The deck load is first discharged by hand. The discharge is conducted by a gang of 13 men, nine on the ship and four on the quay, and in addition, when there is discharge overside, there are four other men in the lighter. The pieces, so far as they are landed before the winches and derricks are brought into use, are handed separately over the ship's side and taken by the men on the quay. As the landing proceeds the pieces are laid on the quay so as to cover the whole allotted area with a single layer and so as to overlap over the quay edge for about 3ft. or 6ft. As soon as sufficient deck cargo is discharged to release the winches, the rest of the deck cargo and the cargo in the holds are discharged by means of the ship's derricks and slings, the derricks having a scope of swing of about 3ft. inshore over the quay edge. The planks in the sling descend on the quay, and are brought to rest with one end resting on the quay and the other end on the ship's rail. The men on the quay release the sling and pick up or lap the planks, building them into a pile which will finally cover the whole allotted area to a height of 15ft. or 20ft. The pile is built by first building up the margins to seven or eight tiers, then filling in the middle space, and then repeating the process until all the cargo which is being put out on to the quay is discharged and piled. When the pile rises in height, what is called a fore and after—that is to say, two uprights and a cross-piece—is built above the ship's rail, and is used for the planks as they come out of the slings to rest against in place of the ship's rail, because the ship's rail is no longer at a sufficient elevation above the level of the timber on the shore. Each derrick always puts the planks down at the same place, and the men carry them away in order to do this operation of piling, which is only rough piling. The planks are discharged and piled without separation, according to the bill of lading sizes or marks. By a subsequent operation, which does not concern the ship on any view, the planks are carried away from the quay and measured and stowed or stacked in a place appropriate to the storage of timber. Such is the system with regard to cargo landed on the quay.

Now as to cargo landed overside into lighters the position is somewhat different. Delivery overside is to bills of lading sizes and marks, if any. The receivers' lighter comes alongside, and four men are provided by the ship to take delivery into the lighter. At first the deck cargo has to be delivered by hand, and it is put over the ship's side into the lighter, where the men receive it, getting the lengths, as far as possible, fore and aft of the lighter, and then they lay it on to the bottom of the lighter so as to fit in closely, otherwise the lighter would become top heavy. The lighters are about 10ft. beam and about 30ft. in length. When the derricks are working the pieces are slung over into the lighters and are guided into a fore and aft direction, and the sling is released so that the pieces fall with one end resting on the bottom of the lighter, or the bottom layers of timber, and the other end against the central athwartships beam in the lighter. As the discharge progresses the layers of timber rise in the lighter, and a pair of uprights with a cross-beam is rigged up across the beam of the lighter so that the upper ends of the deals, when released from the sling, may rest against it and the other ends rest on the deals in the bottom. The planks have to be placed in position in the lighter, and when they reach above the gunwale the tiers have to be bound by cross-tiers being interposed between the fore and aft tiers. This course is necessary in order to prevent the timber from falling off. Indeed, the whole method of stowage of the timber which I have described is necessary, not only to enable the lighter to carry the full load but also to render her seaworthy and navigable. When the lighter is loaded the receivers' men take her away from alongside.

Now the claim in the action was that by the contract the defendants, as receivers, had promised to bear all expenses "from alongside" because the contract is that the cargo is to be taken from alongside "at charterer's"—that is here the bill of lading holders—"risk and expense as customary." That involves two questions: What is meant by "alongside," and at what point does delivery by the ship cease and the taking by the receivers begin? The defendants relied on certain customs, the existence of which was not disputed by the plaintiffs, but their admissibility was disputed because the plaintiffs contended that they were inconsistent with the contract. It is necessary to distinguish delivery on to quay from delivery into lighters, in respect of which a separate custom was alleged and admitted. As to the former the custom was thus stated and it is set out at some length: "The goods are discharged from the steamer by the ship's stevedores with the ship's tackle, and stacked by the stevedores on to the quay without sorting to bill of lading sizes or marks. The first pieces discharged are used to make a stage projecting over the quay for about 6ft. towards the side of the steamer, and as the cargo is discharged a stack is made varying in size with the quantity discharged on to the quay but generally not exceeding the length of the steamer and extending back about 30ft. from the edge of the stage. The timber is later carried away from the stack by the Port of London Authority and by them sorted to bill of lading sizes and marks and piled in the usual place for storing timber. The ship's stevedores' charges for discharging the cargo and stacking it on the quay are paid by the shipowner and the Port of London Authority's charges for carrying the cargo from the quay and sorting and piling are paid by the consignees." As to the later discharge into lighters the custom was stated to be as set out in the case of Glasgow Navigation Company v. Howard (26 The Times L.R., 247; 15 Com. Cas., 88), in these terms: "By the custom and practice of the Port of London in the case of cargoes of lumber (including both Baltic and pitch pine lumber), the receiver is only liable to provide sufficient open craft alongside ready to receive the goods from the ship, and is under no obligation to have any men on such open craft to receive the goods from the ship's tackle or to stow the goods therein. The shipowner is bound to do the whole work of delivering the goods into the craft and of stowing the goods therein in the reasonable and ordinary manner so that the goods may not be damaged or imperilled, and so that the craft may be loaded to the usual and reasonable extent and may be properly and safely navigable." As was pointed out by the Court of Appeal in some of the cases to which I shall refer, the question at issue must now be considered in the light of the decisions with reference to similar customs at other ports. The leading case is that of The Turid (38 The Times L.R., 423; [1922] 1 A.C., 397), which was a case of delivery on to quay. In the judgments the cases relating to delivery into lighters are also discussed as distinguishable. I shall revert to that discussion later when I deal with delivery alongside into lighters. Clause 3 of the charterparty in that case was identical with the relevant clause now under consideration. It is, I think, clear from the judgments that the word "alongside" is to be construed in its natural and ordinary significance and that that meaning cannot be varied by a customary manner inconsistent with the fact. See also to the same effect the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Mowbray Robinson and Co. v. Rosser (38 The Times L.R., 413). Lord Birkenhead, whose judgment was concurred in by Lord Parmoor and Lord Atkinson, said in The Turid (supra) at p. 404: "I am myself of opinion that the word 'alongside,' if it does not suggest actual contact, does at all events suggest close contiguity, and not the less so because the ordinary obligation of the shipowner is admittedly only to deliver to the consignee the cargo his ship carries at ship's rail. A contract which requires delivery elsewhere extends this legal obligation." Lord Sumner, at page 415, said: "Doubtless the words 'alongside the steamer' may be satisfied, though the apparatus of reception, be it barge or cart or what not, may not be in actual contact with the ship's side. It may well be that the ship can be required to deliver to the full reach of her tackles." In that case the steamer lay 13ft. out from the quay and staging was necessary to be erected between the steamer's side and the quay, and the timber was carried over that staging and across the quay and piled on to a dump commencing about 10ft. from the edge of the quay. The House of Lords held that the cost of erecting the staging and carrying the timber across it and piling it on the dump fell on the receivers and was not part of the shipowner's obligation to discharge alongside and that a custom to the contrary was inconsistent with the charterparty. That case followed a decision in the case of Holman v. Wade, reported in The Times, May 11, 1877, and a decision in The Nifa ([1892] P., 411), where the steamer was moored 15ft. from the quay edge and the facts as to discharge were substantially similar. In the case of Aktieselskabet Dampskibsselskabet Primula v. Horsley and Co. (40 The Times L.R., 11), under similar words of contract Mr. Justice Greer said : "It was impossible to say that the goods were not alongside when they were on the quay before the sling was taken off," and he refused to make the shipowners responsible for the cost of carrying away and piling on the quay on the ground of custom. Similar questions came before the President in the Admiralty Court in the case of The Rensfjell (40 The Times L.R., 458). The President said at p. 462 : "The stage of the operation at which the shipowner is properly to be held to have completed his part of the discharge of cargo is that at which timber landed by means of the wire sling is put at the disposal of the receiver by the loosing of the sling." In some of the cases then in question the shipowners had acquiesced in the unloading of the timber from the ship by shore cranes which had a wider radius of swing than the ship's tackle. An attempt was made to distinguish these authorities in the case of W. N. Hillas and Co., Limited v. Rederi Aktiebolaget Acolus (43 The Times L.R., 67 ; 32 Com. Cas., 69), where under similar words of contract it was sought to enforce against the shipowner a custom requiring him to pay the expense of carrying the timber cargo to bogies on rails 18ft. from the ship, which was lying against the quay, and of building for that purpose part of the cargo into a platform between the ship's side and the line of rails. Lord Cave, Lord Chancellor, held that such claim failed. As further illustrating the meaning of the word "alongside" I may refer to the case of Northmoor Steamship Company v. Harland and Wolff, Limited ([1903] 2 I.R., 657), where the Court was clearly of opinion that the heavy logs of timber which had to be shoved into the water off the ship were "alongside" when at the place in the water into which they had been shoved from the ship.

I deduce from these authorities the conclusion that the cargo is "alongside" when it is available for release from the ship's slings if discharged by the ship's tackle and if discharged, as was the first portion of the deck cargo in this case, by being handed from the vessel, when it is laid with one end on the quay and the other resting against the ship. It is from this point, in the case of cargo landed on quay, that, in my judgment, the obligation of the receiver to "take from alongside" begins, and therefore all expense from that moment is expense which by the contract the receiver has agreed to bear.

Mr. Jowitt, however, has contended that that is not the true conclusion. He distinguishes the cases of The Turid (supra), The Nifa (supra), and Holman v. Wade (supra), on the ground that in those cases the ship was some way from the quay so that the intervening space of water had to be bridged, and, furthermore, that the edge of the pile nearest the ship was some distance away from the quay edge. He also seeks to distinguish the cases before the President of the Admiralty Court where the ship lay alongside on the ground that the pile began 4ft. from the edge of the quay, and the case of W. N. Hillas and Co., Limited v. Rederi Aktiebolaget Acolus (supra) on the ground that the bogie rails were 18ft. from the edge of the quay, and some cargo had to be laid on that intervening space. It is, however, clear from those cases that the mere fact that the ship is not alongside the quay is immaterial, and I think the whole area of the timber pile has to be taken into account and not merely the extreme edge nearest the ship. In this case the area extends at least 30ft. from the ship's side. I do not agree that the limit of the area remote from the ship is immaterial, and I do not accept Mr. Jowitt's contention that the cargo is to be visualized as if it were lifted from the ship in one piece and put down in one piece, so that the whole area which it covered when so deposited could be regarded as alongside the ship because it was as near as it could be. This argument is, I think, not in accordance with the facts. Nor can the result, in my judgment, be different where, as here, the defendants as receivers took, not the whole cargo, but only about one-half. The customary mode of discharge on to quay is to discharge without sorting and the location of the defendants' portion is unascertained.

I think that in a question of general mercantile importance such as this which involves the application, to conditions which for practical purposes are similar, of a common form of words in a common shipping document, it is desirable to attain to a clear and uniform rule. Lord Cave, Lord Chancellor, said in the case of W. N. Hillas and Co., Limited v. Rederi Aktiebolaget Acolus (supra), at page 68 : "Where the meaning of a commercial document in common business use has been the subject of judicial decision, it is plainly undesirable in construing a similar document to draw fine distinctions." I think that in such a case as the present of discharge on to quay the fair result of the authorities is that the shipowner has delivered alongside when the deals are released or are ready for release from the ship's tackle or are laid on the quay, and that the subsequent expense of carrying, arranging, and piling in the rough stack falls by contract on the plaintiffs.

Now the question of delivery into lighters is somewhat different and has been the subject of a separate line of cases. Mr. Le Quesne has argued that on the principles which should on the authorities be applied to discharge on quay, and which I have held should be applied, the shipowner's obligation is completed when the deals have been handed down from the ship and put on the lighter, or, if discharge is by the ship's tackle, when once the sling is released so that the deals fall inside the lighter, and that any arrangement, or, alternatively, any such stowage as the custom alleged here requires into the lighter, is at the receivers' expense as a taking away from alongside, just as much as stowing in a truck or piling on the quay has been held in the cases referred to above to be for the receivers' account. It has, however, been held in the case of Aktieselskab Helios v. Ekman and Co. ([1897] 2 Q.B., 83), under the same words of contract, that a custom was binding which required the shipowner to place the timber into lighters. Apart from custom, the placing into lighters would be a joint operation, requiring the receivers to have their men in the lighter to take the goods as soon as they are within their reach. See the cases of Petersen v. Freebody and Co. (11 The Times L.R., 459 ; [1895] 2 Q.B., 294) and Brenda Steamship Company Limited v. Green (16 The Times L.R., 226 ; [1900] 1 Q.B., 518). As Lord Justice Chitty said in Aktieselskab Helios v. Ekman and Co. (supra) of the facts in that case : "The custom merely diminishes the obligation of the merchants to this extent, namely, that the timber coming over the ship's side is to be put on board the lighter by the ship's crew. When that operation has been performed, it is the duty of the merchants, in accordance with the charterparty, to take from alongside the cargo thus delivered." This is an authority binding me and fatal to Mr. Le Quesne's contention that the shipowner's part must cease when the timber is released from the sling. But the custom found in that case and said to be not inconsistent with the charterparty was to put the timber into lighters "in such a way and to such an extent that the lighters may fairly be deemed to be loaded." In the case of Glasgow Navigation Company v. Howard (supra), the custom now relied on was given effect to by Mr. Justice Hamilton. But Mr. Le Quesne points out that in that case no point was raised such as he now raises, that such a custom is inconsistent with the contract, as putting on the ship the obligation of stowing or trimming in the manner described, which he contended was an operation and expense after the ship's delivery had ceased and appertained to the receivers' obligation to take away. It is true that in that case it was not pleaded that the custom was inconsistent with the contract, nor is any direct reference made to the question in the judgment. Mr. Justice Hamilton points out the difficulty of having two sets of men in the lighter, one set being the ship's men engaged in placing the deals in the lighter, the other the receivers' men engaged in the extra nicety of trimming, and the evidence here shows that the operation of loading the lighter is treated as a single operation done in the way necessary to render the lighter seaworthy and able to carry the deals without capsizing or throwing them overboard. In The Turid (supra) Lord Sumner at page 415 speaks of the lighter as an apparatus of reception which is alongside, so also does Lord Birkenhead and at page 411, refers to the Glasgow case (supra) without disapproval, and thus explains it : "It is apparent, therefore, that the matter in controversy in the case was not that now under debate before your Lordships, but to a large extent, as the learned Judge said, the controversy was what was included in the word 'discharging' used in the documents," and in W. N. Hillas and Co., Limited v. Rederi Aktiebolaget Acolus (42 The Times L.R., 69 ; 31 Com. Cas., 59, at p. 64), Lord Justice Scrutton seems to treat the decision of Mr. Justice Hamilton in the Glasgow case (supra) as a decision that the custom was binding under the charterparty. If the lighter which is touching the steamer is treated as alongside, and the custom requires the steamer to discharge by placing the planks in the lighter, and the receivers' duty is to take away the lighter with the planks in it from alongside, the custom may properly define what constitutes the complete act of delivery into the lighter, without contradicting the contract, because the custom then merely explains what is meant by delivery. This is, I think, the reason why, in The Turid (supra), Lord Birkenhead describes this line of case as easily distinguishable from The Turid (supra), and I accept it as being the correct conclusion. I accordingly hold that as regards delivery into lighters the receivers' contention is correct and that the shipowners fail.

I must refer to two other contentions of Mr. Jowitt's. He argued that the shipowners could not rely on the custom as to delivery on the quay, not according to bill of lading sizes and marks, unless they accepted the whole custom as alleged. But I think this is erroneous. The customary mode of discharge must not be confused with a custom as to the incidence of expense. He further contended that on any view the plaintiffs could not succeed because they had paid the full expenses with express knowledge that the defendants refused to pay, and could not recover either as for damages for breach of contract or as for money paid at the implied request of the defendants. I think this contention is ill-founded. I have referred in this judgment to numerous cases where such claims as are here made have succeeded. In The Turid (supra, at p. 400), Lord Birkenhead states the claim there as being to recover damages for breach of charterparty, or, alternatively, as money paid at the defendants' request. Indeed, by the express terms of the contract the receivers have promised that the expense of taking from alongside shall fall on them, and Fletcher v. Gillespie (3 Bing., 635) is an express authority for a claim in a similar case, as on an implied request "for money paid in ease and for the benefit of the defendant." Mr. Jowitt relied on Aktieselskabet Dampskibs Steinstad v. Pearson and Co. (43 The Times L.R., 531), but there payment was purely voluntary ; here the documents show a protest by the plaintiffs, and there the shipowners did the extra work at their own cost, at their full volition, whereas here the plaintiffs did so because the defendants repudiated the obligation. Mr. Jowitt also relied on observations by Mr. Justice Hamilton in the Glasgow case (supra), as reported in 102 L.T., 172. But I have carefully considered these observations, and find nothing in them adverse to my conclusion on this point.

In the result the plaintiffs will succeed in that part of their claim which relates to the expense of delivery on to quay, and fail on that part which relates to delivery into lighters. It is not questioned that the expenses are apportionable, but I am relieved from deciding any question of figures.

Prob., Divorce, and Adm. Div. (Lord Merrivale, P.) } 1928. Feb. 9.

N. v. N.*

Divorce—Permanent maintenance—Husband's remarriage — Increased income — Settlement on second wife — Order for increased maintenance—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 49), s. 190 (2) (b).

A man who had been divorced by his wife and whose means subsequently increased remarried and settled by ante-nuptial settlement on his second wife certain interests from the income of which he benefited by way of a joint establishment. He also had an income of £1,500 a year which was not the subject of the settlement. On an application by his former wife for increased maintenance,

Held, that it was not right to proceed on the footing that the man's income was £1,500 a year plus the income settled on the second wife, and award the former wife a third of the combined amount, but in making the award account should be taken not only of the £1,500 a year of which he had the free disposition but also of the pecuniary advantages accruing to him from the enjoyment of the joint establishment with the second wife.

This was an appeal by a divorced husband from an order by a Registrar increasing the amount of the permanent maintenance ordered to be paid by him to his former wife, the ground for the increase being that his financial position had improved.

The parties were married on September 15, 1909, and there was one child of the marriage, a son born on October 17, 1910. On April 28, 1925, the wife was granted a decree nisi dissolving her marriage. The Registrar in his report said that on November 13, 1925, the wife filed a petition for maintenance. She was then and continued to be in receipt of an annual income of £145 of her own. An answer and a reply to the petition for maintenance were filed. On April 26, 1926, the decree nisi was made absolute. On May 11, 1926, the husband, in anticipation of a second marriage, executed a document purporting to be an ante-nuptial marriage settlement on his second wife, to whom he was married on May 15, 1926. The settlement contained, in favour of his second wife, a declaration of trust of 500 fully paid £1 Ordinary shares in a limited company engaged in the export of coal by whom he was employed. On April 3, 1925, the husband had become a director of this company at a salary of £1,000 a year and became possessed of 600 Ordinary shares therein. In his answer, dated December 9, 1925, to the petition for maintenance, the husband stated that these shares were of the value of £600 or thereabouts and that he had derived no income therefrom. The company declared a dividend of 130 per cent. free of income-tax in respect of the first year's trading ending March 31, 1926, and he received £780 in dividends. This was taken into account in making an order for maintenance on November 23, 1926, whereby the husband was directed to pay the petitioner £400 per annum, less tax, and £100 per annum net for the maintenance of the child of the marriage.

On August 3, 1927, the petitioner filed a petition for increased maintenance, declaring the declaration of trust in favour of the second wife to be ineffective. On August 25, 1927, the husband filed his answer, in which he said that he received for the year ending March 31, 1927, a dividend of £612 10s. on his holding of 100 shares left to him after the ante-nuptial settlement. In that year he received director's fees amounting to £1,000 and the company made a net profit of £19,572. Counsel for the petitioner said that the income from the funds settled by the appellant on his second wife should be treated as his income, the total of which he computed at £4,300 a year. Counsel for the appellant submitted that the income from the shares settled on the second wife could not be taken into account and that the petition for increased maintenance should be dismissed. The Registrar treated the appellant as though he were in receipt of a gross annual income of £4,300, and on December 9, 1927, ordered that he should pay the petitioner £1,200 a year less tax, plus £150 per annum tax free for the child of the marriage.

Mr. Noel Middleton, Mr. H. R. Barker, and Mr. E. Riviere appeared for the appellant; Mr. Vaisey, K.C., and Mr. C. L. Beddington for the petitioner.

Mr. MIDDLETON submitted that, in view of the settlement, the 500 shares of the second wife could not be taken into account in fixing the amount of maintenance granted to the former wife. He referred to Jagger v. Jagger (42 The Times L.R., 315, 413; [1926] P., 93), in which it was held that the Court had no power to set aside an assignment of a divorced husband's property made by him in consideration of a second marriage, even if the result might be to defeat the claim of the wife petitioner to maintenance not yet actually ordered.

The PRESIDENT.—That is hardly on all fours. That was an assignment of choses in action only. My brother, Mr. Justice Hill, said in his judgment: "My decision in this case does not apply where the assignment is voluntary, i.e., voluntary on the face of it, or expressed to be for a consideration which is found to be a sham."

Mr. MIDDLETON.—Lord Hanworth, M.R., said in his judgment on appeal in that case: "It must be remembered that a litigant is not entitled as of right to have his rights safeguarded before an order has been actually made on the principle of quia timet, and there is no disciplinary or statutory power in the Court to prevent a respondent to a petition from doing what he likes with his property before an order for maintenance has been made."

Continuing, counsel said that in the present case the whole of the appellant's separate income was barely sufficient to pay the increased amount ordered. He referred to Hanbury v. Hanbury (10 The Times L.R., 401; [1894] P., 315), in which it was held that the amount of maintenance payable by a husband to the petitioner wife must be based on the actual income which he was allowed to draw from the business in which he was a partner, although his share of the profits was larger, the difference being put to his credit in the partnership books. He submitted that the petitioner's rights were statutory and she was given no authority to order the life of her former husband after final divorce. It was never intended by the statute to increase a wife's maintenance except when the former husband's means had definitely increased. There was no restriction on his disposing of his property after decree absolute, and there had been no injunction in this case, but only an interim order.

Mr. RIVIERE read the ante-nuptial settlement, which, he said, was an assignment to two trustees in common form. The property assigned comprised a £500 life assurance policy (subject to a mortgage dated October 27, 1925, under which £175 and current interest were then owing), furniture and household effects, and the 500 shares in the company. This property was to be held upon trust for the second wife absolutely after her marriage with the appellant, "in consideration of the said intended marriage." The appellant also covenanted that any future assurance policies on his life and any shares in his company and any household effects to which he might become entitled during coverture should be similarly held by the trustees in trust for his second wife. As regards the shares the appellant became the trustee for his wife. There were also covenants by the appellant to clear off encumbrances.

Mr. VAISEY said that this was a document of an unusual character and not of the ordinary kind for the benefit of a wife and children. The appellant continued to receive the income from the shares. If the settlement were good, a divorced husband who remarried could alienate everything.

The PRESIDENT.—No application was made for an injunction on the interim order.

Mr. VAISEY.—We did not know the facts.

Mr. VAISEY read section 190 (2) (b) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, "Where . . . the Court is satisfied that the means of the husband have increased, the Court may, if it thinks fit, increase the amount payable under the order." He referred to Bonsor v. Bonsor (13 The Times L.R., 184 ; [1897] P., 77).

Mr. MIDDLETON, replying, said that the criterion must be the husband's ability to pay. Means not at his disposal or not under his control were not his means. He referred to the President's judgment in Gilbey v. Gilbey (43 The Times L.R., 283 ; [1927] P., 197) as to the principles governing the award of permanent maintenance.

It was agreed that the maintenance to be paid for the son should be £150 a year.

LORD MERRIVALE delivered judgment as follows:—

This is a case which involves the difficult considerations which constantly arise in applying principles derived from the Ecclesiastical Law, as it was administered in the Ecclesiastical Courts before the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1857 up to the state of things created by that Act and the introduction of the power of dissolution of marriage by order of the Court and the changes subsequently made in the relations of man and wife and in the relations of parties separated and parties divorced. One material consideration in this case which must be borne in mind is that the marital relation between the petitioner and the appellant has been brought to an end, and that she is not a wife who had obtained a decree of separation, divorce a mensa et thoro, as it was called in the Ecclesiastical Courts, and was still the wife of the man against whom she had obtained a decree. There is no marriage tie between these parties and there are not as between the parties the obligations which existed in the earlier state of the law and which were in force by decrees of the Ecclesiastical Courts. I have called attention repeatedly and I call attention again now—because I think it is most material to do so—to the fact that, in considering what is the statutory right of a petitioner whose marriage has been dissolved, in respect of maintenance out of the funds of her former husband, it will be found misleading if, by the tribunal in which the award is to be made, it is supposed that that state of things is founded upon the same facts as gave rise to a practice and an inveterate practice in the Ecclesiastical Courts whereby a wife who had obtained a divorce a mensa et thoro was entitled in normal circumstances to an award of something like a third of her husband's available means.

Having said that, I come to the facts in this case. The petitioner and the appellant had been many years married. There is a child of the marriage now who is said to be in his eighteenth year. The final decree of dissolution of marriage was made in 1926, rather less than two years ago, on the ground of the husband's adultery. There had been an order for alimony pendente lite. That is immaterial here. It was founded upon the best view that could be had of the means of the husband, and of the necessities of the wife for her maintenance pending the suit. I put that out of the case. While the cause subsisted and down to the decree absolute the petitioner was entitled to maintenance upon the terms of that order for alimony pendente lite. In the year 1925, three or four weeks before the decree nisi in the case, the husband's position in life underwent a substantial change. He had been the employee of a firm of coal brokers, who had paid him a substantial salary and who had paid him in part by salary and in part by commission. At that period, three or four weeks, as I say, before the decree nisi, the principal in the firm, the proprietor in the business, agreed with the appellant upon the formation of a joint stock company in which the proprietor of the business should be interested to the extent of two-thirds of the capital of £1,800 issued, out of a total of £2,000 nominal, and the appellant should be the proprietor of one-third, namely, £600 of the stock issued. The proprietor also made an arrangement with the appellant whereby he advanced the moneys. No doubt £2,000 was the working capital which was actually required, but he gave the appellant credit for the sum which was to provide him with what was virtually a one-third share in that business.

That change in the appellant's circumstances has proved highly beneficial to him. In the business as a director he began at once to receive a substantial income—director's fees as they were called—to the amount of £1,000 a year, and in the first year's working of the business it proved to be prosperous, as no doubt it was pretty sure to be, and, in addition to the £1,000, he became entitled in respect of the share which he had purchased on credit in the business, as I have indicated, to dividends amounting to £612. At any rate £1,000 was subject to income-tax, and as to the £600 odd there is some question. But he was earning that sum in the year 1925-26. It might be said that at that time he had an assured income of probably not less than £1,500 a year available to him. In that state of the case in November, 1926, before the results of the year's working had become known but when the conditions in the company were ascertained and it was apparent that it was a company which would do well, the petitioner applied for an order under the Act of Parliament for permanent maintenance. It was not an application for an order for security under the provisions incorporated from the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1857. It was an order for maintenance under section 190 (2) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925. The application then being made, the learned Registrar made an order for maintenance at the rate of £400 a year less income-tax, and for an allowance of £100 free of income-tax for the maintenance of the one child of the marriage, a boy who was then about 16 years old.

In the year 1926-27 the joint stock firm had a very prosperous year. Their balance-sheet has been produced. They divided a very large sum in dividends, and they made substantial investments, and the result of the matter was that the appellant's share in the business, speaking of it as his share, intact at present—that which had been his purchased share in the business together with his earnings as a director—represented an income of something like £4,500 a year. These are not accurate figures ; they are round figures which have been used in the discussion. If he had the same proprietary rights in 1926-27 which he had had at the foundation of the company, he would have been a man with an income of £4,500 during that year, but in addition he would have had his interest, to an extent of a third, in the capital which he and his co-director had carried to reserve and which was of a gross value of something like £12,000. Therefore, if the property in these subjects had remained his, or did remain his, there he was with earnings which appeared at a face value of something like £4,500, and a proprietary interest in reserve in which he and one other person were concerned, in which his interest, if it remained his own, would have been a third, that is to say, a capital sum of £4,000. The petitioner, having become aware of the good year which the joint stock business had had in the year 1926-27, proceeded under section 190 (2) (b) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, to apply, the means of her husband having increased, that the amount payable under her maintenance order should be increased, and what she said was that the prosperous conditions to which I have referred should be the ground of an increase of the order for her maintenance proportionate to the prosperity of her husband's share in the business.

When the facts come to be examined a curious state of things is brought to light. It was known between the parties that immediately after the decree absolute had been made the husband had remarried, and it is known now that upon that marriage by an ante-nuptial settlement he had apparently, as far as was practicable to him, put under the absolute control of the lady who became his wife everything he had which was disposable, and he had also covenanted to assign to the wife in futuro policies of insurance and other interests which he might thereafter acquire. Looking at the settlement, it is not uncharitable to suppose that the author of it realized what the situation was, as between the appellant and the wife at whose suit he had been divorced, and that it was intended by that settlement to secure the appellant from claims of the petitioner in this suit in respect of a prospective improvement in his position of life. I myself am not surprised that it is pointed out that the settlement is of a singular kind, and that the object in view seems to be that the appellant, though at some risk to himself, should continue to enjoy all the advantages of any wealth he might acquire, but that by being at the absolute disposal of his intended wife, the lady whom he married, it should be safe from any attack on the part of his previous wife. That settlement was made and it is produced and relied upon.

It is said on the part of the husband that the settlement must either be impeached in point of law and got rid of, or it must be treated as a fact. It is said that, if it is to be got rid of, that must be done in the ordinary course of law, and the husband and his present wife, the lady in whose favour the settlement was made, must be brought into Court, and the settlement must be tested upon such evidence as can then be procured. If it is a secret trust, or if it is a fraudulent transaction, or if it is said that the transaction is against public policy, then let that be declared in a suit in which there are the proper parties. That is not so in this case, and it is conceded that the settlement must be taken, at any rate for the purposes of this inquiry, as a valid settlement, but it is said that, although there is a settlement here, it must be examined and it must be seen whether in truth the means which the husband had before he disposed of them in the way in which he purports to have done are not still his means.

The contest has waged chiefly around those provisions of the settlement which vest in the husband as trustee for the wife his proprietary interest in his shares in the joint stock company, or five-sixths of them. It is said on the husband's part that, if that stands, the dividends paid in respect of those shares are dividends belonging to the wife; the husband is merely trustee of those dividends for the wife. That is so. I am not going to pursue the matter with regard to the furniture in possession, the furniture hereafter to be acquired, and the insurance policy of £500 subsisting and any insurance policies in which the husband might hereafter be interested. They were chiefly used as ammunition for an attack upon the settlement, and, as it was said, not to cause it to be set aside, but to lead the Court to come to the view that the substantial interest in the whole of the assets affected by it remained in the husband. The settlement is an effectual settlement. The husband's receipts from 500 of the shares which he held in the joint stock concern were effectually transferred in equity to the wife; they are her property. The chattels in the house are held by trustees for her and the other interests which were effected are held in trust for her.

In that state of the case, with an effectual transfer of the husband's property to the extent to which it is transferred by the settlement, two questions have to be faced upon the wife's application. First of all, has there been an increase of the means of the husband since the award of maintenance of £400 a year was made, and, if there has been such an increase, how ought it to be reflected in the increased award, and to what extent has the Court jurisdiction to increase the award by reason of the improved position of the husband in the state of facts brought about by his own acts. It was contended by Mr. Middleton that there was not in truth an increase of the husband's means, meaning thereby faculties or ability, and that it was contrary to the principles laid down in the authorities which bind a Judge sitting here to hold that there had been an increase in his means. It was said that by effectual legal process he had divested himself of funds which would otherwise have been his, and the Court must take that into account. It is true that he has effectually divested himself, at any rate, for the time being, of his control over assets and his interest in assets which would have been his. What effect does that have? The Ecclesiastical Courts showed a decree of practical wisdom which well justified their existence and which anybody who considers their proceedings will attribute perhaps to the fact that those who conducted what were called Ecclesiastical proceedings were very learned lawyers skilled in civil law. They were not misled by appearances. When they considered what maintenance in the old times for the purpose of their decree—I safeguard myself again there—a husband should provide for a wife from whom he was separated by a decree of the Court, they looked at the realities. It is quite true that if he became voluntarily a pauper, or if he entered into religious orders in another Church and divested himself of his means, it might have been said that he had nothing. So far as I am aware there is not a case in which the Judge in the Ecclesiastical Courts had to deal with that kind of respondent. They were more worldly-minded.

But this emerges: The Court not only ascertained what moneys the husband had, but what moneys he could have if he liked, and the term "faculties" describes the capacity and the ability of the respondent to provide maintenance. And the thing went to this extent, that if a man were living at ease, upon an income which was given him voluntarily by other parties, that income could be taken into account. And it went further than that : If a man were living in idleness and chose to refuse to earn money, his faculties were not treated as non-existent for that reason. The Court considered, having regard to the substance of the matter, what was the ability of the respondent to provide for the wife, and it made its decree while the relation subsisted upon the footing, which came to be almost stereotyped, that a wife separated from her husband by decree was entitled prima facie to about a third of his income in normal cases.

I have to consider this case bearing that in mind, but bearing in mind, too, that I am not here administering Ecclesiastical law. I am here applying the Act of Parliament of 1857 as it is reproduced in the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, and I am dealing with the case of a woman who has procured a dissolution of her marriage, and I conceive that I must take into consideration the position in which they were and the position in which she was entitled to expect herself to be and would have been, if her husband had properly discharged his marital obligation, but I have no obligation cast upon me to ascertain what resources the husband at present has, and what mathematical proportion of them would have been assigned by an Ecclesiastical Court to a wife separated by a decree. I have no such task. What I have to ascertain is, the wife applying for an order for payment of moneys periodically for her maintenance and support, whether there has been an increase of the husband's means since a prior order, and what, having regard to her fortune and to his ability, and the conduct of the parties, the Court deems reasonable by way of an increased order. That is the problem to which I have to apply my mind and I put out of the case all the considerations which arise by reason of the fact that in an Ecclesiastical Court a wife separated by decree received normally one-third of the amount of her husband's income.

When I examine the order which is sought to be maintained on the part of the petitioner here, I see that it is an order which proceeds on the footing of the old Ecclesiastical practice, and upon the footing also that it may be expected that the income attributed to the husband which he could have had in 1926-27 if he had not made the settlement in question is to be taken into account in determining his ability to pay. The income which he could have had is spoken of as about £4,500 and the amount which has been awarded for the maintenance of the wife is very nearly as great as the net amount—it is something like three-quarters or four-fifths—of the moneys which in fact come to the appellant out of the joint stock concern. It is seen when that is examined that it proceeds upon the basis that the measure attributable is that which was applied in the Ecclesiastical Courts as between a husband and a wife who remained husband and wife. As I said, I put that aside.

It is seen, too, that the husband's means are treated as being the whole value of his earnings, and the interest which he originally had in the joint stock concern. It has ceased to be so. He has his earnings, £1,000 a year, he retains 100 shares, and he has a sixth of the dividends, but this exceptional year of 1926-27 in which, as is very reasonably pointed out in the appellant's evidence, people in his business were sure, or at least very likely, to get a very large excess of profit by reason of the peculiar circumstances of that year, has been taken as the basis of the order, and it has been left to the husband to get it reduced hereafter, if he can, by showing that his means have decreased. It seems to me that those are errors and I must bear that in mind, in considering what ought to be done.

What is it to which the wife here is entitled ? Has she shown there was an increase of the means of the husband ? In my opinion she has. He had in that year 1926-27 an income which came to him not very far short of the income which came to him in the year 1925-26. He had an income something like £1,500 a year. In the previous year it had been in that region—perhaps £1,600—but an income not far short. But he had something more. He had made a settlement on his wife, determinable, as has been pointed out, by agreement between them, whereby the other £3,000 which he earned—or something like that sum—call it X—was placed at the disposal of the wife. The matrimonial home was also vested in her, and the evidence is that he was sharing the advantages intended to be secured and in fact secured by settlement. There was provision for a joint establishment upon the footing of an income of £3,000 a year, or thereabouts, and the appellant, as of right, was enjoying the establishment so provided. It is said that I ought to put that out of the case, and that that is not an increase of the means or the abilities of the husband. It is quite true that it is not an increase of the money which comes to his bank account, but it provides for a large part of the expenses which fall upon him for livelihood and for maintaining his position in life, and it leaves free the sum which I called £1,500 a year—call it Y—to be dealt with by the Court, having regard to the increase in his means. Here is a divorced husband who has the substantial advantage of having his home provided for and secured from many vicissitudes by the ante-nuptial settlement into which he has entered, and, in addition to that, of moneys which come to him, to the extent, as is said, of £1,500 a year.

The real question is, in view of that increase in his abilities and bearing in mind that these persons were divorced before that improvement occurred, what ought to be done ?

The learned Registrar, as I have said, proceeded on the footing that it was a case for disregarding the settlement and for an award upon the footing of the old authorities in the Ecclesiastical Courts. I put that aside. That does not affect the award in respect of the child. I am happy to say that it has been agreed that the award of £150 a year in respect of the child shall be maintained. The question comes to be whether, in view of this increased means of the husband, something ought to be added to the £400 a year out of the free moneys which are at the husband's disposal, and whether something ought to be added notwithstanding that the parties have been divorced. I come to the conclusion that something ought to be added. Here is an income which has been treated as being £750 a year. Here is an interest in a great business. Here is great business capacity. All of these are advantages to which the wife during the marriage, the petitioner, was legitimately entitled to look forward. They are not accidental accessions of fortune. They are benefits which have arisen during the course of years, and by the development of the husband's faculties and position he has got the sum which has been spoken of as available.

What I propose to do, dealing with this matter on the principles I have indicated, is to direct that the permanent maintenance to be provided for the wife by the husband shall be £750 less income-tax, and the maintenance to be provided for the son of the marriage shall be by consent £150 a year, free of income-tax.

Mr. MIDDLETON.—Then it will be £750 subject to tax over and above the £145 a year income which the first wife herself has, as from August 3, 1927 ?

The PRESIDENT.—Yes. The petitioner must have her costs.

K.B. Div. (Rowlatt, J.) 1928. Feb. 23.

FRENKEL v. MACANDREWS AND CO., LIMITED.*

Ship—Bill of lading—Deviation clause—Extent of protection given to shipowners.

The plaintiff at Malaga shipped on a steamer of the defendants goods to be carried from Malaga to Liverpool. The bill of lading contained, inter alia, a deviation clause : "with liberty to touch at any ports whatsoever although they may be outside the route without it being considered a deviation." A vessel going direct from Malaga to Liverpool would turn westward on starting from Malaga, but the steamer in this case on leaving Malaga went eastward with the intention of picking up more cargo at Cartagena before going to Liverpool. Between Malaga and Cartagena the steamer met with bad weather, and some of the plaintiff's goods were lost. The plaintiff claimed damages, but the defendants contended that exceptions clauses in the bill of lading protected them from liability. The plaintiff answered that the steamer had deviated from the contract voyage, and that therefore the exceptions clauses did not apply.

Held, that although the deviation clause would have authorized the steamer to call at ports on either side of the contract route it did not justify the defendants in beginning the voyage by going in a direction opposite to the direction of the contract route, and that as there had been a deviation from the contract route the defence failed.

The plaintiff in this case claimed a sum of £2,293 in respect of the loss of olive oil sent from Malaga for carriage to Liverpool on a steamship, the Cervantes, belonging to the defendants.

Mr. Dunlop, K.C., and Mr. Stranger appeared for the plaintiff ; Mr. Clement Davies, K.C., and Mr. Cyril Miller for the defendants.

The points raised in the pleadings were as follows : The plaintiff was the owner of 134 barrels of olive oil shipped on the defendants' steamer Cervantes at Malaga under two bills of lading dated April 11, 1927, one for 110 barrels for delivery via Liverpool to Bradford and the other for 24 barrels for delivery at Liverpool. The plaintiff stated that the goods were shipped in good order and condition and were not so delivered, and he therefore claimed damages. Alternatively he said that the damage was due to negligent stowage or to the unfitness of the ship to carry the goods because she had no sufficient means of securing the barrels or preventing them from breaking.

By their defence the defendants admitted the title of the plaintiff, but did not admit that the barrels were shipped in good order and condition. They said that the bills of lading provided, inter alia, "not responsible for weight, contents, value, spiles, leakages, nor breakages." Alternatively they pleaded that if, as was not admitted, the damage was suffered as alleged, they were not liable by reason of the following provisions of the bills of lading :

"The ship is not answerable for loss damage or injury by . . . negligence or default of the captain crew . . . servants agents or other persons . . . leakages, breakages . . . wetting by rain or sea water . . . damage by contact . . . weakness of packages . . . accidents through defects of hull gear tackle . . . or any other accidents whatsoever, perils and risks of seas and rivers or navigation by steam.

"The responsibility for loss detention or injury will be limited to the original cost of the goods always provided that this does not exceed 50 pesetas per package . . . unless its contents and value have been declared in the bill of lading and proportionate freight paid.

"The ship is not responsible for any risk which may be an insurable one. Any claim . . . must be notified in writing . . . within 48 hours of the discharge of the package . . . if not, all right to claim will be forfeited.

"Ship not responsible for leakage.

"Ship not responsible for loss damage or pilferage of goods which can be covered by insurance."

Alternatively they pleaded that the damage, if any, which was not admitted, was caused by perils of the seas, in that after sailing from Malaga on April 11, 1927, with the barrels of oil the Cervantes met a gale on April 12 and owing to the violent motion of the vessel the barrels broke loose and could not be secured, and some of the oil was lost. The weather remained very bad until on April 14 the vessel reached Cartagena. The rest of the oil was discharged and sold there, and the plaintiff did not, as required by the bills of lading, make a claim with regard to it within 48 hours from the completion of the discharge. Alternatively, the plaintiff did not declare the value of the oil and the maximum liability of the defendants must be 50 pesetas per package. Alternatively the defendants were not liable at all because the damage could have been covered by insurance. Alternatively the oil was properly discharged and sold at Cartagena by the defendants as agents of necessity or at the implied request of the plaintiff, and the defendants paid the proceeds of the sale into Court.

By his reply the plaintiff pleaded that after loading the plaintiff's cargo, the Cervantes, without justification, deviated from the contract voyage and the perils of the sea were met with after the unauthorized deviation, and therefore the defendants could not rely on the provisions of the bills of lading.

By a rejoinder the defendants pleaded a clause in the bills of lading :

". . . With liberty to touch at any ports whatsoever although they may be outside the route without it being considered a deviation . . . to discharge, reload, trans-ship, send to destination by any means of transport, all responsibility of the ship ceasing on discharge from deck."

* Reported by W. B. THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

They also said that the damage would have occurred whether the steamer had deviated or not, and that in fact the voyage made by the Cervantes was an ordinary business voyage as usual in the trade and was not a deviation at all.

Mr. DUNLOP, in opening, said that the main point of the case was whether there had been a deviation. The voyage was specified as from Malaga to Liverpool, and by the construction which had been given by the Courts to deviation clauses any permissible deviation must be such as would be allowed on the route of that voyage. The vessel on starting from Malaga, instead of turning west towards Liverpool, turned east into the Mediterranean, and she never therefore began the contract voyage at all. There was a second point in the case, that the vessel was unseaworthy owing to the fact that she had not the necessary fittings by which the barrels could have been secured and prevented from falling or rolling about.

On the question of deviation he referred to Leduc and Co. v. Ward (4 The Times L.R., 313 ; 20 Q.B.D., 475) ; Glynn v. Margetson and Co. (9 The Times L.R., 437 ; [1893] A.C., 351) ; White v. Granada S.S. Company, Limited (13 The Times L.R., 1) ; United States Shipping Board v. Bunge and Born, Limited (42 The Times L.R., 174) ; and The Dunbeth ([1897] P., 133). The power to deviate "outside the route" only amounted to a power to turn to the right or to the left when on the route of the voyage ; here the vessel started from Malaga in the opposite direction and was never on the route at all. The "route" was a line between two points, and when on that line the ship could call at points on either side of it ; but the beginning and the end of the voyage must always be on the route.

He referred also to Evans, Sons and Co. v. Cunard Steamship Company, Limited (18 The Times L.R., 374) and said that that was an exceptional case and turned on the question what was the agreed voyage ; the question of deviation did not really arise there. In Hadji Ali Akbar and Sons, Limited v. Anglo-Arabian and Persian Steamship Company, Limited (22 The Times L.R., 600) the deviation clause authorized deviation in three directions, but in this case the clause only authorized deviation in one direction. Leave to go outside the route did not mean leave to go in the opposite direction. This case was similar to T. M. Duché and Sons v. Owners of Steamship Maria (3 Ll. L., 184). If there was a deviation the shipowner would be liable, even when the damage occurred before the deviation took place.

In any event, if there was an ambiguity about the deviation clause here the clause must be construed against the shipowners relying on it. And evidence that the defendants' ships regularly did what the ship did in this case would not be admissible because that would be attempting to vary by parol evidence the contract in the written bill of lading.

On the question of unseaworthiness, he submitted that the fact that the ship had not appliances for holding the barrels firmly constituted unseaworthiness for the purposes of this particular cargo.

Evidence for the plaintiff having been called,

Mr. CLEMENT DAVIES, for the defendants, called evidence to show that on this voyage the ship followed the usual procedure. The ships of the defendants' line were engaged in the Spanish coastal trade and called at many ports, discharging and loading cargo from and to Britain. The storm began on the early morning of the day after the ship left Malaga and was of extraordinary violence ; the ship got out of control and lay with the wind and sea abeam, straining, labouring, and pounding, and the cargo broke loose.

Evidence was also given as to the way in which the cargo was stowed.

Mr. CLEMENT DAVIES submitted that there was no evidence of unseaworthiness ; if anything wrong was done at all it was bad stowage, but he submitted that what happened was due to perils of the sea and there was not even bad stowage. That being so, the defendants were protected by the conditions in the bill of lading unless they had lost that protection by deviating from the contract voyage. Whether there had been a deviation or not depended on the wording of the contract. Originally, when there was no deviation clause in bills of lading, a ship was bound to go direct from the loading port to the discharging port (Davis v. Garrett, 6 Bing., 716). Then shipowners inserted a clause giving liberty to call at any port or ports in any order, but the Courts held that that only authorized calling at ports on the route of the contract voyage (Leduc and Co. v. Ward, supra ; Glynn v. Margetson and Co., supra). Then the shipowners inserted "whether on the route or not," and on that they were at last successful (Evans, Sons and Co. v. Cunard Steamship Company, Limited, supra). The case of T. M. Duché and Sons v. Owners of Steamship Maria (supra), relied on by the plaintiff, was distinguishable, because the ship there was not running in a regular line, on a customary route which was well known to every one at the port of shipment. Here, he submitted, the regular practice of the defendants' steamers was to follow the route taken in this case, and there was in fact no deviation at all ; but, if it was necessary for the defendants to rely on the liberty to deviate, they had not exceeded their right. The wording of the bill of lading in this case was practically identical with that in Evans, Sons and Co. v. Cunard Steamship Company, Limited (supra) and Hadji Ali Akbar and Sons, Limited v. Anglo-Arabian and Persian Steamship Company, Limited (supra). In Morrison and Co., Limited v. Shaw, Savill and Albion Company, Limited (32 The Times L.R., 712 ; [1916] 2 K.B., 783) there was a wide liberty of deviation in New Zealand but not between New Zealand and London, and the loss occurred in the English Channel. The liberty given to deviate in United States Shipping Board v. Bunge and Born, Limited (supra) went no farther than that in Leduc and Co. v. Ward (supra) and was not as wide as in this case. Foreman and Ellams, Limited v. Federal Steam Navigation Company, Limited (44 The Times L.R., 250) was a case with a wide deviation clause and Mr. Justice Wright, at page 252, discussed the effect of it in a business sense.

The plaintiff relied on T. M. Duché and Sons v. Owners of Steamship Maria (supra), but he (counsel) had obtained the papers in that case and found that the bill of lading was not being used by a regular liner but by a small Spanish steamer making a single voyage, and in the translation from the Spanish the important word "whatsoever" was omitted in the bill of lading. The effect of "whatsoever" was shown in Joseph Travers and Sons, Limited v. Cooper (30 The Times L.R., 703 ; [1915] 1 K.B., 73) and Reynolds v. Boston Deep Sea Fishing and Ice Company, Limited (38 The Times L.R., 429). The contention of the plaintiff would give no meaning to the words "outside the route."

Mr. DUNLOP replied, and submitted that if the barrels had been properly secured the damage would not have been suffered. It was not a mere case of bad stowage.

On the point of deviation he was not called upon.

MR. JUSTICE ROWLATT stated the facts and said that the plaintiff based his claim on the two grounds of unseaworthiness and deviation. As to the first point, he held that the evidence did not show any unseaworthiness, and on that he decided against the plaintiff. The real point of the case was the deviation. The plaintiff had shipped goods by the defendants' steamers for many years and knew that they went to ports up and down the coast, but the case was different from Evans, Sons and Co. v. Cunard Steamship Company, Limited (18 The Times L.R., 374) because there the only route taken by the steamers was known to be away from the ultimate destination, whereas here it might be either away from or towards the destination. Many cases had been cited, but in T. M. Duché and Sons v. Owners of Steamship Maria (3 Ll. L., 184) this same bill of lading had been before Mr. Justice Hill and he had held that a precisely similar deviation was not authorized. He (Mr. Justice Rowlatt) felt that he ought to follow that decision. It was argued that in that case in the translation of the bill of lading the word "whatsoever" had been improperly omitted and that this case was therefore distinguishable, but he could not assume that the learned Judge there was misled. Probably he had the original Spanish document before him.

Judgment must therefore be for the plaintiff, but the defendants must have the costs on the issue of seaworthiness.

A stay was granted on terms.

Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. (Viscount Haldane, Lord Shaw of Dunfermline, and Lord Carson.) — 1928. Feb. 24.

UNIVERSAL NEGRO IMPROVEMENT ASSOCIATION (INCORPORATED) AND OTHERS v. MORTER.*

Will — Bequest to association — Validity — Objects of association—Whether shown to be unlawful.

The Board upheld the validity of a bequest to the Universal Negro Improvement Association for the African Redemption Fund on the ground that the objects of the association had not been shown to be unlawful.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Chief Justice of British Honduras with reference to the validity of certain bequests to "the Parent Body of the Universal Negro Improvement Association, for the African Redemption Fund," which the Chief Justice had held to be invalid.

Mr. Gavin Simonds, K.C., and Mr. Wilfrid M. Hunt appeared for the appellants; Sir T. Willes Chitty, K.C., and Mr. Roger S. Bacon for the respondent.

VISCOUNT HALDANE delivered the following judgment of the Board:—In this case the learned Chief Justice of British Honduras who tried it had a difficult task, arising out of somewhat obscure materials. But their Lordships think that his judgment ought not to stand.

The first appellant is a corporation that is a beneficiary under the will dated February 15, 1924, of one J. E. Morter, a planter at Belize in British Honduras, who died on April 7 in the same year. The second appellants represent other societies, also interested as beneficiaries, who were made defendants (along with the first appellant). The respondent, as plaintiff, commenced an action against the executors and trustees of the will to set it aside. She was the widow of the testator and claimed administration on the ground of intestacy, and, alternatively, a declaration that certain of the devises and bequests in it were void. The executors and trustees have not appeared in this appeal.

The testator, by his will, devised and bequeathed the residue of his real and personal estate to the Parent Body of the Universal Negro Improvement Association, for the African Redemption Fund. It is not in dispute that if this be a valid gift the first appellant may be taken as representing the Parent Body of the Universal Negro Improvement Association named in the will, a conclusion which is in accordance with the finding of the learned Judge who tried the case. The point was taken for the respondent that the description of this beneficiary was so vague as to make the gift void for uncertainty. Their Lordships think that Chief Justice Sisnett was right in holding on this point that, if the gift was a valid one, the beneficiary had been identified as representing the first appellant, and that there is a direct gift to it for the Redemption Fund without the constitution of a formal trust. The real question of difficulty is whether the objects of the appellant association were such as to render the gift to it in the will void for illegality.

In considering this question it is necessary to look at the constitution of the first appellant. This was a body incorporated in the State of New York on June 17, 1918. The purposes expressed in the certificate of incorporation were to promote and practise the principles of benevolence, and for the protection and social intercourse of its members, and for their mental and physical culture and development, and to extend a friendly and constructive hand to the negroes of the United States. So far the purposes were prima facie free from illegality. The territory in which its operations were to be principally conducted was that of United States territories and possessions. The principal office was to be at an address in the city of New York.

On July 26, 1918, there was also incorporated under the business corporation law of the State of New York a stock corporation for purely business purposes with its principal office also in the city of New York. It was called the African Communities League, and the stockholders were in the main the same persons as those already incorporated as the Universal Negro Improvement Association. There is nothing in the declared purposes of either of these bodies that is contrary to British law. A branch of the association and of the league was, on March 15, 1920, formed in British Honduras.

There was a printed book which was put in evidence. It is called the "Constitution and Book of Laws" made for the government of the Universal Negro Improvement Association, Inc., and the African Communities League, Inc., of the World, and it has been repeatedly re-issued since 1918. It defines these bodies as founded by persons desiring to work for the general uplift of the negro peoples of the world. There was also a voluntary society called the Universal Negro Improvement Association and African Communities League, which the learned Chief Justice found to be the body intended by the testator under the description of the Parent Body of the Universal Negro Improvement Association. This body consisted of much the same persons as those incorporated, and was also subject to the Constitution Book. The book, at the end of article 13, purports to enable the raising of a fund from all negroes for the purpose of the redemption of Africa. The purpose of the fund was to be to create a working capital for organization, and to advance the cause for the building up of Africa. There was to be a Potentate and Supreme Commissioner of negro blood who was constitutionally to control all the affairs of the association and league, and of all other societies. He was to form an executive council to assist him in his administration. There were to be divisions, and each when created was to elect its own officers, with the approval of the President-General.

So far all that was provided was harmless, but later on in the book were contained rules and regulations for Universal African Legions of the association and the league. These laid down that there should be an auxiliary body formed out of the members, to be designated the Universal African Legions. They were to prepare men for service by teaching them military skill and discipline, and by registering them according to the various trades in which they had been trained. The men, with their officers, were to be organized as an army and to be under military discipline, and to obey the Potentate, and so behave as to secure that "God's divine purpose" might be accomplished in the freedom of all mankind from slavery and despoliation, and to bring about the success of the cause of the redemption of Africa.

One Marcus Garvey, who had been connected with the first appellant from the beginning, had become its President-General, and had been elected and styled "Provisional President of Africa." He had made speeches in New York, and had published them in a book. "We are not," he appears to have said, "engaged in domestic politics, in church building, or in social uplift work, but we are engaged in nation building." What they sought, he went on, was independence of government, with one President in Africa. They would fight for this, as black American citizens, as black British subjects, as black French, or Italian, or Spanish citizens, in response to the cry of their fathers for the redemption of their motherland, Africa. They might yet run out, among others, General Smuts, as other rulers had been expelled. The black man's back was to the wall, and he was going to show the teeth of the tiger. About this four hundred million negroes were determined.

The purposes so expressed were, the learned Chief Justice found, to be the principal and ultimate object of the fund, and it may well be that Mr. Marcus Garvey, who was apparently of negro descent and an impassioned person, when he spoke so expressed the views of many other members of the association besides himself. But the objects laid down in the speeches do not appear to be set out in the constitution of the association. Had they been so, it may well be doubtful whether the authorities of the State of New York would have permitted the incorporation. Moreover, it is significant that although the association had its head office in New York City, where its domicile must be taken to be, and appears to have courted publicity, no step had been taken by the State authorities to interfere with it. But the police appear to have been watchful, for it seems that Marcus Garvey personally was, indeed, prosecuted and convicted for using the United States mails for obtaining money by false pretences from the members of the negro race. But the association was not interfered with by the American Government, notwithstanding the statements made by Garvey which have been quoted. The Government may have taken the view that these statements were not to be regarded seriously, and were of no importance. The authorities appear to have incorporated the bodies concerned, and then to have taken no step towards treating them as having been originally or having become illegal on account of their purposes.

Their Lordships desire to guard themselves from its being supposed that they in any way question the principle that a provision made in a will or contract can stand if under it a fund is given for purposes some of which are illegal, with no provision for separating these from other purposes which are valid, or for apportionment. But it is not every use of words that is to be taken seriously. Here it is important to observe that the authorities of the place where the Association had its headquarters and had been incorporated do not appear to have treated the language used in the published book of Garvey's speeches as of a serious character, such as to warrant proceedings on the ground of illegality. The bodies concerned, and particularly those incorporated, had certain purposes which were, so far as they went, charitable and legal. It was only in virtue of the Constitution and Book of Laws and in the speeches of President Garvey that these objects were extended to matters which might be objectionable in the eye of the law. Whether such illegally expressed utterances were to be taken as seriously intended or as more than exuberant oratory of a kind which is not uncommon in public places is, in their Lordships' opinion, a question not only for the laws of the State of New York, but, of course, also for those of every country in which consideration has to be given to the true intent and meaning of a bequest which is to receive effect within its territory. No action within the New York State is no doubt a circumstance to be taken into consideration, and their Lordships see no more occasion for attaching a seditious meaning to high flown language than did the American authorities.

It is to be observed, further, that at the trial of the action no evidence of New York law was tendered to prove what in a British Court was only an allegation of fact—the illegality of the objects of the New York Associations.

Their Lordships think that in the absence of such evidence the learned Chief Justice Sisnett went too far when he held that it had been proved that the association and the South African Redemption Fund had been shown to be bodies incorporated for illegal objects. It is not improbable that the course taken by the American authorities, with whom the decision of this question primarily rested, was the wise one. They simply took no notice of the association, although it was performing its charitable functions at least publicly and was paying large salaries to its officers. Apparently they did not treat the belligerent ideas as so seriously or definitely put forward that the law would take cognizance of them as threats to commit crime. If that be right, this fund ought not to be treated as one which a foreign Court can regard as unlawful.

Upon this footing the other point made at the Bar does not arise. It was said for the respondent that a new trial cannot be obtained unless a motion to that effect is made within a limited time in the Court below. Their Lordships do not think that this is an application for a new trial within the Rules of Procedure of the Supreme Court of British Honduras which contain the provision. The whole materials are before them, and the question is one of law simply, appearing on the face of the judgment.

They will humbly advise his Majesty that the order of the Court below should be discharged, and that the action should be dismissed. The learned Judge directed, after careful consideration, that the costs of the plaintiff and of the executors as between solicitor and client should be allowed out of the estate, and that similarly the defendant association should be allowed half of their costs out of the estate, again as between solicitor and client. It was the looseness of the testator's directions which gave rise to the litigation, and their Lordships think that this order was right and should stand excepting that the defendant association and the other appellants should now have the whole of their costs out of the estate. As regards the costs of this appeal, all the parties who have appeared should have their costs out of the estate, but only as between party and party.

RICHARDSON v. ABERTILLERY URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL. THOMAS v. SAME.*

Education—Local education authority—Education committee—Powers—Delegation to sub-committee — Non-provided schools—Dismissal of teachers by sub-committee—Whether delegation ultra vires—Education Act, 1921 (11 and 12 Geo. V., c. 51), ss. 4, 148 (1).

The plaintiffs were employed by the defendants, a local education authority, as assistant teachers in non-provided schools and were subject to a month's notice. Owing to financial difficulties the defendants, considering the matter to be urgent, appointed a sub-committee with plenary powers to carry out measures of economy, and the education committee of the defendants handed over their powers in the matter of economy to this sub-committee. A month's notice was given to the plaintiffs by the sub-committee, and they brought actions against the local education authority and each moved for an interlocutory injunction restraining the defendants from attempting to enforce the notice. The ground on which the plaintiffs moved was that under s. 4 of the Education Act, 1921, the defendants had acted ultra vires in delegating their powers under the Act to the sub-committee.

Held, that under s. 4 of the Act both the local education authority and their education committee had a right to delegate their powers, and the motions failed.

His LORDSHIP heard motions by Mr. Worthy Richardson and Mr. John James Thomas, the plaintiffs in these two actions, raising questions as to the power of a local education authority to delegate their powers of dismissing teachers to a finance sub-committee. The two motions were, by consent, heard together. In each the plaintiff asked for an interlocutory injunction that the defendants, their servants and agents

"be restrained from dismissing or purporting to dismiss the plaintiff from his office as assistant master in the [Blaentillery Mixed School] until his engagement as such assistant master shall have been duly and lawfully determined and from in any way acting on a notice dated January 31, 1928, served on the plaintiff by or on behalf of the defendants and purporting to terminate his said engagement or attempting or purporting to enforce the same or any alleged right thereunder until judgment or further order."

Mr. C. E. E. Jenkins, K.C., and Mr. R. F. Roxburgh appeared for the plaintiff Richardson ; Mr. F. H. Maugham, K.C., Mr. J. B. Melville, K.C., and Mr. R. H. Hodge for the plaintiff Thomas ; Mr. Upjohn, K.C., and Mr. A. C. Nesbitt for the defendants.

Mr. Richardson's affidavit stated that he was a trained certificated teacher, and that, on July 1, 1922, he was appointed to the teaching staff of the education committee of the defendants, as local education authority, as from August 29, 1922, at a salary in accordance with Standard Scale III. of the Burnham Scale of Teachers' Salaries, and subject to his engagement being terminable by one calendar month's notice to end on the last day of the month. On August 29, 1922, the plaintiff took up his duties as assistant master at the Blaentillery Mixed School and had held that post ever since, and claimed to hold the same at the present time. On January 31, 1928, he received a notice of that date, purporting to terminate his appointment on February 29, 1928. That notice, the plaintiff alleged, was not served on him in pursuance of any resolution of the local education authority or the local education committee, but by and in pursuance of some resolution of a body called the sub-finance committee, which had no power to cause such notice to be served.

Mr. Thomas's affidavit, in addition to setting out his appointment and the notice served, referred to the delegation of certain of the local education authority's powers to a finance sub-committee which resolved, on giving notice, to determine the engagements of all head and assistant teachers in their area.

Mr. UPJOHN, before reading the defendants' affidavit, said that the reason why there were two actions was that there were two wealthy trade unions which thought that they would like to spend a little of their money in litigation.

In an affidavit sworn by Mr. Sydney Pask, chairman, Mr. William Francis Walters, and Mr. Henry Theophilus Spencer, councillors, of the defendant council, it was stated that, before the close of 1927, the council, owing to its heavy commitments in the carrying out of its statutory powers and duties, got into financial difficulty and applied to the Ministry of Health for sanction of a loan by way of overdraft. The funded indebtedness of the council was already considerable ; the rates for 1927-8 were 26s. 4d. in the pound in one of the two parishes in the area, and 24s. 5d. in the other, exclusive of a water rate of 7½ per cent. on the gross annual value of premises supplied. The collection was largely in arrear.

The Ministry of Health was not willing to sanction further borrowing unless the defendants undertook further measures of economy. The Ministry's requirements were embodied in a letter dated January 6, 1928. A special meeting of the council was held on the same day, when the council, considering that the matter was urgent, appointed the three deponents as a sub-committee with plenary powers to act. On January 13 the sub-committee met and resolved :—

"That the requisite notice be given to all head teachers, assistant teachers . . . and the two attendance officers to terminate their appointments."

On January 16, 1928, the education committee (of which the deponents were members) resolved :—

"That the education committee hand over to the special sub-committee of three the powers of the education committee with regard to economy, but it shall not include the surrender of our autonomy to the county council or anyone else."

On January 30 the sub-committee instructed the clerk to the council and the secretary to the education committee to send notices to teachers on the following day, and they did so. The notice was signed by the clerk and secretary.

In so doing, the deponents stated, the sub-committee acted bona fide in what it conceived to be the best interests of the district and the ratepayers, and with a view in the main to a readjustment of the terms of service entered into by teachers, and not with any object of permanently discharging teachers from the employment of the council, save in so far as, on a reorganization of arrangements, it might be found possible to reduce the total number employed.

Mr. JENKINS, in opening Mr. Richardson's case, submitted that the action of the sub-finance committee—the "Big Three," as they were called locally—was wholly ultra vires. The Education Act, 1921, provided :—

"Section 148. (1) A local education authority may appoint necessary officers, including teachers, to hold office during the pleasure of the authority, and may assign to them such salaries or remuneration (if any) as they think fit, and may remove any of those officers."

"Section 4. (1) Every council having powers under this Act shall have an education committee . . .

"(2) . . . (a) All matters relating to the exercise by the council of their powers under this Act, or of any powers connected with education conferred by or under any other Act, scheme, or order on the council expressly as a local education authority or as a council having powers under this Act, except the power of raising a rate or borrowing money, shall stand referred to the education committee, and the council, before exercising any such powers, shall, unless in their opinion the matter is urgent, receive and consider the report of the education committee with respect to the matter in question ; (b) the council may also delegate to the education committee, with or without any restrictions or conditions as they think fit, any such powers as aforesaid, except the power of raising a rate or borrowing money. . . .

"(5) An education committee may, subject to any directions of the council, appoint such and so many sub-committees consisting either wholly or partly of members of the committee, as the committee thinks fit."

The defendant council had, by resolution, delegated its powers to the education committee, under section 4 (2) (b).

Counsel, continuing, said that the Ministry did not suggest any particular direction for economy.

Mr. UPJOHN.—Every direction.

Mr. JENKINS.—The question of economy on education must be considered by the education authority, and it had never been considered by anyone. Under pressure from the Minister the defendants accepted his suggestion that a sub-committee with plenary powers should be appointed. If that meant "with the power of dismissing teachers" it was ultra vires, and the fact, if so it was, that it was suggested by the Ministry did not make it legal. On the right to dismiss teachers he cited Price v. Rhondda U.D.C. ([1923] 2 Ch., 372) and Short v. Poole Corporation (42 The Times L.R., 107 ; [1926] Ch., 66). The dismissals in this case did not purport to be made on educational grounds, but for economy.

MR. JUSTICE EVE.—You seem to be asking for a mandatory injunction to employ the plaintiff.

Mr. JENKINS.—The relief I ask is in form negative. As drafted in Mr. Richardson's notice of motion it is, I admit, too wide, for it might prevent the defendants from beginning de novo. It must be restricted, as Mr. Thomas's notice is, to restraining them from acting on the purported notice of dismissal of January 31. The original delegation to the sub-committee being a mere nullity, its acts were incapable of ratification.

Mr. MELVILLE said that this was not merely an action affecting a few teachers at Abertillery. Those instructing him were concerned to defend the Burnham scale, on the basis of which the Board of Education paid three-fifths of the salaries. The First Schedule to the Education Act, 1921, provided a scheme for the appointment of education committees which, he submitted, must be followed. They might as well have delegated their powers to the fire brigade as to a sub-committee like this. The collective psychology of the committee was affected by the purpose for which it was appointed. A finance committee would primarily concern itself with finance. The reservation of autonomy in the resolution appointing the sub-committee suggested that the education committee intended the sub-committee to report its recommendations to the education committee, and, if it recommended a reduction of teachers' salaries, the education committee must take the appropriate steps. He referred to Fennell v. East Ham Corporation ([1926] Ch., 641).

Mr. UPJOHN said that since hearing Mr. Melville they knew a little more of the motives underlying these actions. They were brought to maintain the salaries of teachers in this afflicted area, with a debt of £500,000, on scale III. of the Burnham Award, which was not an award in any ordinary sense of the word. Scale III. was the highest scale, and to maintain it, at least till the trial, was the object of the motions. Teachers were in no better position than the council's scavengers. If the former could get an injunction to restrain the alteration of their salaries, so might the latter, and economy would become impossible.

In delegating its powers to the education committee under section 4 (2) (b), the council did not abandon the power to act itself, and it was quite entitled to treat the need for economy as a matter of urgency under section 4 (2) (a). It was said that this sub-committee took no heed of educational needs, but was only concerned to cut down the salaries of the poor teachers. But how could education be carried on without regard to economy ? The education authority, which was bound to provide for the educational needs of the district, was entitled to say: "If we continue to pay the salaries on the Burnham scale, we cannot continue to function at all, but must close our schools, for we cannot pay all that we collect to teachers to the exclusion of the other public services for which we are responsible. We must reduce salaries all round, including those of the teachers, otherwise our schools must be closed, and we know not when and by whom they will be reopened."

He submitted that the council had complied with both branches of section 4 (2), and that there were no grounds for contending that the notice was void. The position of teachers was different in the case of provided and non-provided schools. In the present case the schools were non-provided; there was no question of a statutory position, but merely of a contract of service during the pleasure of the authority, and this would not be enforced by injunction. He referred to Smith v. MacNally (28 The Times L.R., 332; [1912] 1 Ch., 816); Martin v. Eccles Corporation (35 The Times L.R., 262; [1919] 1 Ch., 387); Hanson v. Radcliffe Urban District Council (38 The Times L.R., 667; [1922] 2 Ch., 490). The points taken by the plaintiffs were covered by Young v. Cuthbert (22 The Times L.R., 251; [1906] 1 Ch., 451).

This was simply a dilatory objection. Why should the plaintiffs not have objected that the notices were bad and given the defendants the opportunity to regularize them at the cost of another month's salary instead of launching two actions?

Mr. JENKINS and Mr. MELVILLE replied.

MR. JUSTICE EVE, in giving judgment, said that in these two actions the plaintiffs claimed substantially the same relief. Mr. Richardson originally claimed an injunction in terms much too wide, but had since brought himself into line with Mr. Thomas, and both claimed an injunction to restrain their employers from terminating their employment.

If during his judgment he used the singular, it was to be understood that his observations applied to both plaintiffs. Both were engaged under section 148 of the Education Act, 1921. On the face of it there was a contract entered into in pursuance of the statute and this contract was terminable by the employers in accordance therewith. Prima facie, the position was not one which would entitle the plaintiff to ask the Court to interfere by injunction.

What was asked would, in fact, be granting an injunction as a step to specific performance of a contract of service, and the Court never did this. But it was said that this was a contract with a public body, and that the law was different in the case of such a contract of employment. In Short v. Poole Corporation (42 The Times L.R., 107; [1926] Ch., 66) Lord Justice Warrington (as he then was) said at page 90:—

"Is the position of a public body . . . different from that of an individual? In my opinion it is different only in this, that being established by statute for certain limited purposes, no act purporting to be that of the public body can have any operation as such, if the individuals purporting to exercise the functions of the public body have, in performing the act in question, transcended the limits of the authority conferred upon it.

The objects and obligations of the education committee were set out in section 17 of the Education Act, 1921. [His Lordship read the section.]

It was said in the first place that the authority here, in determining to serve this notice, was not acting in pursuance of a statutory obligation, but as a mere matter of finance. But it had become necessary for the authority, if it were to be assisted by the Minister, to adopt a strict policy of economy all round. He could almost take judicial notice of the fact that in many areas education expenses were very heavy, and that they would be one item in which economy would have to be considered. So far as the attempt to impugn the notice on the ground of motive was concerned, he could not possibly entertain it.

It was then said that the formalities adopted were such as to make the notice totally irregular. The education authority had passed a resolution delegating all its powers to the education committee. That would not sterilize the authority, for a principal had always concurrent powers with his agent.

After describing the appointment of the sub-finance committee, and the steps leading up to the giving of the notice, his Lordship said that it seemed to him that the giving of notices was well within the powers of that sub-committee. The appointment and dismissal of teachers was clearly within the powers of the education authority, and on January 16 the education committee resolved that its powers with regard to economy should be delegated. The conclusion was irresistible that, both on behalf of the authority and of the education committee, the sub-finance committee was invested with the power and duty of deciding how economy was to be effected both in the general work of the council and in education. It could not be doubted that the education authority had authority to delegate its powers. The education committee had statutory powers of delegation under section 4 (5). He would have been prepared to hold to that effect, and it was satisfactory to find that the same view was taken by Lord Justice Buckley in Young v. Cuthbert (22 The Times L.R., 251; [1906] 1 Ch., 451).

Apart altogether from that, he was of the clear opinion that it was open either to the council or to the education committee to ratify what was done, and by the position which it had taken in this action the council had ratified it.

In the result there would be no order on the motions.

BRICE AND SONS v. CHRISTIANI AND NIELSEN.*

Contract — Hiring of crane-barge — Owners to insure crane against all risks—Accident not covered by policy—Claim by owners against hirers for damage to crane—Owners' breach of contract to insure—Failure of claim.

The defendants hired a crane-barge from the plaintiffs, one of the terms of the contract being that the plaintiffs would insure the crane against all risks, the defendants paying the premium. The plaintiffs accordingly took out a policy covering, as they thought, all risks. The crane, when proceeding to lift a load, broke away from its bedplate and fell over and was damaged. It was then found that the accident was not covered by the policy, and the defendants refused to pay for the damage. In an action for breach of contract,

Held, that though the defendants had failed to discharge the onus, which was upon them, of proving that what happened was not the result of negligence by their servants, yet, as the agreement in regard to insurance was intended to be an arrangement for the benefit of both parties, and as the accident came within the description "all risks" and the defendants had stipulated that they were not to bear those risks, the action failed.

The plaintiffs in this action claimed damages for an alleged breach of contract in relation to the hire of a crane-barge.

Mr. Raeburn, K.C., and Mr. Dickinson appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Dunlop, K.C., and Mr. Willink for the defendants.

The plaintiffs were barge owners at Rochester. They had a number of barges which were fitted with steam cranes, and which they used for lifting clay to be used in the manufacture of cement. They also let out crane-barges to other persons who wished to hire them for lifting purposes.

In March, 1927, the defendants, who were engineering contractors, had taken a contract to repair a jetty belonging to the Shell-Mex Company, at the mouth of the Thames. The jetty had been damaged by a steamer running into it, and the defendants required a crane to lift the damaged timbers. They hired a crane-barge from the plaintiffs at a charge of £30 a week, which was the charge the plaintiffs usually made for such a hiring. The crane was able to lift a weight of five tons.

On March 21, 1927, the crane began to work at the jetty, and work was continued without incident until March 31, when an accident happened which led to the present action being brought. A diver had been down among the wreckage, and the crane driver was ordered to lift the load, but nothing happened until the crane itself broke away from its bedplate and fell over, and was seriously damaged. The plaintiffs claimed damages, but the defendants refused to pay, on the ground that the damage should have been covered by insurance.

It had been part of the contract that the plaintiffs should insure the crane against all risks during the period of hiring by the defendants, and that the defendants should pay the premium for the insurance. The plaintiffs accordingly took out a policy covering, as they thought, all risks; but when the accident happened it was found that it was not covered by the policy. The defendants contended that a policy should have been taken out covering the risk of toppling over, which was usual in dealing with the insurance of cranes on land. The plaintiffs, however, said that with their many years' experience they had never heard of such an insurance on crane-barges.

Mr. RAEBURN submitted that the accident happened through the negligence of the defendants in setting the crane to try to lift something which was too heavy for it, and the burden of proof that they had not in fact been negligent was on the defendants, The Merchant Prince (8 The Times L.R., 430; [1892] P. 179, at p. 187). Even if the plaintiffs had taken out a toppling over policy and had recovered against the underwriters, the latter would have been subrogated to the rights of the plaintiffs against the defendants. Evidence having been called for the plaintiffs,

Mr. DUNLOP, for the defendants, submitted that there was no liability on the defendants under the contract. At an interview between the parties at which the hiring was arranged the defendants made it clear that they would not be responsible for any risks whatever, and the plaintiffs agreed to insure against all risks if the defendants would pay the premium. The defendants agreed to pay the premium, and consequently by the express contract they were free from all liability. At common law they would, as hirers, have been liable for negligence, but the terms of the contract excluded any such liability.

Further, on the facts, there was no negligence. The crane was hired to do work which was known to be difficult and dangerous. The defendants employed a skilled diver to go down and fix the hook of the crane on to the things which were to be lifted, and the work was done with proper skill and care.

Evidence was then called for the defence.

The diver, who said that he had had 30 years' experience, described the state of the jetty as a mass of débris, all crumpled up. He went down to prepare the lifts for the crane, and while on the bottom he had to saw through piles, loosen bolts, and break the material up. When he had got the parcel ready he fixed the hook and sling to it. He had to stand on the bottom of the river, and as it was quite dark he had to judge by feeling when the parcel was ready for lifting. This crane-barge was working from March 21 to March 31 without any trouble occurring.

Mr. DUNLOP submitted that when the accident happened the crane was doing just the work which was contemplated by the contract. It was not that the crane was set to lift something which was too heavy for a five-ton crane to lift; the parcel to be lifted was a proper one, but for some reason which nobody knew it apparently caught in the débris and would not come away. The diver had done his best in circumstances of great difficulty, and there was no negligence.

Apart from that, there was the insurance agreement between the parties, which was intended to cover both the risks which at common law would have been for the account of the hirers, and the risks for which the owners would have remained responsible. The policy which the plaintiffs eventually took out did not in fact cover all risks, but that was no affair of the defendants. If the insurance was not to relieve the defendants from liability for negligence, which was their only liability at common law, they were paying a premium for nothing. And if the plaintiffs did not insure as they undertook to do against all risks, the defendants could counterclaim for breach of contract.

Mr. RAEBURN replied. There was no clear, unambiguous provision in the contract to relieve the defendants from liability for the negligence of their servants.

MR. JUSTICE ROWLATT, in giving judgment, said that it was an interesting case, and in some respects by no means easy. The ordinary rule of law was that a person who hired the property of another and handed it back in a damaged condition was liable unless he could show that the damage had not been caused by negligence on his part. His Lordship stated the facts, and said that the work of a diver on the bottom of a river, moving in total darkness among wreckage, was really unimaginable to people who spent their time in a Law Court, but he had come to the conclusion that the defendants had failed to prove that what happened was not the result of negligence by their servants. If that was all, the action would succeed. But there was the point about insurance, and on that he must hold that the defendants were entitled to succeed.

The agreement was, "It has been agreed between us that you insure against all risks at our expense." Mr. Raeburn contended that that was an agreement solely for the benefit of the owners, that they were letting the crane-barge out for work which would involve unusual risk, but were only charging their usual hiring rate for it, and that they therefore wished to be protected by insurance. But in his (his Lordship's) view the proper construction of the agreement was that it was meant to be an arrangement for the benefit of both parties. The hirers were stipulating that they would not accept any responsibility, and if made for the benefit of both parties it was a very common-sense arrangement. So the only question really was whether this accident came within the description of "all risks." He was clearly of opinion that it did. The defendants would never have agreed to pay the premium for an insurance which would have left them liable; they knew that the undertaking would involve risks, and they refused to bear these risks themselves. On that ground, therefore, there must be judgment for the defendants.

His LORDSHIP then held that a sum which had been paid into Court in respect of the hiring was sufficient, and gave judgment for the defendants, with costs.

Court of Appeal.

1928. Feb. 16.

TURNER v. WATTS.*

Landlord and Tenant — Restrictions — Weekly tenancy — Determination — Agreement by tenant to purchase house — Rescission of agreement—Position of tenant—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 17), s. 12 (7).

By an agreement in writing dated August 28, 1926, the defendant, who was the weekly tenant of a house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied, agreed to buy it from the plaintiff, the landlord, for £900. The agreement also provided that the defendant acknowledged owing the plaintiff £63 10s. arrears of rent and that the plaintiff would accept £50 in settlement; that, until certain mortgages had been transferred from the plaintiff to the defendant, the plaintiff should remain in absolute ownership of the premises; and that, until the completion of the conveyance, the defendant, who was to remain in possession, should pay to the plaintiff interest on the £950 at the rate of 6 per cent. with interest on interest dating from September 1, 1926. The defendant also agreed to pay certain deposits, the plaintiff, on failure of such payments, to be entitled to rescind the agreement and enter into possession of the house. The defendant agreed to maintain the house in a good state of repair and to pay rates, taxes, and insurance.

On February 27, 1927, the plaintiff rescinded the agreement under the powers reserved in it and on the defendant's refusing to give up possession brought an action, claiming (inter alia) possession.

Held, (1) that the agreement of August 28, 1926, amounted to a surrender of the weekly tenancy previously held by the defendant, and (2) that the defendant was not protected by the Rent Restrictions Acts, because after the agreement of August 28, 1926, if the defendant remained in possession of the house as a tenant, she was a tenant at will at no rent and her tenancy came within s. 12 (7) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, being at a rent less than two-thirds of the rateable value and by reason of that subsection must be ignored and the plaintiff had an unrestricted right to possession.

Decision of the Divisional Court (44 The Times L.R., 105) affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Divisional Court (44 The Times L.R., 105) on an appeal from Bristol County Court. The plaintiff brought an action in the County Court for possession of certain premises and for arrears of rent and mesne profits.

The premises—529, Fishponds-road, Bristol—were a dwelling-house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied. By an agreement in writing dated August 28, 1926, the defendant, who was a weekly tenant at a rent of £1 2s. 2d. a week, agreed to buy the house from the plaintiff for £900. She remained in possession pending the completion of the purchase. The agreement was in force from its date to February 27, 1927, and on that day it was rescinded by the plaintiff in pursuance of a power reserved in the agreement. By the agreement the defendant acknowledged that she was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of £63 10s. arrears of rent and the plaintiff agreed to accept £50 in full settlement of that debt. The plaintiff agreed to sell and the defendant agreed to buy the house for £900 "together with £50, arrears of rent as aforesaid, making a total of £950."

Clause 4 of the agreement was: "That until suitable arrangements can be made for the transfer of the existing first and second mortgages from the vendor to the purchaser the vendor shall remain in absolute ownership of the premises and that until the completion of the conveyance the said Maud Watts [the defendant] will pay to the vendor interest on the aforesaid £950 at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum with interest on interest dating from the first day of September, 1926."

The defendant further agreed to increase, by monthly payments of £5, her deposits in two companies which were said to be second mortgagees of the house. If she should be more than 14 days in arrear with any of the deposits the plaintiff might forthwith rescind the purchase agreement and enter into vacant possession of the house. The defendant agreed to assign her dividends in those companies to the plaintiff as collateral security until the interest due to him under the agreement had been paid. The defendant agreed to pay all rates, taxes, insurance, repairs, and outgoings as from September 1, 1926, and to keep the house in good repair. The plaintiff undertook to procure a transfer to the defendant of the second mortgage as soon as the deposits should have been increased to £100, and after this the defendant was to enter into the unrestricted possession of the premises together with the conveyance subject only to any payments still due on mortgage or by way of interest under clause 4 of the agreement.

The County Court Judge gave the plaintiff judgment for possession. The Divisional Court held that the effect of the agreement, as indicating the intention of the parties, was to determine the weekly tenancy and to substitute for it either a licence or a tenancy at will which, in its turn, was revoked or determined by the rescission of the purchase agreement. The defendant, therefore, had no contractual right to resist the claim for possession. The Divisional Court held, further, that the defendant was not protected by the Rent Restrictions Acts. After August 28, 1926, the defendant remained in possession of the house by virtue of the contract of purchase and not as a statutory tenant. Under that contract she was either a licensee or a tenant at will. After its rescission, if she had been a licensee, she was not a tenant who had held over under the Acts; if she had been a tenant at will, her tenancy had been at no rent and, by section 12 (7) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, it must be ignored, with the result that the house was to be treated as untenanted and the plaintiff had an unrestricted right to recover possession of it.

The defendant appealed.

Mr. Cecil Havers appeared for the appellant; Mr. du Parcq, K.C., and Mr. W. G. H. Cook for the respondent.

Mr. Cecil Havers, for the appellant, said that two points only were relied on in the appeal. They were: (1) That the weekly tenancy had never been determined; and (2) that the defendant was protected by the Rent Restrictions Acts. The agreement of August 28, 1926, did not involve a surrender of the weekly tenancy previously held by the defendant. A surrender could only be made to the person in whom was vested the immediate legal reversion. It was for the plaintiff to satisfy the Court that the immediate legal reversion was vested in him. The plaintiff had mortgaged the house to two companies and, therefore, a surrender to the plaintiff would not be effective (see Robbins v. Whyte, 22 The Times L.R., 106; [1906] 1 K.B., 125). The evidence before the Court was that there were two mortgages on the house and if the plaintiff was going to rely on the doctrine of surrender the onus was on him to show that he had the legal estate.

Further, the contract of purchase was conditional on a good title being shown by the vendor. There was nothing in the agreement to exclude the usual implied condition with regard to title (see Doe d. Gray v. Stanion (1 M. and W., 695)). The question was whether it was the intention of the parties that there should be no surrender until the vendor had in fact made out a good title. On the true construction of the agreement of August 28, 1926, there was no agreement between the parties that the term should immediately come to an end. The parties did not intend that there should be an immediate surrender, but only when Mrs. Watts was entitled to her conveyance and obtained it (see per Baron Parke in Weddall v. Capes, 1 M. and W., 50, at p. 52).

But even assuming that there was a surrender of the weekly tenancy, the defendant was in possession of the house and was entitled to the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts. The learned Judges of the Divisional Court had followed Bracey v. Pales (43 The Times L.R., 69; [1927] 1 K.B., 818). The Divisional Court was wrong. Counsel referred to Barton v. Fincham (37 The Times L.R., 386; [1921] 2 K.B., 291); Joy v. Eppner (41 The Times L.R., 136; [1925] 1 K.B., 362); Waller and Son v. Thomas (37 The Times L.R., 325; [1921] 1 K.B., 541); and Jenkinson Wright (40 The Times L.R., 858; [1924] 2 K.B., 645).

Mr. du Parcq, K.C., and Mr. W. G. H. Cook for the respondent were not called upon.

Lord Justice Scrutton, in giving judgment, stated the facts and said that the case was an odd and complicated one. It had been clearly argued and had resolved itself into two questions, which were: (1) Whether the agreement of August 28, 1926, amounted to a surrender of the tenancy which the defendant previously held from the plaintiff; and (2) if there was a surrender of the tenancy, whether the defendant was entitled to the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts.

With regard to the question of the surrender of the tenancy, it was contended on behalf of the defendant that a surrender, to be effective, must be to the person entitled to the legal interest in the premises, and in this case the plaintiff was not the person entitled to the legal interest, because the premises were mortgaged and that the mortgagees had the legal interest in the premises. It was said by Mr. Justice Warrington (as he then was) in Robbins v. Whyte (22 The Times L.R., 106; [1906] 1 K.B., 125, at p. 130): "It is well settled that the surrender of a lease is good only if made to the person in whom the reversion expectant on the determination of that lease is vested, otherwise there will be no merger of the term. The result, therefore, is that, in my opinion, the surrender which purported to have been made on November 25, 1904, had no effect in law, and consequently that the lease is still subsisting, and the plaintiffs are accordingly entitled to the rent for which they now sue."

That point was not taken in the County Court, nor in the Divisional Court, and it would require more information than was at present before the Court to enable the Court to decide it. It depended on whether the mortgages were legal mortgages or equitable mortgages. Whatever they were, there were unusual features about them. The documents were not before the Court. This being a case, therefore, where, in order to determine the point, more information was required than was available, it fell within the rule of the Court which did not allow points to be taken on appeal that had not been taken in the Court below.

Then it was argued that on the construction of the document itself the agreement of August 28, 1926, did not amount to a surrender of the tenancy. It was an odd agreement, but he (Lord Justice Scrutton) must hold that it was a surrender of the weekly tenancy previously held by the defendant from the plaintiff.

Then it was said that, if the agreement of August 28, 1926, did surrender the weekly tenancy, the defendant was in possession of the house and was protected by the Rent Restrictions Acts. The answer given by the Divisional Court to that point was a sound one. If the defendant was in possession of the house as a tenant, she was a tenant at will, and at no rent, and her tenancy came within section 12 (7) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, as it was at a rent less than two-thirds of the rateable value ; and by reason of that subsection it must be ignored and the Rent Restrictions Acts did not apply to that tenancy but applied in respect of the dwelling-house as if no such tenancy existed or ever had existed.

For these reasons the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

LORD JUSTICE SANKEY, in concurring, said that two points had been taken on behalf of the defendant : (1) That the agreement of August 28, 1926, did not amount to a surrender of the tenancy ; and (2) that the defendant was protected by the Rent Restrictions Acts. The Divisional Court decided both points in favour of the plaintiff.

It was contended on behalf of the defendant that there could be no surrender of a tenancy except to a person having the legal interest in the premises and that the plaintiff in this case, having mortgaged the premises, did not possess the legal interest. Robbins v. Whyte (22 The Times L.R., 106 ; [1906] 1 K.B., 125) was relied on. But that point was not open to the defendant in this Court as he had not taken it in the Court below and it depended on documents which were not before the Court. Then it was said that the agreement of purchase did not operate as a surrender of the tenancy. But looking at the agreement as a whole and construing it, he (Lord Justice Sankey) was of the opinion that it was either an express surrender of the tenancy or a surrender by operation of law.

With regard to the question whether the defendant was protected by the Rent Restrictions Acts, he (the Lord Justice) had nothing to add to what had been said on that point by Lord Justice Scrutton.

MR. JUSTICE RUSSELL concurred.

BROOME v. AGAR.*

Defamation—Slander—Chauffeur giving "joy rides" in employer's motor-car—Verdict that words were not defamatory.

The plaintiff, a chauffeur formerly employed by the defendant, brought a slander action against the defendant, complaining that during his employment she had falsely alleged that he gave "joy rides" to women in her motor-car. The jury found that the defendant spoke the words but that they were not defamatory of the plaintiff. On an application for a new trial on the ground that the verdict was perverse and one which no jury could reasonably find,

Held, (Russell, J., dissenting), that it was for the jury to say whether the words did or did not constitute a slander, and their verdict must stand.

* Reported by E. J. M. CHAPLIN and T. W. MORGAN, ESQRS., Barristers-at-Law.

This was an application by the plaintiff for a new trial in a slander action brought by Mr. Alfred Broome, a chauffeur, of Chesham-place, S.W., against his late employer, Mrs. Mary Agar, widow, of 8, Balfour-place, W. The plaintiff complained that the defendant slandered him on two occasions in November, 1926, by falsely alleging that he gave "joy rides" to women in her Rolls-Royce motor-car. The defendant denied that she spoke the words complained of, and that they were defamatory of the plaintiff, and she pleaded privilege. Alternatively, she said that in their ordinary meaning the words were true in substance and in fact.

The jury found that the defendant spoke the words complained of, but that they were not defamatory of the plaintiff. Judgment was accordingly entered for the defendant.

The plaintiff applied for a new trial on the ground that the verdict was perverse and one which no 12 reasonable men could find.

Mr. Charles, K.C. (as he then was), and Mr. Rowland Thomas appeared for the appellant ; Mr. Gordon Alchin for the respondent.

LORD JUSTICE SCRUTTON, in his judgment, said :—This application for a new trial in a case tried before the Lord Chief Justice raises an important question as to the functions of the Judge and jury in a civil action for defamation. The plaintiff was formerly chauffeur to the defendant, an elderly and wealthy lady. There had been, apparently, some friction in the defendant's household. The French cook had sent an anonymous letter to her mistress accusing the chauffeur of driving a woman about in his mistress's car ; the lady's maid was apparently pointed at. The chauffeur left the service, and brought an action, not for wrongful dismissal, but for two slanders. The first alleged slander, as proved by the evidence, i.e., of the lady's maid, Edwards, for the plaintiff, was that the defendant, on being told that the plaintiff was out, said : "I expect he is out 'joy-riding' with my car now, Edwards. Broome (the plaintiff) is a 'rotter.'"

The second alleged slander was a statement by the defendant to a member of the Rolls-Royce establishment in Conduit-street, which had supplied the car and which supplied chauffeurs.

The Judge left to the jury the question : "Were the words complained of spoken by the defendant ?" and they answered "Yes." This must refer to the words alleged by the plaintiff's witnesses, not to the words pleaded, which were different, or to the words alleged by the defendant's witnesses. The Judge then left to the jury the question : "Were they defamatory of the plaintiff ?" to which the jury answered "No."

On this, the plaintiff's counsel moved for a new trial, alleging, in the language of Metropolitan Railway Company v. Wright (2 The Times L.R., 553 ; 11 App. Cas., 152, at p. 156), that the verdict was such as 12 reasonable men could not, or ought not to have, come to. See Solomon v. Bitton (8 Q.B.D., 176, at p. 177) ; and Webster v. Friedeberg (17 Q.B.D., 736, at p. 737). When asked whether he claimed that the Judge should have directed the jury to find that the words were defamatory, or have entered judgment for the plaintiff on the ground that the words were only capable of a defamatory meaning, he replied that he did not claim this, but only asked for a new trial in which the question should again be submitted to a jury.

Since Fox's Act of 1792 (32 Geo. III., c. 60), it has been a commonplace of civil procedure that "libel or no libel, since Fox's Act, is of all questions peculiarly one for a jury," per Lord Coleridge, C.J., in Saxby v. Easterbrook (3 C.P.D., 339, at p. 342). There are also the weighty words of Sir James Shaw Willes in Henwood v. Harrison (L.R., 7 C.P., 606, at p. 627) : "the jury in civil cases, equally as in criminal cases, are the proper tribunal to determine the question of libel or no libel. This was affirmed by the declaratory Act of 1792, and has been often recognized."

That this expressed the popular view at the time is shown by the ballad which, as Lord Mansfield quoted it in the judgment in Rex v. Shipley (4 Doug., 73, at p. 168), I also may venture to quote with approval :

"For Sir Philip well knows
His innuendos
Will serve him no longer
In verse or in prose ;
For twelve honest men have decided the cause,
Who are judges of fact, though not judges of laws."

It is true that Fox's Act in terms relates to criminal prosecutions, but it has been said to be "only declaratory of the Common Law." The Act allows the jury to find a general verdict of not guilty and relieves them from the necessity of finding the prisoner guilty on proof of the publication and innuendoes, the Judge finding whether the publication was a libel. To understand the Act one must look at the cases of Rex v. Withers (3 Term Rep., 428), Rex v. Dean of St. Asaph (3 Term Rep., 428, n), Rex v. Shipley (supra), and Rex v. Woodfall (5 Burr., 2661), as explained by Lord Blackburn in Capital and Counties Bank v. Henty (7 App. Cas., 741, at pp. 772 to 775).

The practice of the Judges generally had been to hold that the only questions for the jury were the publication, and the truth of the innuendoes ; libel or no libel, was a question for the Judge. The juries endeavoured to defeat this by finding general verdicts of not guilty, or verdicts of "guilty of publishing only." Mr. Justice Willes, in Shipley's case (supra) upheld the right of the jury to find innocence or criminality, libel or no libel, or to find a general verdict of not guilty though the Judge directed them that the document was a libel without being liable to any penal consequences. The Legislature by Fox's Act adopted the view of Mr. Justice Willes and negatived the view of Lord Mansfield, and it has been since a fundamental principle that libel or no libel is for the jury.

One restriction has indeed been made ; it is well established that if the Judge is of opinion that the words are not capable of a defamatory meaning he should withdraw the case from the jury. This restriction is in favour of the defendant ; it was conclusively established in Henty's case (supra), a striking case, where the publication of a circular that Henty would not take cheques of the bank, published at a time when another bank had failed, caused a run of a quarter of a million pounds on the plaintiff bank, and after great difference of judicial opinion the words were held not capable of a defamatory meaning. But it is a long step to pass from the power of a Judge to withdraw the case from a jury on the ground that he thinks that the words are not capable of a defamatory meaning to the position that, if a Judge or Judges think that words are only capable of a defamatory meaning, he or they can enter judgment for the plaintiff without a finding of the jury, or direct the jury to find that the words are defamatory, or keep on ordering a new trial because the jury will not return the verdict which the Judges think they ought to find. The Lord Chief Justice in the present case, when asked for a stay of execution, refused, saying : "The case was eminently one for the jury." I think that he took the correct view. I might have given a different verdict, but I am not the tribunal to answer the question. Libel or no libel is for the jury, if the words are capable of a defamatory meaning. As Lord Blackburn says in Henty's case (supra, at p. 771), "But, independently of all questions as to privilege, the manner of the publication, and the things relative to which the words are published, and which the person publishing knew, or ought to have known, would influence those to whom it was published in putting a meaning on the words, are all material in determining whether the writing is calculated to convey a libellous imputation. There are no words so plain that they may not be published with reference to such circumstances, and to such persons knowing these circumstances, as to convey a meaning very different from that which would be understood from the same words used under different circumstances." Such a question as whether, considering all the circumstances referred to by Lord Blackburn, the words proved by the plaintiff in this case had a defamatory meaning seems peculiarly fitted for the consideration of a jury, which, and not the Judge, is the tribunal appointed by the Constitution to determine them.

If the jury in this case had, as they had a constitutional right to do, declined to answer questions and found a general verdict for the defendant, in my view the Court could not possibly have interfered. It was said that there might be cases where the words were so clear that a verdict that they were not defamatory must be set aside. The instance given was : "He is a thief." Yet I see that where the words alleged ran (Thompson v. Bernard ; 1 Camp., 48), "T is a damned thief and so was his father before him and I can prove it. He received the earnings of the ship and ought to pay the wages," Lord Ellenborough withdrew the case from the jury. I agree with the view of the late Mr. Blake Odgers (Odgers on Libel, pp. 110 & 111) : "The proper course is for the Judge to define what is a libel in point of law and to leave it to the jury to say whether the publication in question falls within that definition. And this is a question pre-eminently for the jury ; whichever way they find, the Court will rarely, if ever, disturb the verdict, if the question was properly left to them." I hesitate to say that a case may never arise for interference, but I cannot think that the present case is one. There are very few cases where a jury having found "no libel" the Court has interfered with their verdict. In Levy v. Milne in 1827 (4 Bing., 195), a case of a satirical ballad on "Levy the Bum" where the jury found no libel, Chief Justice Best, who apparently took a very hostile view of Fox's Act, said that it did not apply to civil cases ; it only applied to criminal cases. Later authorities, however, treat the Act as only declaratory of the Common Law. Chief Justice Best treats a jury who found "no libel" against the direction of the Judge, as finding the law erroneously. It was this view of their functions, that of Lord Mansfield, that Fox's Act was intended to destroy. In Parmiter v. Coupland (6 M. & W., 105) where the Court held that the Judge need not direct the jury whether the publication was a libel in law, they set aside the verdict that it was "no libel" as wrong. But Baron Alderson said that the Judge would be wrong if he were to take upon himself to say that the words were a libel. I think the Court would be equally wrong to set aside the verdict of a jury of "no libel" because they, the Judges, thought it was a libel. In a recent case in the Privy Council, Rop v. Smith's Newspapers (unreported), the Court ordered a new trial in a case where the jury amongst other findings complained of had found "no libel," but the Australian Statute law seems to be different from the English law and it does not appear whether Fox's Act was called to the attention of the Court on this point. On the other hand in another Australian case (Australian Newspaper Company, Limited v. Bennett, [1894] A.C., 284) where a newspaper was called the "Evening Ananias" and the jury found for the defendants, the Court declined to interfere with the verdict, reversing the judgment of the Court below which had granted a new trial, Lord Herschell saying at page 288: "Whether a word is, in any particular instance, used, and would be understood as being used, for the purpose of conveying an imputation upon character must be for the jury."

In the present case the first alleged slander, using the words "joy riding" and "a rotter," and published only to the lady's maid who was supposed to be a partner in "joy riding," was, it appears to me, a matter peculiarly for the consideration of the jury as to "libel or no libel." The other slander, "using for private purposes," is in the same position. Whatever view I might have formed, I prefer to adhere to the view that "libel or no libel" is peculiarly a question for the jury; that only in the most extreme cases should the Judge allow his view to override that of the constitutional tribunal; and that the present is not such a case. The appeal should, in my opinion, be dismissed, with costs.

Lord Justice Sankey.—In this case the plaintiff, a chauffeur, sued his mistress for slander. The jury found that the words complained of were uttered, but were not defamatory. Thereupon the Lord Chief Justice entered judgment for the defendant. From that judgment the plaintiff appeals and asks for a new trial upon the ground that the words were of such a character that they could not be other than defamatory, that 12 reasonable men could not find otherwise and that therefore the verdict was perverse. The facts are as follows. The defendant, having received an anonymous letter informing her that a lady was driven about in her car in the evening, taxed the plaintiff with it and as a result of the interview gave him notice to leave her service. She then went to the garage of the Rolls Royce company to get another chauffeur. There she saw the company's senior salesman, Mr. Henderson, and said: "I am sorry to get rid of my present man as he has been a very good man and has been in my employment for quite a number of years, but it has recently come to my knowledge that he has been using my car for private purposes. When I challenged him with it he would neither admit it nor deny it, but was impertinent to me, and under these circumstances I had to get another man." The plaintiff afterwards saw Henderson and asked him whether there was any chance of his getting another job and was told that if he went to the garage superintendent he would be given a form which he should fill up and return. Subsequently the defendant said to one Florence Edwards, her maid, "I expect Broome is out joy-riding with my car now: Broome is a rotter: I could do no other under the circumstances than ask Broome to leave my service." The said Florence Edwards was in fact the person referred to in the anonymous letter. The statements made by the defendant to Henderson and Edwards contained the slander complained of. The plaintiff contends that the words meant and were understood to mean that the plaintiff had been guilty of a serious breach of duty in his service to her and guilty of grossly improper conduct as a chauffeur and was not a fit person to be entrusted with the responsibilities of a chauffeur, and that he had been guilty of a criminal offence. The question for decision remains, Is the plaintiff entitled to a new trial on the grounds above alleged? In my view it is not the law, which is well settled, but the application of it, which causes the difficulty in this case. The principles were laid down in Metropolitan Railway Company v. Wright (2 The Times L.R., 553; 11 App. Cas., 152) where Lord Halsbury said, at page 156: "If reasonable men might find . . . the verdict which has been found, I think no Court has jurisdiction to disturb a decision of fact which the law has confided to juries, not to Judges."

In Australian Newspaper Company, Limited v. Bennett ([1894] A.C., 284) the head note is: "In an action for libel, a jury of four by a majority found a verdict for the defendants; the Supreme Court set aside this verdict and ordered a new trial. Held, that this order must be discharged. There was evidence on which the jury could find that the defendants had not reflected upon the plaintiff's character. The use of the word 'Ananias' as applied to the plaintiff's newspaper did not necessarily impute wilful and deliberate falsehood to him; whether it was used extravagantly or for the purpose of conveying an imputation on the plaintiff was a question for the jury." Lord Herschell said: "Mr. Justice Windeyer observed in the course of his judgment that he admitted that the Court would only be justified in reversing the finding of the jury 'if their decision upon that point is such as no jury could give as reasonable men.' This is a correct statement of the law. Their Lordships have not, any more than the Court below had, to determine in the present case what is the conclusion at which they would have arrived, or what is the verdict they would have found. The only point to be determined is, whether the verdict found by the jury, for whose consideration it essentially was, was such as no jury could have found as reasonable men."

Since Fox's Act "libel or no libel" has always been held to be a question peculiarly one for a jury, and although Fox's Act applies to criminal law, it has for some years generally been thought that the law in civil actions for libel is the same as it was expressly enacted that it was to be in criminal cases, see per Lord Blackburn in Capital and Counties Bank v. Henty (7 App. Cas., 741, at p. 775).

What then are the proper functions of Judge and jury in an action for libel or slander? So far as the Judge is concerned it is for him to say whether the words complained of can, under the circumstances, bear a defamatory meaning. If they cannot, it is his duty to withdraw the case from the jury. It is not, however, open to the Judge to say that the words do bear a defamatory meaning, that is for the jury, but the jury must have evidence upon which they can found their verdict and if there is no evidence upon which they can find that the words were not defamatory, or if it can be conclusively proved that they have not exercised any reasonable discretion at all, an appellate Court may grant a new trial.

Cases can be found where a new trial has been so granted, but the circumstances are very exceptional, Levy v. Milne (4 Bing., 195), Parmiter v. Coupland (6 M. and W., 105), and Hakewell v. Ingram (2

C.L.R., 1397). In Levy v. Milne (supra), a case of libel, the jury before whom the cause was tried inquired whether a shilling would carry costs, and being answered in the affirmative found a verdict for the defendant. The Court granted a new trial, Chief Justice Best saying : "It is one of the most beautiful parts of our constitution, that when anything occurs in one tribunal which appears to be wrong, it may be afterwards corrected by another." In Parmiter v. Coupland (supra), also a case of libel, in the Hampshire Advertiser, on a former Mayor of Winchester, the Court granted a new trial upon the ground that the verdict was "unquestionably wrong," see the judgment of Baron Parke. In Hakewell v. Ingram (supra), another case of libel, the words were undoubtedly strong. Writing with reference to the plaintiff in relation to his wife it was stated : "She was compelled to resort to the police court for the little help which our glorious English constitution gives to the English wife and mother." The Court thought that it was clearly a libel and that the verdict was manifestly wrong, and granted a new trial, although Mr. Justice Maule delivered a strong dissenting judgment. On the new trial the jury found for the plaintiff, damages one farthing.

In libel there are fewer difficulties in the way of a new trial than in slander, for in the former case the words appear in print without the surroundings which may accompany the words in the latter case. Spoken words divorced from their context and surroundings may appear to be a slander but when controlled by such context and such surroundings may be nothing of the sort. Gesture, tone of voice, expression of countenance, all of which are absent in libel, may materially affect the spoken words. One recalls the instance of the lady who in a West End drawing room accused a noble Lord of being a thief, but when one is told that she said with a smile : "Lord X, you are a thief, you have stolen my heart," one recognizes that to call a person a thief is not necessarily actionable. In an action for slander a Judge is not entitled to say to the jury : "I direct you that the words spoken of are defamatory and your duty is to assess damages." As far back as 1701 Chief Justice Holt said in an Anonymous case (2 Salkeld, 644) : "The Court never, or very rarely, grants new trials in actions for words."

In the present case at any rate the question whether the words were defamatory was left to the jury, without objection, and rightly so in my opinion. Remembering to whom the words were spoken, Mr. Henderson, who was so little impressed by them that he offered to put the plaintiff on his waiting list, and Edwards, the defendant's confidential maid, who was the person referred to in the anonymous letter, remembering the whole of the conversation on each of the two occasions, and remembering that the question is not whether one would have come to the same conclusion one's self, I cannot say that the verdict was so unreasonable that it must be wrong and that it ought to be set aside as a verdict of 12 perverse men.

In slander actions the atmosphere created by the witnesses in the Court of first instance is quite different from the atmosphere created in the Court of Appeal by the transcript of the shorthand note. I do not forget that the defendant placed a plea of justification on the record, but that was only alternative to the plea of no slander upon which her advocate strongly and insistently relied.

The Lord Chief Justice when he was asked to grant a stay as to costs said that the question was eminently one for the jury ; and in my view we ought to be slow to set aside the verdict unless the case for doing so is clear and beyond argument. That onus is placed upon the appellant. In my opinion he has failed to discharge it and the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Mr. Justice Russell.—In this case I take a different view from the two Lords Justices, and having formed a strong opinion, I feel bound to express my reasons for it. The plaintiff Broome, a chauffeur, sued his employer (Mrs. Agar) for damages for slander. The alleged defamatory words were spoken on two occasions; on one occasion to a Mr. Henderson, on another occasion to a Miss Edwards. As to each alleged slander the defendant by her defence denied that she spoke the words, alleged that the words were incapable of bearing any defamatory meaning, and pleaded justification. Further, as regards one occasion she pleaded privilege. The case was tried before the Lord Chief Justice and a special jury. The Lord Chief Justice held that the occasion of the conversation with Henderson was privileged, and left five questions to be answered by the jury : viz. : (1) Were the words complained of spoken by the defendant ? (2) If so, were they defamatory of the plaintiff ? (3) Were they true in substance and in fact? (4) Were the words spoken to Mr. Henderson maliciously ? (5) Damages, if any ? The jury answered "Yes" to the first question and "No" to the second question. The jury did not answer the further questions and judgment was entered for the defendant with costs. The plaintiff appeals, asking for a new trial on the grounds that the jury's answer to the second question was perverse and unreasonable and that there was no evidence to support such a finding. In my opinion the application for a new trial ought to be granted. The jury's answer to the first question establishes this that as between the respective versions given of the two conversations they accepted the evidence of Mr. Henderson and Miss Edwards. There is therefore no doubt as to what it was that the defendant said on each of the two occasions.

After referring to the notes of the evidence of Henderson and Miss Edwards, His Lordship continued : To Henderson, therefore, the defendant stated that the plaintiff had been using her car for private purposes and alleged that fact as one of the circumstances which compelled her to get another man. To Edwards she used words suggesting that Broome went out joy riding in her car and stating that she could do no other in the circumstances than ask Broome to leave her service.

The words in their natural and ordinary meaning are words which accuse the plaintiff of using his employer's car for his private purposes, of course, without her consent ; for, if with her consent, no ground of complaint could arise. Are such words defamatory ? Unless circumstances existed which altered their ordinary meaning, they must, I should have thought, necessarily be defamatory ; they must, I should have thought, necessarily tend to injure the plaintiff in his calling of a chauffeur. I would adopt the language of the Lord Chief Justice in his summing up to the jury, viz., that they are "words which if they are true, would indicate that he had been unfaithful to his employer in one of the first duties of a chauffeur."

Now there is no ambiguity about the words in question. Taken alone, they have no alternative meaning. Apart from any attendant context or circumstances, no jury could, in my opinion, reasonably find that they were not defamatory of the plaintiff.

Nevertheless, as was said by Lord Blackburn in Henty's case (7 App. Cas., 741, at p. 771), "There are no words so plain that they may not be published with reference to such circumstances, and to such persons knowing these circumstances, as to convey a meaning very different from that which would be understood from the same words used under different circumstances."

In the present case, accordingly, it would be open to the jury notwithstanding the unambiguous meaning of the words used, to find in view of some outside circumstances or context (as indicated by Lord Blackburn) that the words as used in the present case were not defamatory. Such a finding would be a finding of fact and if founded upon some evidence which could reasonably support it this Court would not interfere, even though its finding would have been the other way. Having, however, carefully examined and considered the notes of the evidence in this case (and nothing turns in this connexion on the demeanour of the witnesses in the box) I can find no trace of any evidence or suggestion justifying the jury in departing from the natural meaning of the words used and finding them not defamatory.

The respondent acted on one or two matters which Lord Justice Sankey has referred to, but though relevant to the question of damages they are in no way relevant to the question whether the words used are defamatory. All the indications in the case show that the words were used seriously and in their natural sense and that the offence charged was no light matter. The defendant pleaded justification as to both slanders and persisted in those pleas throughout the trial. In giving particulars under those pleas she stated that the plaintiff had been guilty of breaches of duty in his service to her and guilty of improper conduct as a chauffeur.

No doubt the question whether the words were defamatory was a question for the jury, but their answer must be such as reasonable men could properly give. Their finding must have some foundation. Sic volo, sic jubeo, will not suffice.

There are not a few cases in the books which show that if a jury have found words to be defamatory which in the view of an appellate Court are clearly not defamatory the verdict can and ought to be set aside. Henty's case (supra) shows this. In that case the jury had in fact disagreed at the trial but upon an application by the defendants that judgment should be entered for them, the defendants obtained that relief because it was held that upon the words of the libel and the evidence given at the trial no jury could have been justified in finding that the defendants had published a libel concerning the plaintiffs (see per Lord Selborne, L.C., 7 App. Cas., at p. 750). In other words had the jury found for the plaintiffs their verdict must have been set aside. I see no reason why the same course should not be adopted if a jury finds words not to be defamatory and an appellate Court is satisfied that the words are unambiguous and clearly defamatory and that there is no evidence to justify the jury's finding. This course was adopted and a new trial ordered in Parmiter v. Coupland (6 M. and W., 105). That was a case of libel in which the jury had found for the defendants. A rule nisi for a new trial was obtained on the grounds (among others) that the Judge ought to have directed the jury that in point of law the publications complained of were libels on the plaintiff, and secondly, that he misdirected the jury by stating to them that there was a distinction as regards publications relative to public and private individuals. A new trial was refused on the ground of misdirection, but the rule was made absolute because in the opinion of the Court the imputations were unquestionably libellous and the verdict unquestionably wrong. Nor can I see any reason why the Court should be less competent or more reluctant to set aside a jury's finding as to defamation in a slander action than in a libel action, where (as here) the words used have been found and their meaning is plain and unambiguous. The findings of fact by a jury in a libel or slander action command no more reverence and are no more infallible than their findings of fact in any other action, and, if the material finding is wholly unsupported by any evidence, then the verdict is one which reasonable men could not properly find. The verdict ought to be set aside and the case tried afresh. It may be that new trials are rarely ordered in cases of slander, but in the present case the plaintiff has not had his claim properly investigated, owing to what I regard as a perverse answer by the jury.

He has suffered an injustice at their hands which this Court can and in my opinion should remedy. I would allow the appeal and order a new trial.

I need hardly add that I differ from the other members of the Court with regret, more particularly because upon the present conflict between common law and equity, equity does not prevail.

Court of Criminal Appeal. (Avory, Horridge, and Salter, JJ.) 1928. Feb. 27.

REX v. HAILWOOD.

REX v. HAILWOOD AND ACKROYD, LIMITED.*

Elections — Corrupt practices — Expenses incurred by unauthorized person — Three candidates—Opposition to one—No invitation to vote for particular candidate—Representation of the People Act, 1918 (7 and 8 Geo. V., c. 64), s. 34 (1).

By s. 34 (1) of the Representation of the People Act, 1918, "A person other than the election agent of a candidate shall not incur any expenses on account of holding public meetings or issuing advertisements, circulars or publications for the purpose of promoting or procuring the election of any candidate at a Parliamentary election, unless he is authorized in writing to do so by such election agent."

Held, that where there are three candidates and a person other than an election agent incurs such expenses without written authority for the purpose of opposing one of the three candidates but does not specifically invite voters to vote for a particular candidate, he nevertheless contravenes the sub-section since "any candidate" must be construed as including "any candidates" and such action must be deemed as having been intended to promote or procure the return of a candidate other than the one opposed.

* Reported by G. F. L. Bridgman, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

These were appeals against conviction of Mr. Ernest Arthur Hailwood and of Hailwood and Ackroyd, Limited, of Morley, Yorkshire, who were convicted last December at the Central Criminal Court of unlawfully incurring expenses for the purpose of promoting or procuring the election of a candidate at a Parliamentary election contrary to section 34 (1) of the Representation of the People Act, 1918. On conviction both the appellants were fined £10 and ordered to pay the costs of the prosecution.

Mr. Comyns Carr, K.C., and Mr. Walter Frampton appeared for the appellants; Mr. Roland Oliver, K.C., and Mr. Willoughby Williams for the prosecution.

Mr. CARR, in opening the appeal, said that Mr. Hailwood was a Conservative in politics who complained that the Government formed by his own party was not Conservative enough. He said that they had failed to carry out their promises to extend the Safeguarding of Industries Act, 1921, to additional industries and particularly to the glass industry in which he and Hailwood and Ackroyd, Limited, were concerned. He also opposed what was known as the "Flapper Vote." At the by-election at Brixton, S.W., last June, there were three candidates—Mr. Nigel Colman, the Conservative; Mr. Frederick Joseph Laverack, the Liberal; and Mr. James Adams, the Labour candidate. Both the Liberal and the Labour candidates must necessarily have been more distasteful to Mr. Hailwood than was the Conservative candidate. Mr. Hailwood took down some of his company's motor lorries, which were decorated with posters, and he also issued leaflets denouncing the Government.

Section 34 (1) of the Representation of the People Act, 1918, provided:—

"A person other than the election agent of a candidate shall not incur any expenses on account of holding public meetings or issuing advertisements, circulars or publications for the purpose of promoting or procuring the election of any candidate at a Parliamentary election, unless he is authorized in writing to do so by such election agent."

Section 34 (2) provided that any person who acted in contravention of the section should be guilty of a "corrupt practice" within the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883.

Mr. Hailwood undoubtedly invited the electors in various phrases to vote for any candidate except the Conservative, but he carefully abstained from inviting them to vote for any one of the other two candidates. In those circumstances he had not committed any offence under section 34 (1) of the Act of 1918. To render a man liable under that section there must be evidence that he did something which was intended to promote or to procure the election of a specific candidate. Mr. Hailwood had tried to prevent the election of a specific candidate. Where there were three candidates in an election, the fact that a person attacked one of them was not evidence of his promoting or procuring the election of either of the others. An alternative view of the matter was that Mr. Hailwood's design was merely to reduce the Conservative majority as a warning to his party.

MR. JUSTICE AVORY.—A majority may be reduced until it becomes a minority.

Mr. CARR, referring to the figures at the Brixton by-election, said that the Conservative candidate got in with a reduced majority.

The jury, said counsel, had to ascertain Mr. Hailwood's intention and he had said in evidence that he did not desire the election of either the Liberal or the Labour candidate, but only wished to "shake up" the Conservative party. Mr. Justice Talbot, in summing-up, however, failed to direct the jury properly on that point.

Counsel for the prosecution were not called on to argue.

MR. JUSTICE AVORY, in delivering the judgment of the Court, said that section 34 of the Act of 1918 was passed to put a stop to the practice of associations or persons, in order to promote or procure the election of a candidate, incurring expenses which had not been authorized by the agent of that candidate and which would never be included in the agent's return of expenses. The words "any candidate" in the section must be construed in the light of the Interpretation Act, 1889, as including "any candidates." If a person did what the section forbade to promote or to procure the election of any candidates there could be no question that he committed an offence under the section.

If the jury had neglected to find that what had occurred in the present case was done to promote the election of the candidates, or one of them, other than the Conservative candidate, they would have been neglecting their duty. The nature of the posters and leaflets issued by Mr. Hailwood showed that their purpose was to prevent the election of the Conservative candidate. The only possible construction to put on those documents was that they invited the voters to vote for one of the other candidates. There could be no question that Mr. Hailwood must have done what he did intending to promote the election of a candidate other than the Conservative candidate.

The summing-up of the Judge seemed to be more favourable to the defence than it need have been, because he did not tell the jury, as he might have, that it did not matter what was the dominant motive in Mr. Hailwood's mind, but that if what he did would necessarily have the effect of promoting the return of some candidate other than the Conservative candidate he must be taken to have intended that natural consequence.

HAIN STEAMSHIP COMPANY, LIMITED v. BOARD OF TRADE.*

Ship—Collision—War or marine risk—Meaning of "warlike operation."

During the war a steamer belonging to the respondents was requisitioned by the Shipping Controller under a charterparty providing that the Crown should be liable for all consequences of warlike operations but that the owners were to bear the marine risks. After the Armistice the steamer, when still under requisition, was on a voyage with a mercantile cargo of oats and collided at night with another steamer which had been requisitioned by the United States Government and which was taking mines back to America as they were no longer required for the purposes of the war. The collision was caused by the negligent navigation of both steamers, and the respondents' steamer was off hire for 99 days as the result of the damage which she suffered.

Held, that as hostilities had ceased the mine-carrying steamer was not engaged in a warlike operation, and the Crown was not liable.

This special case stated by an arbitrator raised once more the old question whether injuries suffered by a requisitioned ship were or were not the consequence of a warlike operation. The arbitrator had held, subject to the opinion of the Court, that the injuries were the consequence of warlike operations, and that the shipowners were entitled to recover damages against the Crown.

The Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. Russell Davies appeared for the Crown; Mr. Dunlop, K.C., Mr. Balloch, and Mr. Sanford Cole for the respondent shipowners.

The Attorney-General, in opening, said that in 1917 a steamer, the Trevanion, belonging to the Hain Steamship Company, was requisitioned by the Shipping Controller under the charterparty T.99 which provided in effect that the Crown should be liable for all consequences of warlike operations while the owners continued to take the marine risks. In December, 1918, after the Armistice had been signed, the Trevanion was on a voyage from the United States with a cargo of oats, and a steamer, the Roanoke, which had been requisitioned by the United States Government, was on a voyage from England to the United States with a cargo of mines which, as peace had been declared, were no longer required for carrying on hostilities in European waters. On the night of Christmas Day the steamers came into collision in mid-Atlantic, and the Trevanion was so much damaged that she was off hire for 99 days. The collision was due to the fact that both steamers were being negligently navigated at the time.

The arbitrator considered that he was bound by the decisions in the Geelong case, Commonwealth Shipping Representative v. Peninsular and Oriental Branch Service (39 The Times L.R., 133; [1923] A.C., 191); and the Warilda case, Attorney-General v. Adelaide Steamship Company, Limited (39 The Times L.R., 333; [1923] A.C., 292), and held that the collision was a consequence of warlike operations, and that therefore the Crown was liable to pay the owners of the Trevanion.

The Board of Trade had succeeded to the Shipping Controller, and the Board now appealed against the award.

The Attorney-General submitted that no case had gone so far as to say that where two ships were in collision, one of them on a warlike operation and the other not; where the collision was due to the negligence of both; and where the ship claiming damages was the one which was not on a warlike operation, the claim could succeed. The burden of proving that a vessel was engaged in a warlike operation was on the claimant; and the Trevanion was carrying an ordinary mercantile cargo of oats and was obviously not on a warlike operation. The only question, therefore, was whether the Roanoke was engaged on a warlike operation. He submitted that she was not, on the authority of the Commonwealth case (supra). The test was whether the cargo was being taken to some place for the purpose of waging war. If it was not, the ship carrying it was not on a warlike operation. Even if the Roanoke was engaged on a warlike operation, the proximate cause of the collision was not that operation but the negligence, and the collision was not a consequence of a warlike operation.

Mr. Dunlop submitted that the accident was a consequence of a warlike operation. There was no precise test of what was a warlike operation, and each case must be decided on its own facts. The first thing to be considered was what was the status of the ship and the persons in charge of her. The Roanoke was a warship, and was manned by a United States naval crew. One must consider what was the character of the work which the ship was doing at the material time. The existence of a state of war was not essential, but, in fact, the Armistice did not put an end to the state of war. Lord Justice Atkin's observation that almost any movement of a warship in the course of her duties in time of war was a warlike operation had been approved by the House of Lords. The taking of these mines back to America was as much a warlike operation as the original bringing of them to Europe.

The function of the vessel must be considered as a whole. A warlike operation need not be of a combatant character, and the work being done might be only incidental to the fighting. The only difference between this case and those which had been decided was that this collision occurred after the Armistice; but that, he submitted, was quite immaterial. The real test ought to be whether the vessel was engaged in a war errand. If the Roanoke was engaged in a warlike operation, the fact of negligence on the part of one or both of the ships would have no effect.

The Attorney-General replied. The question was not whether the ship had been engaged in a warlike operation, but whether it was engaged in a warlike operation when the accident occurred.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt stated the facts, and said that his judgment must be in favour of the Crown. The Armistice did not put an end to the War, nor did it necessarily put an end to all warlike operations, but so far as this ship was concerned the Armistice did put an end to hostilities. The Roanoke was simply going back to America; she was not engaged in hostilities of any kind, nor was she doing anything to serve the purpose of hostilities. Unless, therefore, it could be said that a warship was always engaged in warlike operations, the case was really unarguable. In fact, a warship was not always engaged in warlike operations, even in time of war.

He therefore gave judgment for the Crown on the ground that the Roanoke was not engaged in a warlike operation, and the question whether the collision was a consequence of a warlike operation did not really arise.

COX v. NATIONAL UNION OF FOUNDRY WORKERS OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.*

Trade Union—Rules—Alleged invalid alteration—Action for injunction—Benefits—No right in member to sue—Internal affairs of union—No power in Court to interfere—Trade Union Act, 1871 (34 and 35 Vict., c. 31), s. 4.

* Reported by E. K. Corrie, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In this action Mr. Walter Cox, of Mornington-street, Deptford, a member of the National Union of Foundry Workers of Great Britain and Ireland, asked for a declaration that resolutions passed by the national executive council of the union altering rules 33 and 34 of the rules of the union were ultra vires, and injunctions to restrain the union from acting upon these resolutions. Rules 33 and 34 dealt with the benefits to be conferred on members for the purposes of superannuation and funeral expenses.

In 1873 the plaintiff joined the Friendly Society of Iron Founders, which was subsequently amalgamated with the defendant union. The plaintiff worked continuously at his trade until the end of 1921, when he ceased working, being then 66 years old. Under the rule hereinafter mentioned he received a weekly superannuation allowance of 7s. 6d. until January 10, 1927, when, under the resolution of the national executive council, the allowance was reduced to 5s. a week.

By rule 4 (3) of the rules of the union the national executive council was not permitted to make new rules, and no amendment of the rules was to be made except by the vote of members or by the rules revision committee to be set up under rule 44.

By rule 33 provision was made for the payment of superannuation benefit, under which the plaintiff had become entitled to 7s. 6d. a week. That rule could not be altered except by a consent of five-sixths of the members on a vote. By rule 34 it was provided that on the death of a member certain sums as set out in the schedule to the rules should be paid for funeral expenses.

On January 4, 1927, the national executive council passed resolutions that the superannuation allowance under rule 33 and the payments for funeral expenses should be reduced by one-third.

The plaintiff then brought this action for a declaration that the resolutions were ultra vires, and injunctions to restrain the carrying out of these resolutions.

The defendant union contended that the resolutions were not intended to alter the rules, but were only a matter of administration, as at present the financial position of the union was such that it could not afford to pay the full superannuation benefit. The defendants also said that the plaintiff was not entitled to bring this action, as under section 4 of the Trade Union Act, 1871, no action could be brought by a member to recover benefits, and that it was held in McLuskey v. Cole (38 The Times L.R., 20 ; [1922] 1 Ch., 7) that an injunction would not be granted to restrain the enforcement of a resolution when an action could not be brought under section 4. In any event, Russell v. Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners (28 The Times L.R., 276 ; [1912] A.C., 421) decided that such an action would not lie against a trade union in its registered name.

Mr. Quass appeared for the plaintiff ; Sir Henry Slesser, K.C., and Mr. Arthur Henderson for the defendants.

The facts were admitted between the parties.

Mr. Henderson called Mr. Robert Tilling, the general secretary of the union, who produced the report to the members of April, 1927, which gave the balance-sheet as at December, 1926. It showed that there was an overdraft at the bank of £27,000, and that there was due on loans from other unions £33,000, and to the General Federation of Trade Unions £10,900. All the securities of the union were pledged to the bank.

Sir Henry Slesser said that, in addition to the liabilities shown in the balance-sheet, the union was being pressed in December, 1926, by the Minister of Labour to put its finances in a better position, as the union had been unable for five years to pay its contribution to the Unemployment Fund, and unless that could be done the unemployment payment to the members of the union would not be made. No doubt it was hard on the plaintiff to lose 2s. 6d. a week, but the reduction was the only means by which the finances could be improved. The number of members who would have been injured by the cessation of unemployment payments was greatly in excess of those who received superannuation allowances. These allowances were paid out of the general funds of the union, which arose from the contributions of members, and no contributions were paid by the superannuated persons. Nor could the unemployed members make their contributions unless they received unemployment benefit.

Mr. Quass said that the plaintiff made no suggestion of mala fides against the union. The rules were made under statutory authority and had to provide for the objects of the union and the means of enforcing the rules. The Court had power to construe the rules and to see whether there were proper provisions as to altering them. The defendants did not suggest that they had not sufficient funds to pay the plaintiff the full 7s. 6d. a week, and that being so he was entitled to receive it. If the declaration and injunction asked for were granted the council of the union would take the proper steps to alter the rules. He submitted that the plaintiff was entitled to bring the action.

Mr. Justce Astbury, in giving judgment, reviewed the circumstances, and said that it was no doubt a hard case as far as the plaintiff and other old members were concerned. The resolutions were temporary while the finances of the union did not admit of payments in full, and it was to be hoped that the full payments would be resumed. The council had not purported to alter the rules. In December, 1926, the union was in a serious financial position, and negotiations had taken place between the Minister of Labour and the union in respect of the non-payment of the unemployment contribution. All this was shown in the January report to the members.

Matters in the foundry trade were very bad and the number of unemployed members was very large. If unemployment benefits were not paid there would be no contributions and the union must come to an end. The council had, by resolution, increased the amount of contribution, which they were entitled to do under the rules. It was better for the plaintiff to receive 5s. a week than nothing at all.

In his (his Lordship's) opinion the resolutions were not alterations of the rules, the temporary arrangement made by them was not ultra vires, and the Court had no right to interfere with the internal affairs of the union (MacDougall v. Gardiner, 1 Ch.D., 13). In any event, the plaintiff could not have obtained relief in this action owing to section 4 of the Trade Union Act, 1871. It was admitted that the plaintiff could not sue for his benefits. If the effect of the injunction asked for were not to obtain the benefits for the plaintiff it would be useless. On both grounds the action failed, and must be dismissed, with costs.

A. AND C. BLACK, LIMITED, v. CLAUDE STACEY, LIMITED.*

Copyright—Work of reference—Biographies—Supply of information—Meaning of "author"—Copyright Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V., c. 46), s. 5.

Where the compiler of a biographical book of reference receives from the biographees information to be used as material from which the book may be compiled, the persons supplying the information are not, for the purposes of the Copyright Act, 1911, the authors of the paragraphs containing the information.

This was an action in which the plaintiffs, A. and C. Black, Limited, of Soho-square, W.1, suing as the owners of Who's Who, alleged that the defendants, Claude Stacey, Limited, of Chancery-lane, W.C., had infringed their copyright therein by publishing a compilation entitled Men of the West, which contained a large number of biographies, being reproductions, in whole or in part, of biographies contained in Who's Who for 1925 and 1926. They claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants from publishing Men of the West or from otherwise infringing their alleged copyright in Who's Who, delivery up of all materials intended to be used for such publication, and damages for alleged infringement of copyright and for alleged conversion of infringed copies.

In and since the year 1897 the plaintiffs had sent out a printed questionnaire to all whose names appeared in Who's Who, and when once an entry had appeared in that book it was kept up to date by sending out for correction to each person concerned a print of the entry referring to him in the current edition.

It was the practice also of the defendants to send out a questionnaire, but in cases where it was brought to their notice that any particular information for which they asked already appeared in Who's Who, they took the entry from Who's Who and sent it to the person concerned, who corrected it.

The defendants contended that the facts stated in the biographies in Who's Who were not compiled by the plaintiffs, but were autobiographies written in each case by the person concerned, without any consideration being given by the plaintiffs; and that the plaintiffs published them with the licence of such person, who, in each case, was the author of such autobiography and the owner of the copyright therein. They also contended that any reproduction made by them from Who's Who was, in each case, made with the licence of the person concerned.

Mr. Macgillivray appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. W. Arnold Jolly for the defendants.

MR. MACGILLIVRAY referred to persons whose names appeared in Who's Who as "biographees."

MR. JUSTICE TOMLIN.—Is that a word recognized by the Oxford Dictionary?

MR. JOLLY.—Yes, my Lord.

During Mr. Macgillivray's argument, Mr. JOLLY said that reproductions from Who's Who were made only at the direction of biographees concerned.

MR. JUSTICE TOMLIN.—Are you saying, Mr. Jolly, that persons who take what they may not take can say in defence that they did so at the direction of others? I should have thought that it had been established at a very early stage of human history that that is a bad defence.

Mr. JOLLY.—I hope to show your Lordship that the copyright in the entries in Who's Who is not in the plaintiffs, but is in the particular biographee in each case.

Mr. Edward Black, managing director of the plaintiff company since 1914, gave evidence that the firm of A. and C. Black, Limited, acquired the copyright in Simpkin and Co.'s Who's Who in 1896, and brought out an edition in 1897, that edition being prepared by sending out questionnaires. Previous editions had contained no biographies, only lists of names. The witness identified a form of questionnaire filled up by Mr. Harold Spender in 1901 as being, in substance, the form of questionnaire sent out by the plaintiffs from 1897. When returned, the forms were edited. Proofs of reprints as edited were sent to biographees. In all cases biographees were given the opportunity of supplying further information. All editing was done by employees of the company, and under the direct supervision of the witness.

In cross-examination, the witness admitted that all information in such publications as Who's Who in Art, Who's Who in Literature and other publications had been compiled by reference to Who's Who, and that the plaintiff company had never objected to their being so compiled. The plaintiff company did not alter the substance of facts given by biographees.

Mr. John Douglas Newth, employed by the plaintiff company as a member of their literary staff for the last two years, said that he had examined Men of the West and had compared it with Who's Who for 1924. In 87 cases he had found that the entries were, in substance, the same. Out of 633 entries in Men of the West, 353 were to be found in Who's Who for 1924.

Mr. MACGILLIVRAY submitted that there was a clear case of infringement of copyright within the authorities. This was nothing more than a "directory" case. The collection was merely one of items of information, and anyone wishing to make a similar compilation must go about it in his own way (Kelly v. Morris, L.R., 1 Eq., 697). He must go to the source to get the information. Having compiled it from his own information, he could check it with other compilations, and, if he found discrepancies, must submit them to the person who gave the information. See also Morris v. Ashbee (L.R., 7 Eq., 34); Morris v. Wright (L.R., 5 Ch., 279); Cox v. Land and Water Journal Company (L.R., 9 Eq., 324); Weatherby and Sons v. International Horse Agency and Exchange, Ltd. (26 The Times L.R., 527; [1910] 2 Ch., 297); H. Blacklock and Co., Ltd. v. C. Arthur Pearson, Ltd. (31 The Times L.R., 526; [1915] 2 Ch., 376).

The mere collection of information was the subject of copyright in a case of compilation.

The defendants then proceeded to call their evidence.

Mr. George Haynes Stacey, the managing director of the defendant company, said that the compilation of Men of the West was begun in or about August or September, 1924. Copies of a prospectus were sent to local celebrities, and their names were taken from all Kelly's directories for the West of England. The names were arranged in lists according to counties. There were between 18,000 and 20,000 names, all of which were indexed. Between 70 and 80 publications were collected, and from these all references to all men associated with the West of England were cut out. From the cuttings rough biographies were made, which were sent to the biographees to be brought up to date. They were then edited and fair copies were sent to the biographees, who sometimes received the entries seven or eight times.

* Reported by K. R. A. HART, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

MR. JUSTICE TOMLIN.—The men of the West must be a very patient lot.

The witness said that questionnaires were sent only to those whose names, so far as he could gather, did not appear in any other biographical work. Between 10,000 and 12,000 were sent out.

The witness said that, in taking facts from Who's Who he did so under the impression that such facts were public property. He did not, in all instances, prepare the biographical sketches, but he edited them when received. It never occurred to him that any person owned copyright in any of the entries in Who's Who. All persons to whom requests for information about themselves were sent told him to refer to the usual books of reference.

There was one case in which a questionnaire sent out by the defendants had been answered. That questionnaire, when filled in, was handed over to the defendants' staff to compile a biographical sketch from it, and that sketch when compiled was submitted for approval.

In cross-examination the witness said that the rough draft was compiled from the completed questionnaire and not from Who's Who.

The witness did not admit that any information contained in the filled-in questionnaire and not contained in Who's Who was omitted from Men of the West because it was not in Who's Who. Any such omissions were merely clerical errors.

Mr. John Thomas Alden, engaged as assistant editor in the compilation of Men of the West, gave evidence on behalf of the defendants. He said that entries were cut out from various publications and were pasted on slips. Cuttings from different publications about the same person were all pasted on the same slip, which would go to the typing department after rectification by Mr. Stacey. The witness interviewed biographees to obtain information. The defendants also employed other persons to interview biographees, and Mr. Stacey interviewed some of them himself, the witness accompanying him on occasions.

Mr. JOLLY, for the defendants, said that, although the plaintiffs might have some copyright in Who's Who as a whole, they had none in any individual biography. The analogy of a directory was completely misleading, as a directory was made by house-to-house collections.

MR. JUSTICE TOMLIN.—That is not in accordance with one's personal experience of what is left on the doorstep. They leave slips to be filled up.

Mr. JOLLY.—That may be a modern practice.

MR. JUSTICE TOMLIN.—I am dealing with modern times. I am not going back to the Middle Ages.

Mr. JOLLY.—I am going back to Kelly v. Morris (supra) and similar cases. If I write the information for the compiler's representative, who interviews me on my doorstep, the copyright is in me.

MR. JUSTICE TOMLIN.—And if my parlourmaid interviews him on the doorstep and, being particularly polite, says, "I will write the information for you," then——

Mr. JOLLY.—The copyright is in the parlourmaid.

Counsel referred to section 5 of the Copyright Act, 1911. The person who furnished and wrote the information was the author.

MR. JUSTICE TOMLIN.—There must be an element of common sense used here. According to you, there are 600 owners of copyright in Who's Who. If you are right, it means that the publisher has no right whatever to make any alteration in what is submitted to him by a biographee.

Mr. JOLLY.—All that the questionnaires of the type which have been discussed in this case do is to bring certain points to the mind of the biographee (see Macmillan and Co., Limited v. Cooper, 40 The Times L.R., 186).

MR. JUSTICE TOMLIN.—The only point here is whether, when a man alters things in certain circumstances, he has a right to do so under the Copyright Act, 1911. The information was given for the purpose of compilation. The person who gives such information is not an author. If a man comes to my house and asks me when I was born and I tell him, the fact of my having given him the information, whether I write it or say it, does not make me an author within the meaning of the Copyright Act, 1911.

Mr. JOLLY said that the case against the defendants was merely based on the fact that Mr. Stacey preferred to use the exact language in Who's Who rather than that of the biographee in the questionnaire. But the alleged copyright must depend either on the arrangement of the facts or on the language in which they were expressed. The defendants had used neither the arrangement nor the expressions employed in Who's Who. It was, however, impossible for the defendants to escape the fact that entries in Who's Who were used by them as a basis. Suppose, however, that Who's Who applied to a poet for details of his career and he wrote a description of his career in the form of a sonnet, your Lordship, according to my friend, would have to hold that the compilers of Who's Who were the authors of the sonnet.

MR. JUSTICE TOMLIN.—I shall not consider that point until an edition of Who's Who appears in verse.

Mr. MACGILLIVRAY, in reply, said that the question of authorship of separate entries was decided in James Nisbet and Co., Limited v. The Golf Agency (23 The Times L.R., 370). In the present case copyright was claimed, not for any literary expression, but for a compilation of information.

MR. JUSTICE TOMLIN.—You are only dealing with a certain number of limited cases, and you do not want to destroy the book. You do not want delivery up of the whole of the book?

Mr. MACGILLIVRAY.—No; but I am entitled to delivery up of that part of the book which infringes my copyright, Byrne v. Statist Company, Limited (30 The Times L.R., 254; [1914] 1 K.B., 622).

MR. JUSTICE TOMLIN, in giving judgment, said that having heard the witnesses and having carefully examined 15 entries, he was satisfied that the 15 cases were the result of a process in which the defendants had made a use of the entries in Who's Who which they were not entitled to make. They had at first, very properly, sent out questionnaires, but were discouraged from that practice by being continually referred to Who's Who. From the evidence, it was plain that they took the information in Who's Who and, with minor alterations, made use of it. In some cases it was quite plain that the extract from Who's Who had been used. One man filled in a questionnaire in language quite different from that in Who's Who, and the defendants did not use the questionnaire as filled in, but the entry in Who's Who. It was impossible not to come to the conclusion that the entries in this and in all the 15 cases in Men of the West was based on those in Who's Who.

He did not propose at the present stage to shut out the defendants from saying that this was not true in regard to all the 87 entries. The compiler of such a book as Who's Who was given information only as material from which the book might be compiled. Those who supplied the information were not the authors of the paragraphs containing it for the purposes of the Copyright Act, 1911.

The case was covered by James Nisbet and Co. v. The Golf Agency (23 The Times L.R., 370). The defence, therefore, failed and the action succeeded, the plaintiffs being entitled to an injunction in the terms asked for, but limited to the books containing passages taken, or only colourably altered, from Who's Who. They were also entitled to delivery up of copies of Men of the West containing infringing passages. There would be an inquiry as to damages. The Court must not be taken to be saying that the plaintiffs were entitled to delivery up of the whole of the publication known as Men of the West.

HANSFORD v. LONDON EXPRESS NEWSPAPER, LIMITED.*

Insurance (Accident) — Death — Exception — Assured not to be in charge of any vehicle — Bicycle—Whether a vehicle.

The Court held that a bicycle was a "vehicle" within the meaning of that word in an accident insurance policy containing the condition that at the time of the accident the assured should not be in charge of any vehicle.

This was a special case stated by an arbitrator in which the question to be decided was whether a bicycle was a "vehicle" within the meaning of a clause in the conditions of a newspaper insurance scheme.

Mr. Tristram Beresford appeared for the claimant; Mr. Malcolm Hilbery for the respondents.

The claimant was administratrix of the estate of one John Ernest Hansford, deceased, and claimed to be entitled as his legal personal representative to an accident benefit under the Daily Express Great Free Insurance Scheme, by which registered readers of the Daily Express were insured against death by accident. In the arbitration the respondents admitted:—

(a) The claimant was the administratrix of the deceased man, who died on December 13, 1926. (b) On that date, about 5.15 p.m., the deceased man was walking, pushing his bicycle along the Wickham-road, Shirley, Surrey, and returning from his work to his home, when he was run over from behind by a motor-lorry and thereby sustained personal injuries from which he died on the same date. The bicycle had a light on it at the time of the accident, but the lamp was not lit. (c) At the time of the accident the deceased man was a registered reader of the Daily Express, and, as such, was entitled to the benefits of an insurance scheme known as the Daily Express Free Accident Insurance in accordance with the terms and conditions indorsed on the registration certificate dated November 20, 1924. (d) All requirements as to claim within the correct period and as to proof of identity had been complied with.

The material conditions of the insurance scheme were as follows:—

"Accidents of Travel and Lifts.

"(2) £1,000 if the reader shall be killed solely and directly by accident (a) to a passenger steamer or to a public omnibus, tramway-car, cab, carrier's cart, charabanc, or to any road vehicle. . . .

"Accidents in the Streets.

"(6) £250 in case of death of the reader if he or she shall while a pedestrian (a disabled ex-Service man in a self-propelled vehicle shall be deemed to be a pedestrian) in a thoroughfare open for use by the public be killed by accidental impact with a moving vehicle. . . .

"(7) £3 per week . . . should such accident render the reader temporarily and totally unable to follow his or her usual vocation. Provided as regards (6) and (7) that the reader be not at the time of the accident in charge of any vehicle or engaged in loading or unloading or attending to any vehicle. . . .

"(8) £250 if the reader shall be killed by an accident happening to a private horse-drawn vehicle or private motor-car or a sidecar attachment to a motor-cycle in which he or she is being driven solely for pleasure, or provided he or she is the owner thereof whilst driving such vehicle or motor-car solely for pleasure. . . . Provided that such motor-car or motor-cycle is being driven by a duly licensed driver.

"Cycling and Motor-Cycling Accidents.

"(9) £250 in case of death of the reader if he or she shall be accidentally killed while riding a bicycle, tricycle, or motor-cycle solely for pleasure, but including journeys to and from the reader's usual place of business." . . .

On the back of the policy were a number of conditions, including one as follows:—

"No compensation shall be payable for any accident happening while the reader is riding upon a luggage or pillion carrier of a cycle or motor-cycle or while a reader is entering or attempting to enter or leaving or attempting to leave any vehicle."

The arbitrator found as facts:—

(1) That the deceased man worked at a place about two miles from his home;

(2) that his bicycle was out of order on the evening of the accident;

(3) that he so informed a fellow workman when starting for home about 5 p.m., and that when he so informed his fellow workman he was wheeling his bicycle;

(4) that the time when and the place where the accident occurred were consistent with his having walked the whole way from his work.

It was contended for the claimant that the deceased man was at the time of the accident "riding a bicycle" within the meaning of clause 9, although at the moment he was wheeling the bicycle; and, alternatively, that he was a pedestrian within the meaning of clause 6, and not "in charge of any vehicle" within the meaning of clause 7.

It was contended for the respondents that the deceased was not "riding a bicycle" within the meaning of clause 9 and that he was a pedestrian who was "in charge of a vehicle" within the meaning of clause 7.

The arbitrator found (1) that the deceased man at the time of the accident was not "riding a bicycle" within the meaning of clause 9; (2) that he was at such time a "pedestrian" within the meaning of clause 6 ; and (3) that at such time he was "in charge of a vehicle" within the meaning of clause 7.

The question for the opinion of the Court was whether a bicycle was a "vehicle" within the meaning of clause 7 of the conditions.

In the course of the argument Harper v. Associated Newspapers, Limited (43 The Times L.R., 331) was referred to.

MR. JUSTICE ROWLATT, in giving judgment, said that the only question for the Court was whether a bicycle was a "vehicle" within the meaning of that word in clause 7. Mr. Beresford contended that it was not, though he admitted that, apart from that particular clause and in general speech, it might well be so. The insurance was not a general scheme of insurance against accidents, but was a group of insurances against particular kinds of accidents occurring in particular circumstances. Many accidents were not covered. Reading the provisions of the policy together he could not see any reason for putting a limitation on the meaning of the word "vehicle," and he held that the word included a bicycle. The award was, therefore, right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

BROOKS AND OTHERS v. LIFFEN.*

Landlord and Tenant—Restrictions—Decontrol—Dwelling-house—Rent less than two-thirds of rateable value—Tenant in occupation on July 31, 1923—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 17), s. 12 (7)—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923 (13 and 14 Geo. V., c. 32), s. 2 (1).

A tenant of a dwelling-house under a 98 years' lease at a rent which was less than two-thirds of the rateable value of the house was in possession of the house at the passing of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923.

Held, that the tenant was not to be deemed the landlord within the meaning of s. 2 (1) of the Act of 1923, and as the true landlords were never in possession the house remained one to which the Act of 1920 applied.

Decision of the Divisional Court (44 The Times L.R., 94 ; [1928] 1 K.B., 441) affirmed.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of the Divisional Court (44 The Times L.R., 94 ; [1928] 1 K.B., 441) affirming a decision of Judge Tobin at Westminster County Court.

The plaintiffs' claim was for possession of a house known as 15, Gillingham-street, Pimlico, S.W., of which they owned the freehold. The facts were agreed between the parties.

In 1904 Mr. Liffen, the defendant, became the assignee of a 98 years' lease of the premises which expired in June, 1924, and he entered into possession of the premises under that assignment. The net rateable value of the premises at all material times had been £38 a year. The rent reserved under the lease was £5 and was, therefore, considerably less than two-thirds of the rateable value of the house. (See section 12 (7) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, which is set out infra.) On July 31, 1923, the date of the passing of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, Mr. Liffen was still in actual occupation of the premises. On June 4, 1924, the plaintiffs wrote to him pointing out that the long lease was coming to an end and offering to allow him to remain in the house as a quarterly tenant at a yearly rent of £56 5s. Mr. Liffen accepted that and he remained as quarterly tenant on these terms after the expiration of the long lease. In November, 1926, however, an admittedly proper notice to quit was served on him by the plaintiffs determining the quarterly tenancy as from March 25, 1927. Mr. Liffen refused to leave the premises. The present proceedings were started by Messrs. Brooks in the County Court to recover possession of the house, and Mr. Liffen's defence to the claim was that he was protected by the Rent Restriction Acts. The County Court Judge held that the defendant was protected by the Rent Restriction Acts.

The plaintiffs appealed.

The Divisional Court held that although section 12 (7) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, provided that where the rent of a dwelling-house was less than two-thirds of its rateable value the Act should apply to the dwelling-house as if no such tenancy existed, the tenant was not, as against the freeholders, to be deemed to be the landlord of the house for the purposes of section 2 (1) of the Act of 1923 so as to cause the house to become decontrolled.

The plaintiffs again appealed.

Mr. Bensley Wells appeared for the appellants ; Mr. Ronald Walker, for the respondent, was not called upon.

LORD JUSTICE SCRUTTON said that this case had been argued with great ingenuity and with a clearness which showed the Court that counsel for the appellants was wrong in his contentions. The facts giving rise to the appeal were quite simple. His Lordship then proceeded to state the facts, and referred to section 2, subsection 1, of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, which provided : "Where the landlord of a dwelling-house to which the principal Act [the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920] applies is in possession of the whole of the dwelling-house at the passing of this Act [July 31, 1923], or comes into possession of the whole of the dwelling-house at any time after the passing of this Act, then from and after the passing of this Act, or from and after the date when the landlord subsequently comes into possession, as the case may be, the principal Act shall cease to apply to the dwelling-house. . . ."

The principal object of that section was to exclude dwelling-houses from the application of the principal Act in certain cases. Now there were two classes of cases to be considered. The first was that of very long leases in which the rent was out of proportion to the value when the lease should expire. It was not intended to fetter the landlord with a standard rent much below the value of the house. The second class arose in this way. It had to be borne in mind that after 1914 for compassionate reasons tenancies were granted at very low rentals, and when these expired it was not intended to bind the landlord with the rent then paid as the statutory rent. It was therefore provided by section 12, subsection 7, of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, that: "Where the rent payable in respect of any tenancy of any dwelling-house is less than two-thirds of the rateable value thereof, this Act shall not apply to that rent or tenancy . . . and this Act shall apply in respect of such dwelling-house as if no such tenancy existed or ever had existed." And three years later section 2, subsection 1, of the Act of 1923 provided as set out above. Coupled with that it was provided by subsection 3 of section 2: "For the purposes of this section the expression 'possession' shall be construed as meaning 'actual possession,' and a landlord shall not be deemed to have come into possession by reason only of a change of tenancy made with his consent." This Court had had to consider that section in a recent case, and they held that it meant what it said. It had been argued here on behalf of the appellant that the effect of that section was to wipe out section 12, subsection 7, of the earlier Act, and it was said: "True, here is a tenant, but really he is a landlord and being such is in possession of the whole of the dwelling-house, and the house was decontrolled." That turned on the definition clause, viz., section 12, subsection 1 (g), of the Act of 1920, which provided: "The expression 'landlord' also includes in relation to any dwelling-house any person other than the tenant, who is or would but for this Act be entitled to possession of the dwelling-house."

If he (the Lord Justice) understood the learned counsel's argument correctly, it was this. He said: "The defendant is a person who is entitled to possession or would but for this Act be entitled to possession. You cannot look at the tenancy. Somehow or other the effect of the definition clause is to turn him into a landlord in possession against his own interest." That argument seemed to him to be much too ingenious. He did not think that that was the intention of section 2, subsection 1, of the Act of 1923. The object of that section was to deal with the real landlord or owner, and he was unable to read section 12, subsection 1 (g), of the Act of 1920 as making the tenant the landlord for this purpose. Then it was said that this must refer to subletting. He did not propose to consider that question, and he also desired to reserve for future consideration the question whether Finey v. Gougoltz (42 The Times L.R., 501; [1926] 2 K.B., 322) had been rightly decided.

The present case, at any rate, was not one of subletting. The true landlord was never in possession within the meaning of the Act, therefore the house remained one to which the Act applied.

Lord Justice Sankey said that he agreed. The question to be considered was, whether this house became decontrolled, and whether, apart from the Rent Restriction Acts, the plaintiffs were in fact landlords and the defendant was in fact tenant. Counsel in his ingenious argument had referred to section 2, subsection 1, of the Act of 1923, and to section 12, subsection 7 (f) and (g), of the Act of 1920.

Dealing with the first-named section, it was said that although the word "landlord" was used there, and quite apart from the Acts would refer to the plaintiffs, yet by the true construction of that section the tenant in fact had become in law the landlord and therefore section 2, subsection 1, applied, and in the circumstances the house had become decontrolled. And it was further said that as the rent payable was less than two-thirds of the rateable value the Act applied as if no such tenancy had ever existed, and that as the result of section 12, subsection 1 (g), of the Act of 1920 the defendant was in reality landlord and not tenant. But he (the Lord Justice) asked, "Did the Act say so?" In support of his contention counsel had referred to section 12, subsection 1 (g), and he had submitted that the defendant would, but for this Act, be entitled to possession of the dwelling-house; that implied actual possession, and the defendant was in fact in actual possession.

He (the Lord Justice) thought there were two ways of meeting this argument. In the first place, there was the question to be answered whether the defendant came within the definition of a "landlord" and, in the second place, what was the real meaning of "landlord of a dwelling-house" in section 2, subsection 1, of the Act of 1923? In his view the learned counsel failed on both points.

As to the first point, he had contended that you must look at the tenancy in order to see whether the defendant was entitled to possession of the dwelling-house. He (the Lord Justice) did not think it was possible to rely on subclauses (f) and (g) both to approbate and reprobate that the tenant was not the landlord.

In the Court below Mr. Justice Salter had relied rather on section 2 of the Act of 1923. He said this: "The word 'landlord' must be loosely used in that subsection because, strictly speaking, there cannot be a landlord without a tenant and a tenure, and the subsection deal with a case where there is neither tenant nor tenure. 'Landlord' clearly must mean nothing more than 'owner.'" He (the Lord Justice) agreed with that and with what had been said by Lord Justice Scrutton, that section 2 was dealing with an actual owner and not with the tenant of an actual owner.

Mr. Justice Russell agreed.

MILLS v. JONES.*

Revenue—Income-tax—Award by Royal Commission—Government user of patented invention—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Sched. D.

The Court held that income-tax was payable on certain sums awarded by the Royal Commission on Awards to Inventors, it appearing that the sums in question were not a capital payment made for the Crown's acquisition of a patented invention but were sums paid for the user thereof.

This was an appeal by Sir William Mills, the patentee of the Mills bomb, against a decision of the General Commissioners of Income-Tax, who had decided that the sum of £27,750 received by him from the Government for the use of Mills bombs during the war was chargeable to income-tax as being * Reported by G. F. L. Bridgman, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"annual profits or gains" within Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918.

According to the case stated by the General Commisioners Sir William Mills effected certain improvements in a hand grenade known as the Roland bomb, which had been invented in Belgium. Those improvements were the subject-matter of patents taken out by Sir William Mills. The Government used Sir William Mills's inventions and authorized the manufacture of 75,131,962 Mills bombs during the war.

In consequence of the fact that the patents taken out by Sir William Mills were in respect of improvements on the Roland bomb, a number of persons claimed to have a right to a share in any payment made by the Government in respect of the Mills bomb. To avoid confusion before the Royal Commission on Awards to Inventors and a conflict of interests a deed was entered into by which Lieutenant-Colonel William Stephen Tunbridge was to make a claim before the Commission on behalf of M. Léon Roland, M. Jules de Lamine, the Compagnie Belge des Munitions Militaires, Société Anonyme, M. Albert Dewandre, all resident in Belgium, and also on behalf of Sir William Mills.

The Commission heard the claim in January, 1920, and on March 11, 1921, an award was made of £37,000 in respect of all user—past, present, and future—by the Government of Mills bombs, including user by way of selling for use, licensing, or otherwise dealing with them. Out of that £37,000 Sir William Mills received £27,750, of which £24,000 was paid to him on March 30, 1921, and £3,750 on August 3, 1921, and Lieutenant-Colonel Tunbridge, on behalf of the Belgian applicants, received £9,250. No deduction in respect of income-tax was made from those sums on payment. No assessment was made on Sir William Mills in respect of the money received by him until July, 1926, when the inspector of taxes surcharged him in £24,000 for the year ending April 5, 1921, and in £3,750 for the year ending April 5, 1922.

Sir William Mills appealed to the General Commissioners against those surcharges. He contended that the payments of £24,000 and £3,750 were of a capital nature made for the acquisition by the Crown of his rights for a lump sum. On behalf of the Crown, it was contended that the sums in question were paid for the user of the patents and were "annual profits or gains" chargeable under Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and that, although the award referred to future user, the possibility of future user was so remote that the whole sum awarded should be taken to have been paid in respect of past user.

The General Commissioners held that the sums awarded were "annual profits or gains" chargeable to income-tax under Schedule D, and they confirmed the certificates of surcharge.

Sir William Mills appealed against their decision.

Mr. Jowitt, K.C., and Mr. J. F. Eales appeared for the appellant; the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills for the Crown. Mr. Arthur Henderson held a watching brief for a party interested.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt, in giving judgment, said that in Constantinesco v. The King (43 The Times L.R., 727) there was no statement in the award that it was in respect of all user, past, present, and future, including user by way of selling for use, licensing, or otherwise dealing with the subject of the award. Otherwise, however, that case was the same as the present. In Constantinesco v. The King (supra) the claim was made on a strict royalty basis, as for a valid patent. In the present case the claim was put forward on a royalty basis. The question for decision, shortly, was whether the sums received by Sir William Mills had been given in respect of the user of something worthy of being treated as the subject of compensation.

It rather appeared from reading the award in the present case that it could not be said that it was merely in respect of past user and not also in respect of the purchase of the patents for the future. That, however, was too meticulous a way of looking at it. The Commission had no power to assess the Government to pay for future user. But a great many of the bombs had been made, and a certain number were in stock, and it was suggested during the hearing by the Commission that no addition would have to be made to the enormous figures which had been mentioned, and that the parties should consent to making an end of the matter once and for all. That the parties did.

The reference to future user was inserted in the award to make it quite clear that it was not anticipated that there would be any more user or any further claim. It had, however, loomed so large in the award as to give rise to an argument that the whole case ought to be regarded as being on a different basis. He was unable so to regard it. The matter was governed by Constantinesco v. The King (supra), although it was not so simple a case.

JOSEF INWALD AKTIEN GESELLSCHAFT v. PFEIFFER AND ANOTHER.*

Treaty of Peace—Debt incurred before outbreak of war—Austrian creditor—Action by creditor incompetent—Treaty of Peace Order, Art. 1 (x) (ee).

The defendant, a Norwegian subject, living in England, incurred a debt to the plaintiffs, an Austrian company, before the outbreak of war. After the Treaty of Peace the plaintiffs sued the defendant for the amount. The Judge in chambers made an order striking out the claim, on the ground that the only right to sue for the debt was in the Administrator of Austrian Property.

Held, that as the Treaty of Peace Order made the debt payable to the Administrator and transferred to him all the rights of the creditors the plaintiffs had no right to bring the action.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (43 The Times L.R., 399) affirmed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal, Lord Hanworth and Lord Justice Scrutton, (43 The Times L.R., 399), affirming an order of Mr. Justice Shearman in Chambers.

---

* Reported by H. B. Hemming, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The appellants were a company incorporated in accordance with the laws of the former Austrian Empire. The respondent Pfeiffer was a Norwegian subject, resident and carrying on business in England.

By a specially indorsed writ, dated November 10, 1926, the appellants claimed from Pfeiffer £494 9s. 2d., the aggregate of sums alleged to be due for goods sold and delivered to him between May and July, 1914.

The Administrator of Austrian Property was also joined as a defendant to the action in respect of any interest that he might have by way of charge on the said indebtedness.

The respondent Pfeiffer contended that since the coming into force of the Treaty of Peace between Great Britain and Austria, and the passing of the Order in Council, which empowered the Administrator of Austrian Property, for the purpose of enforcing a general charge on enemy property, to recover debts due to Austrian Nationals, the Administrator was the only person entitled to sue, and he applied that the writ should be struck out.

The appellants had previously applied to the Administrator to take the necessary proceedings to recover the debt, but the Administrator refused to do so, except on receipt of an indemnity, the conditions of which were so onerous that the appellants refused to accept them.

By the Treaty of Peace, Art. 249, and the Order in Council giving effect thereto, all debts due to Austrians from people in England were charged in favour of the Administrator of Austrian Property to apply the proceeds to paying claims of British subjects against enemy countries.

Master Jelf set aside the proceedings, and his order was affirmed by Mr. Justice Shearman.

In the Court of Appeal, the Master of the Rolls was of opinion that the effect of the Order in Council was to transfer to the Administrator of Austrian Property the right to enforce the debt, and he was to be deemed to stand in the shoes of the creditor. Lord Justice Scrutton was of opinion that there were in the Order in Council no clear words which prevented a man who had a beneficial interest in property which was charged from seeking to establish that he had such property, but he did not formally dissent, and accordingly the order of Mr. Justice Shearman was affirmed.

Sir Walter Greaves-Lord, K.C., and Mr. Scobell Armstrong appeared for the appellants; Mr. Aronson for the respondent Pfeiffer; and the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. H. M. Giveen for the Administrator of Austrian Property.

Counsel for the respondents were not called upon.

Lord Sumner, after referring to Article 249 of the Treaty of Peace and Article 1 (x) (ee) of the Order in Council, said that in the Court of Appeal the Master of the Rolls held that, under the latter provision, the power to sue was no longer in the former creditor, but had been transferred to the Administrator in such a way that the debt was for the time being a debt due to the Administrator and to him alone, and that, therefore, an action by the former creditor was incompetent. He (Lord Sumner) did not see how it could be seriously contended that, if the Administrator had the debt placed by law in such a position that he had all the powers of the creditor, any one else could sue as creditor. Nor was that difficulty got over by joining the Administrator as a defendant. It was said that all that was given to the Administrator was a charge, and a charge for a particular purpose, and that it followed, therefore, that if and when all the payments for which the charge was imposed had been made, the interest of the Administrator ceased and that the title of the original owner was not divested, but remained, subject to the charge. That argument appealed to Lord Justice Scrutton. He said that if an instrument was intended to take away from a man property that belonged to him it should do so in express terms. He (Lord Sumner) thought that the answer of the Master of the Rolls to that argument was satisfactory. It was not to be taken that any doctrine corresponding to the mortgagor's equity of redemption was contemplated by the framers of the Treaty. It was not reasonable to suppose that the peculiarly English doctrine of the legal and equitable estate and the rights arising therefrom was in the minds of the parties. He had no hesitation in saying that the position of the appellants was such that they could not bring this action at all, and that the writ must be struck out.

Lord Warrington of Clyffe and Lord Atkin gave judgment to the same effect.

Prob., Divorce, and Adm. Div. (Lord Merrivale, P.) } 1928. Feb. 15.

IN THE ESTATE OF GATES, DECEASED.*

Probate—Will—Construction—"I leave all my money to X"—Personal and real estate—Costs.

In the case of a will the operative part of which consisted solely of the words "I leave all my money to Alfred George Cabell" it was held that the bulk of the deceased's estate passed to Cabell, i.e., cash in the house, a credit on current account at the bank, stocks and shares, and £800 outstanding on mortgage, but that the equity of redemption in certain freehold houses and the furniture in the deceased's house passed to the next-of-kin.

There was no executor named in the will, and as the deceased had died since January 1, 1926, leaving his property not wholly disposed of, the persons entitled under an intestacy took, in accordance with the Probate Rules (Non-Contentious Business), rule 119, a grant of administration with the will annexed, in priority to the legatee, Cabell.

An order was made that the costs of both parties on a motion by the legatee for a grant of administration with the will annexed should be included in the costs of the administration and be discharged rateably out of all the deceased's assets.

This was a motion by Alfred George Cabell, a dairy worker, of Ludbourne-road, Sherborne, Dorset, claiming, as universal legatee and devisee, a grant of letters of administration with the will annexed of the estate of the late Alfred Gates, formerly chairman of the West Surrey Central Dairy Company (called the testator in his report). The testator died on April 21, 1927, aged 73, a widower without children, leaving a duly executed will which read: "I leave all my money to Alfred George Cabell." The respondents, the next of kin, claimed that Cabell was entitled only to the cash left by the testator in his house and to the amount standing to his credit on current account at the bank; they asked for a grant of administration with the will annexed.

Mr. Owen Thompson, K.C., Mr. Clifford Mortimer, and Mr. William Latey appeared for the applicant; Mr. Spens, K.C., and Mr. G. C. Tyndale for the respondents.

Mr. THOMPSON, in bringing the motion before the Court, said that the opposition to the grant was made by relatives of the testator on the question of the construction of the will. The applicant was the personal attendant of the testator during the last few years of his life. The estate comprised: (1) £1,780 in war loan, stocks, and shares; (2) £800 lent on mortgage; (3) £200 worth of furniture; (4) the equity of redemption of three freehold cottages worth about £600 plus the rent accruing thereon and the right to receive £450 secured thereon by mortgage; (5) £4 in cash at the testator's house; and (6) £1,599 standing to the credit of the testator's current account at his bank. The questions at issue were: (1) Did the words "all my money" include all the realty and personalty? (2) Were the words confined to the personalty? (3) Did they mean only the cash in the house and the bank credit?

Mr. SPENS said that this was the first case in which the meaning of the word "money" in a will had arisen for interpretation since the passing of the new Real Property Acts.

In all the cases in which the Courts had held that the word "money" could be given the broader meaning there was some special context in the will, or a context could be found from the surrounding circumstances, which were well recognized as admissible to help the Court to construe the will. In one case the Court held that under £20 was all that could be brought within the strict legal meaning of "money," and in another case £200 out of a fortune between £14,000 and £15,000. Helped by the fact that it would be strange for a person to make a somewhat elaborate settlement of such a minute portion of his whole estate, the Court was enabled to say that in those particular cases it could not have been the intention of the testator to die intestate as to the great bulk of the property and only to dispose of and to settle elaborately on his relatives a tiny quantum.

He referred to Vice-Chancellor Page-Wood's statement in 1858 of the principle in Langdale v. Whitfield (4 K. and J., 426, at p. 432) that in the absence of anything in the will to indicate a different intention the word "moneys" would be confined to ready money actually in hand, and to the statement in Parker v. Marchant (1 Phillips, 356) that "ready money" included cash at a banker's on current account. There was a definite recognized legal meaning of the word "money," and the Court must give a certain meaning to it if there was nothing but that word in a will. The Courts had constantly struggled not to give that strict legal meaning to the word, and fastened on the smallest context in the document itself so as to give some broader meaning to it, so as, for instance, to include, in addition to the money in hand and on current account at the bank or immediately due (which in his submission was the present legal meaning of "money"), a mortgage debt, Government stock or other securities, or even the whole personal estate. If the Court found in the present case that there were certain assets coming within the strict legal meaning of the word "money" and that he could give an intelligent meaning to every word in the will by submitting that "all my money" meant the £4 in the house and the £1,599 in the bank, then the Court was bound by those facts, however unwillingly, to say: "Here is a layman making a will. He may have meant something different, but he has, in fact, used a word to which the law attaches a certain meaning."

There was a paragraph in Mr. Cabell's affidavit which was clearly admissible for the purposes of the argument. It said: "I am 27 years of age and was in the employment of the West Surrey Dairy Company for ten years until I received notice on April 6, 1927. About two and a half years ago Mr. Alfred Gates, who was then manager of the Sherborne branch of the Dairy Company, fell down the office stairs and broke a tendon in his knee. After that I had to help him in walking and he formed the habit of taking me with him everywhere he went, and also got me to do jobs for him in my spare time. I looked after his clothes, helped him to dress in the mornings, helped in the house, and did his gardening and went on errands. Mr. Gates did not pay me wages for this personal service, but it was his custom to give me money presents from time to time. After he had had his second stroke, I attended him night and day until a trained nurse from London was obtained."

Counsel referred to Larner v. Larner (3 Drew., 704), in which the will contained no express residuary gift. Therefore it did not come within the decision of Rogers v. Thomas (2 Keen, 8) by which if there were anything in the nature of a direction to pay debts and funeral testamentary expenses, and then there was a bequest of "the rest of my money," or "the remainder of my money," it was well recognized that "money" covered the general personal estate and did not mean the general residue. In his judgment in Larner v. Larner (supra) Vice-Chancellor Kindersley said:—

There is a well-settled rule that, in the absence of anything in the will to indicate a clear intention to the contrary, a gift of 'all my money' must be taken to mean 'money' in the strict sense, and nothing else; you cannot, in the absence of anything in the will showing a different intention, conclude that the testator meant to give more than 'money.'"

In Byrom v. Brandreth (L.R., 16 Eq., 475) it was held that a testamentary gift by a testatrix of "any money of which I may die possessed" included cash in the house and money at the banker's, and any money, of which at the time of her death, she might have claimed immediate payment, but not the apportioned part of an annuity, or interest payable to her which had accrued from the last stated day of payment to her death, nor a legacy due to her which had not been acknowledged as at her disposal.

In In re Taylor—Taylor v. Tweedie (38 The Times L.R., 850; [1923] 1 Ch., 99) it was held that there was a context in the will sufficient to prevent the word "money" having its strict sense. In the Court of Appeal Lord Sterndale, Master of the Rolls, said: "I believe she wished to dispose of all her estate, and not to die intestate as to any part, and that she thought she had done so when she used the word 'money.'"

Mr. THOMPSON said that he did not concede that "money" in the present case did not include the real estate, but he was content to argue that it should include all the personal estate. There was no trace of its ever having been suggested that "money" included more than the personalty except in the judgment of Lord Justice Younger in In re Taylor —Taylor v. Tweedie (supra), in which he suggested that "brass" or "all my money" might include the real and personal estate. Since the passing of the Law of Property Act, 1922, he might argue that, the heir having been abolished and distribution between all the children being equal, the Court of Chancery would not be jealous to see that there were words expressly excluding the heir.

There was no context to this will except what could be implied by the facts that it was made within a month of death and there was a variety of property disposable. He was rather assisted in his plea by the word "all." In Prichard v. Prichard (L.R., 11 Eq., 232) the testator used the words "principal money," and it was held that all the personal property passed, including leaseholds, but not the realty.

In In re Cadogan (25 Ch.D., 154) it was held that in construing a will no absolute technical meaning should be given to such a word as "money," the meaning of which must depend upon the context, if any, and surrounding circumstances such as the Court could take into consideration. The word "money" passed all the personal estate of the testatrix, including cash, securities, leaseholds, furniture, and effects.

Mr. THOMPSON proceeded to discuss In re Buller (74 L.T., 406) and In the Goods of Bramley ([1902] P., 106), in which the testator gave a pecuniary legacy of £100 and left "the rest of my money" to six named persons. It was held that the latter bequest covered all the residue, which was personal estate worth about £1,000. He read the judgment of Mr. Justice Sargant in In re Skillen ([1916] 1 Ch., 518).

He referred to In re Gliddon ([1917] 1 Ch., 174) and In re Woolley ([1918] 1 Ch., 33). In conclusion he said that the present case was not governed by any authority owing to the lack of context, except that, in addition to the surrounding circumstances already stated, the will was made on a half-sheet of notepaper. He submitted that the will passed all that the testator died possessed of.

Mr. CLIFFORD MORTIMER said with regard to the question of practice that this point of construction regulated the rights of the parties to a grant of administration. If it were held that the word "money" merely passed the money in the house and at the bank Mr. Cabell would then be merely in the position of a legatee, and the persons entitled on an intestacy would be entitled to administration. If the will passed everything, realty included, to Mr. Cabell he would be entitled to administration.

After further argument by Mr. Spens the President reserved judgment.

The testator died on April 21, 1927, leaving a brother and sisters and ten children of deceased brothers surviving him. A will duly executed by him on March 21, 1927, was in force at his death, and consisted so far as the operative part is concerned of these words only, "I leave all my money to Alfred George Cabell."

The testator's estate at his death comprised £4 in money in the house, a sum of £1,599 standing to his credit on current account at his bankers, £800 outstanding on mortgage with some arrears of interest, £500 nominal of 5 per cent. War Loan, some stocks and shares in joint stock companies of the value at par of £1,280, with dividends accruing, furniture of the estimated value of £200, the equity of redemption of three freehold cottages valued as freehold at £600, and (by the combined operation of a marriage settlement and a bequest under the will of his deceased wife) the right to receive a sum of £450 secured thereon by mortgage.

From the time of a serious accident two and a half years before the testator's death, and in particular during a long illness upon which his death ensued, the applicant appears to have rendered continuous services to the testator, and to have earned his gratitude. During the illness none of the relatives of the deceased is said to have been in touch with him.

The will in question was written at the testator's request by an inmate of his house at a period during his last illness when, as it seems, he thought he was about to die. The writer supplied the words used, and they were not discussed by the testator. The material words of the instructions that he gave are these: "I want Cabell to have all my money," and a further statement after some discussion or suggestion that he should make bequests to members of his family: "No, I want Cabell to have it all." In the argument before me no weight—probably rightly—was attached to these oral statements. It was common ground that the will must be construed according to the meaning of the words used therein, with proper regard to the situation of the testator and the nature of his assets.

The motion of the applicant is resisted on behalf of the next-of-kin on the grounds of necessary strictness in the construction of testamentary instruments, as applied in the decision of the Court of Appeal in Chancery in Lowe v. Thomas (5 De G., M. and G., 315). They are embodied in a text from the Digest in the judgment of Lord Justice Knight Bruce in that case and in these words of like effect in the judgment of Lord Justice Turner: "It is necessary to adhere to the proper and correct sense of the words used in the will, where there is no context to give a different effect to them." By way of illustration of the application of the rule counsel referred to numerous authorities, covering a long period of time and a great variety of wills, and more particularly to judgments such as that of Vice-Chancellor Selborne in Byrom v. Brandreth (L.R., 16 Eq., 475), that of Lord Justice Kay in In re Cadogan (25 Ch.D., 154), that of Lord Justice Stirling in In re Buller (74 L.T., 406), that of Lord St. Helier, President, in In the Goods of Bramley ([1902] P., 106), that of Lord Justice Sargant in In re Skillen ([1916] 1 Ch., 518), that of Lord Blanesburgh in In re Gliddon ([1917] 1 Ch., 174), that of Mr. Justice Eve in In re Woolley ([1918] 1 Ch., 33), and the judgments of the Court of Appeal in In re Taylor—Taylor v. Tweedie (38 The Times L.R., 850; [1923] 1 Ch., 99).

In each of the cases cited before me the Court in which the true construction of the language used by the various testators was to be determined came to its conclusion as to the meaning of the words used in the instrument before it with some assistance from the context of the will. Here the sentence presented for construction has no context. The problem to be solved however is the same : What is the true meaning of the words used by the testator ? An elementary consideration which is strongly emphasized by comparison of the older judgments with some of those more recent in date is that the meanings of words become modified from time to time in course of use. Another is that a word or words capable of or used to express one meaning with regard to one subject-matter or one set of circumstances may have a different meaning when applied to a different matter or in other circumstances.

My predecessor, Lord St. Helier, adopted in In the Goods of Bramley (supra) the declaration of Mr. Justice Kay in In re Cadogan (supra) : " There should be no absolute technical meaning given to such a word as 'money' in a will, but its meaning in every case must depend upon the context, if there is any, which can explain it, and upon those surrounding circumstances which the Court is bound to take into consideration in determining the construction."

It was not suggested on behalf of the next-of-kin in the argument before me that the testator's will operated only upon the small sum in notes or specie found among the testator's effects on his death. Counsel conceded that the balance on current account at the bank must be held to pass. The current and proper sense of the word " money " (I quote from Lowe v. Thomas, supra) in this will would extend, if the argument be sound, to choses in action. If " money " in this will may include a debt due on demand from a banker, may it not include a debt accruing due at a fixed date from the State, or some outstanding debt on a mortgage ? May the word " all " extend it, as it was extended in some of the cases, so that the testator's bequest of all his money operates to include investments in stocks and shares ? As everyone knows, men often speak of their " money " when they describe all their assets or resources.

I was reminded during the argument of the statutes, including the Land Transfer Act, 1897, and the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, which have enlarged the effect of the appointment of a legal personal representative so as to vest in the legal personal representative of a deceased person real estate which was " vested in him without a right in any other person to take by survivorship," or " for an interest not ceasing on his death," and of the familiar presumption that " when a testator has executed a will in solemn form he did not intend . . . to die intestate "—I quote Lord Esher, M.R., in In re Harrison (30 Ch.D., 390)—and of another presumption arising out of the old law of wills that, without clear words, a will is not to be construed to disinherit the heir-at-law. The modern enactments in relation to the devolution of real property on the death of the owner seem to have little bearing on the immediate question of the construction of this will, nor do the several presumptions give any effective help.

Assuming the testator to have intended to die testate and to leave nothing undisposed of, I am left to determine what he has actually done by the words in which his will is expressed. I cannot find in them and the state of the assets and other relevant circumstances any indication that the testator used the word " money " to include either furniture or real estate. A gift of " all " would have passed them both, but the comprehensiveness of that term is, it seems to me, necessarily limited by the subject-matter, the testator's " money." The furniture and the cottages may well have been unthought of by the testator, and, at any rate, they are not designated by the language employed by his amanuensis. The conclusion at which I have arrived is that the will disposes of all the testator's estate except the equity of redemption of the cottages and the furniture.

When I mentioned as possible the view of the will which I have expressed counsel for the applicant pressed upon me that if this view should be taken he would be entitled as matters stand to a grant of administration with the will annexed. Under Rule 119 of the Probate Rules for Non-Contentious Business which are now in force, where a deceased person has died since January 1, 1926, leaving a will whereby the estate is not wholly disposed of, the persons entitled under an intestacy take a grant of administration with the will annexed in priority to legatees or devisees. The applicant's motion therefore fails. The costs will come out of the assets.

Mr. CLIFFORD MORTIMER asked that costs should be allowed as between solicitor and client.

THE PRESIDENT.—In cases of this kind where costs are to be paid by an estate, I think it is a wholesome practice that they should be properly paid. I do not think it is the intention of the present procedure that a litigant who properly comes to the Court should be penalized in any amount.

Mr. SPENS.—Your Lordship's decision makes the applicant the legatee of the assets which your Lordship has held to come under the word " money." That, of course, leaves property undisposed of and that is really the residual estate which will bear the costs.

The PRESIDENT.—That is quite true, and that is the aspect of the matter which has given me some concern, because it is impossible not to see that a substantial burden will fall in the first instance on the person entitled to administration.

I do not think the little residue which may ultimately come to the next-of-kin ought to be taxed with the whole burden of the costs here. I think that they should be converted into costs of the administration and that they should be discharged rateably out of all the assets.

Mr. CLIFFORD MORTIMER.—I quite appreciate that it works out hardly upon them, but the administration expenses and the duties of course would in the first instance, apart from any order of this Court, fall upon them. I know of no authority by which the general expenses of administration would not follow the usual incidence of the law, apart from the costs of this motion.

THE PRESIDENT.—It may under the present conditions and the statutes and other provisions to which both of you called my attention be a somewhat complex matter, but at any rate I intend so far as I can that the parties shall start fair, and what I propose to do is to direct that the costs of this motion be taxed as between solicitor and client upon a fair taxation by the Registrar so as to cover costs properly incurred, and that they be provided by the administrator who will take administration—I do not know who at present—out of the testator's assets rateably. What I have assumed is that the next-of-kin will agree upon a proper administrator and that administration will go in common form. If any difficulty arises it may be mentioned to save expenses as upon the motion.

LYNDE v. NASH.*

Company—Prospectus—Offer of shares to the public—Issue to the public—Invitation—Document signed by directors — Strictly private and confidential—Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII., c. 69), ss. 81 (1) (e), 285.

The plaintiff had invested £3,000 in a company of which the defendant was the principal promoter and managing director, having been induced to do so by statements contained in two documents drafted by the defendant, one being signed by the defendant and his co-directors, of which about 20 to 30 copies were typed for circulation by the directors among their friends with the object of raising additional capital, and the other being a letter, on the company's notepaper on which the names of the directors appeared, sent by the defendant to a co-director. The letter was marked private and confidential. The plaintiff, who was an utter stranger to the company and unknown to any of its directors, received a copy of the documents through a friend of one of the directors of the company to whom the documents had been sent with the knowledge of the defendant and other directors of the company with the object of raising capital from wealthy clients or from fathers who had a son to place.

In an action by the plaintiff, claiming damages for a breach of the requirements of section 81 (1) (e), of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, in that the documents omitted to state the number and amount of shares which within the two preceding years had been issued as fully paid otherwise than in cash, these two documents were found by the jury on the evidence to constitute an offer of shares made by the company to the public. This finding was not challenged ; but to the question whether the documents were in fact issued to the public, the jury answered, "There is no proof of this." They also found that the plaintiff had suffered damage because the documents had omitted to state that a number of the shares had been issued as fully paid up otherwise than in cash within the two preceding years.

Held (Scrutton, L.J., dissenting), that the plaintiff was a member of the public, and it had been proved that the documents, which had been settled and approved by the directors of the company, who were making desperate efforts to raise capital, were reproduced for the purpose of reaching a limited section of the public, and that the documents, which ultimately reached the hands of the plaintiff, a stranger, were issued by or on behalf of the company or by or on behalf of a person who was or had been engaged or interested in the formation of the company within the meaning of section 81 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, and as the plaintiff had proved that he had suffered damage by reason of the omission of the documents to state the information required by subs. (1) (e) of that section the plaintiff was entitled to recover damages against the defendant.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment of Mr. Justice Salter, after trial of an action with a jury.

The facts are fully stated in the judgments.

Mr. du Parcq, K.C., and Mr. Walter Monckton appeared for the appellant ; and Mr. J. G. Hurst, K.C., and Mr. Maurice Healy for the respondent.

The following considered judgments were read :—

Lord Justice Scrutton.—Mr. Lynde, in September, 1921, invested £3,000 in ordinary shares of the British and Foreign Industrials, Limited. As part of the consideration for his investment, he became a director and a paid officer of the company. He remained a director and officer of that and another company, which bought part of the original business, till April, 1924, when he was dismissed without notice, and, as has been held in another action, wrongfully dismissed.

He then looked at the documents which had formed part of the original inducement to him to invest. Coming to the conclusion that some statements in them were untrue and fraudulent, in 1926 he brought an action for damages against the person (Mr. Nash) principally concerned in the company, who had signed these documents, for damages for deceit and for breaches of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, in the issue of a "prospectus."

The jury found that the statements were untrue and that Lynde relied on them, but that they were not fraudulent. The action for deceit, therefore, failed.

On that part of the action which rested on a breach of the statutory provisions with regard to a prospectus, it was clear that neither document, if a "prospectus" as defined by the statute, stated the particulars required by section 81, subsection (1) (e), of the Act of 1908, among others, the amount of shares issued in the preceding two years as fully paid up otherwise than in cash, and the questions argued were :—(1) Whether the documents seen by the plaintiff were, on the face of them, an offer of shares to the public. This was left to the jury, who said they were, and Mr. Justice Salter agreed. (2) Whether the documents were, in fact, issued to the public, to which the jury replied, "there is no proof of this." (3) Did the plaintiff sustain damage by the omission ? This, as the number of shares issued was stated correctly, means, did he rely, in taking the shares, on the assumption that all the shares were issued for cash, or on the omission to state that some were not ? The jury found that the plaintiff did sustain damage by the omission.

The learned Judge had at first been disposed to think that if the document was on the face of it an offer to the public it was immaterial whether in fact it was issued to the public ; but after hearing further argument he changed his view and held that the plaintiff must prove that the document was issued to the public, and as he failed to satisfy the jury of this he failed in his action.

The plaintiff thereupon appealed, and asked either for judgment on the ground that issue to the public was immaterial, or for a new trial on the ground that the Judge had misdirected the jury on the question of issue. This renders it necessary to consider in more detail the documents relied on, and what was done with them.

The company was a private company which, by its articles of association, was prohibited from issuing any invitation to the public to subscribe for shares. The company had an authorized capital of £50,000, of which £40,300 had been issued in ordinary shares. It could increase its capital in general meeting, and it could make the new capital preferred, ordinary, or deferred shares. It had not at the time in question increased its capital or issued any preference shares. Its directors were considering whether at least £30,000 more capital should be raised—£20,000 in preference shares and £10,000 in ordinary shares, one ordinary share for each two preference shares.

Apparently, Mr. Nash, the managing director and promoter, drafted two documents, one called B, dated September 26, 1921, but apparently originally prepared and sent on September 12, addressed to a fellow director, Mr. Eshelby, signed J. G. Nash, and headed "strictly private and confidential," containing detailed statements with regard to the position of the company, "Figures how we stand as at August 31, 1921," and containing the statement "Issued Capital £40,000, and Patents £30,000." The other document, marked A, undated and headed with the name of the company, is addressed, "Gentlemen," and its first two paragraphs are :—

"In order to meet the rapid development requirements of the company, it is now necessary to increase the nominal capital from £50,000 to £100,000. It is proposed to issue 20,000 7½ per cent. participating cumulative preference shares of £1 each at par, participating up to 10 per cent. after 10 per cent. has been paid on the ordinary shares. These shares will also be preferred as to capital. There are no debentures, mortgages, or bankers' loans against the company. Every two preference shares allotted will give the applicant an option to take one ordinary share of £1 at par. The position of this company, its properties and its options, are briefly and conservatively described below."

Mr. Eshelby at the time described it as "General scheme for increase of capital as laid before the board of directors together with general particulars." This perhaps explains the original heading "Gentlemen." There is no entry of a minute approving it, but the four directors seem to have signed it, and then "Gentlemen" could not refer to the directors, but to the persons to whom it was shown. Between 20 and 30 typed copies were made, and it appears to have been understood that each director might approach such friends as he thought suitable, with the documents as a basis for discussion. Application forms for preference and ordinary shares were attached, but the company had at that time no power to issue £20,000 preference shares or £10,000 ordinary shares.

On September 26 Eshelby sent the documents to Mr. Alcock, a solicitor, for confidential information and use—to show to wealthy clients, or to fathers who wanted to place a son, and said, "conditions could be accommodated to suit your clients." Alcock, on October 4, sent the documents to Major Wrigley, whom he addresses by his Christian name, to show his brother-in-law, Mr. Lynde. There is no evidence that the document went to any other persons, or that any shares other than Mr. Lynde's shares were allotted. Mr. Lynde made a number of inquiries, including sending someone to Somerset House, who did not report what would be on the file there, namely, that £30,000 shares were issued not for cash. Ultimately, Mr. Lynde, by letter, not on the application form, agreed to take £3,000 ordinary shares, on the terms that he was appointed a director and given an active position at a salary of £400 a year.

The question then is, on these facts, the jury having to determine facts and inferences from facts, has any offence against the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, been committed, which has caused damage to the plaintiff ?

Section 81 of the Act of 1908 enacts :—"(1) Every prospectus issued by or on behalf of a company, or by or on behalf of any person who is or has been engaged or interested in the formation of the company must state . . . (e) the number and amount of shares . . . which within the two preceding years have been issued . . . as fully or partly paid up otherwise than in cash . . . and in either case the consideration for which those shares . . . have been issued. . . ."

By section 285, "'Prospectus' means any prospectus, notice, circular, advertisement, or other invitation, offering to the public for subscription or purchase any shares or debentures of a company."

The result appears to me to make it necessary to show that the document containing the misstatement or omission is (1) an offer to the public to take shares, and (2) issued to the public. In my opinion, a document couched in such general terms that if issued to the public it would be an invitation to take shares does not become a document issued to the public if it is never shown at all, or is only shown to one man in such conditions that it cannot be said to be "issued to the public." Directors, especially of a private company, may easily show an invitation to take shares to one or two friends without any intention of ever making a public offer. On the other hand, they may easily send it to so many people, though of a limited class, that it becomes an offer to the public. In In re South of England Natural Gas and Petroleum Company, Limited ([1911] 1 Ch., 573), where some 3,000 copies of a prospectus marked "for private circulation only" were printed and issued to shareholders of gas companies in which the promoter was interested, Mr. Justice Swinfen Eady held that the prospectus was "issued to the public." On the other hand, in Sherwell v. Combined Incandescent Mantles Syndicate, Limited (23 The Times L.R., 482), where some of the directors, without the authority of the company, sent a prospectus marked "strictly private and confidential, not for publication," to some of their friends, Mr. Justice Warrington said that no action lay against the company, but also said that "whether capital had been offered to the public was a pure question of fact" and that an offer of shares to the public meant an offer of shares to anyone who should choose to come in. I agree with this ; it seems to me to be a question of degree whether there is a sufficiently general offering to make it a public offer, or such a limited selected distribution as to make it private negotiation.

One may consider the whole circumstances, that the company was a private company which could not under its articles legally make an offer to the public ; that the document complied with none of the requirements with which an offer to the public should comply under sections 80 and 81 of the Act of 1908 ; that it was only proved to have been shown to one person as a possible investor, though, no doubt, the directors contemplated that Alcock might show it to others ; the number of copies typed, the lack of evidence of other issues, and so on.

But it remains, in my view, a question of fact for the jury. I think the Judge was entitled to leave to them both questions. As to the question whether the document was an offer to the public, Lord Justice Mathew constantly left this class of question to a commercial jury, with satisfactory results. I think they might have found either way ; and I cannot interfere with their verdict.

On the further question whether the document was issued to the public, I cannot say that the jury must find on the evidence of one document being issued that it was issued to the public. The learned Judge directed the jury that it was a question of degree what "issued" meant, and I agree with him. The alleged misdirection is, I gather, in leaving the question to them at all, or in not directing them that, if they thought the document, on the face of it, an offer to the public, one shown in whatever circumstances would do. I cannot agree with this, and prefer the learned Judge's later view of the law. In my opinion, there was evidence on which the jury could make their finding, and there was no misdirection.

The appeal should, in my opinion, be dismissed, with the usual consequences, but as my brethren take an opposite view the appeal will be allowed, and judgment entered for the plaintiff in the terms stated by Lord Justice Atkin.

Lord Justice Atkin.—The defendant company was registered on October 28, 1920, as a private company with a nominal capital of £50,000 in £1 shares. It was formed to take over the undertaking of another company, John Nash Royston and Co., Limited, and of its capital 10,300 shares were issued for cash and 30,000 were issued as to 22,500 to Nash and 7,500 to Royston, presumably by direction of the vendors, for goodwill, patents, and patent rights. The company possessed the patent rights of an extending dining table and possessed works at Liverpool where the table was manufactured ; it possessed the patent rights in an electrical condenser, some of the foreign rights in which it had disposed of ; and it also possessed the patent rights in a stair carpet protector. In 1921 the company apparently needed further capital, and a document was prepared by Mr. Nash, the managing director, and signed by all four of the directors, which is the document marked A. A further document, marked B, was also prepared by Mr. Nash and addressed to another director, Mr. Eshelby, and dated September 26, 1921. It gives more detailed information than the other document above-mentioned, with regard to the business of the company. The first-mentioned document contains a statement that it is proposed to issue 20,000 7½ per cent. participating preference shares and that for every two preference shares allotted the applicant will have the option to take one ordinary share of £1 at par, and the document contains an application form for both preference and ordinary shares addressed to the directors. It does not appear that at any material time the directors had passed any resolution to create preference shares, but they had powers under the articles at any time to do so. The two documents, which it was argued at the trial were to be read together and treated as one, came into the possession of the plaintiff in circumstances the legal effect of which is the question in this action.

The plaintiff had business connexions in India, which he was proposing to discontinue, and he was minded to invest part of his capital in an appropriate business venture in this country. He was attracted by the prospects held out by the documents, which are undoubtedly alluring, and in October applied for and was allotted 3,000 ordinary shares on the terms that when he returned from India next year he was to be appointed a director, with an active position at a salary of not less than £400 a year. These terms were carried out. The plaintiff became a director with a salaried post, and later, in 1922, applied for and was allotted 500 additional ordinary shares. Unfortunately, early in 1923, the company, being short of cash, had to part with its table business to a new company, John Nash, Limited, which had command of more capital. The plaintiff transferred his services to that company, which apparently continued to be managed by Mr. Nash.

In 1924 there was friction between the plaintiff and Mr. Nash. The plaintiff was dismissed. He brought an action for wrongful dismissal against the company, in which he was successful. Afterwards, when that action was over, he brought the present action against Mr. Nash. His claim was twofold. He claimed that he was induced to apply for shares in the company by fraudulent misrepresentations contained in the documents A and B already mentioned, for which he said Mr. Nash was responsible. He also said that, apart from fraud, the two documents constituted a prospectus within the meaning of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, section 81 : that it had been issued by Mr. Nash ; and that it omitted the information required by section 81, subsection (1) (e), namely, the number and amount of shares which had been issued as fully paid up otherwise than in cash ; and he claimed damages.

The action was tried before Mr. Justice Salter and a special jury. With regard to fraud, the jury found that the statements complained of were untrue and that the plaintiff had been induced by them to invest his money. But they found that the statements had not been made fraudulently by Mr. Nash. These findings put an end to the claim for fraud, and we are left to deal with the further or alternative claim based on section 81 of the Act of 1908.

On this part of the case the plaintiff had to establish that the documents together constituted a prospectus, that the prospectus had been issued by Mr. Nash, and that the plaintiff had suffered damage by the alleged statutory omission.

The definition of prospectus is contained in section 285 of the Act of 1908. Prospectus "means any prospectus, notice, circular, advertisement, or other invitation, offering to the public for subscription or purchase any shares or debentures of a company." In dealing with this matter the Judge was treating a subject-matter which is outside the ordinary experience of jury trials, and he must have felt some embarrassment. He had to leave any disputed question of fact to the jury, and he left to them the question whether documents A and B together were an offer of shares issued by the company to the public. The jury answered the question, "Yes" ; and they further found that the plaintiff had sustained damage by reason of the omission to state the issue of shares as fully paid, and that the damages were £2,000. The Judge, however, at the instance of the defendant, left to the jury a further question. Were A and B issued to the public ? On this the Judge told the jury that there was no evidence that any human eye outside the directors' room ever saw A and B except Alcock, Wrigley, and the plaintiff.

"Upon that you have to say whether either document, in your view, was issued to the public. It is a question of degree no doubt what 'issued to the public' means, but upon these facts I should rather doubt myself whether you would say that the plaintiff had satisfied you that either document was ever issued to the public." On that direction, it is perhaps not surprising that the jury answered that question by saying "There is no proof of this." On this finding the learned Judge, on consideration, entered judgment for the defendant.

It appears to me that in dealing with the construction of a statute one avoids danger by sticking as closely as possible to the actual words. The words "issue to the public" are not to be found in the section. The two relevant questions appear to be, was there a "prospectus," and, if so, was it issued. The section, read with section 80, appears plainly to contemplate the existence of a document—a prospectus—before issue. A copy of it has to be filed before issue. If issued, it must contain certain particulars. To be a prospectus the document must contain an offer to the public for subscription. Presumably the words of the document must be accompanied by a genuine intention to offer to the public. Otherwise an invitation only intended for a single individual might, if couched in general language, become a prospectus. This admits of questions of fact apart from what would otherwise be a matter of construction. But, when one is satisfied that the document contains an offer to the public, the only other requisite is that it should be issued. I see no reason for implying or adding the requirement of "issuing to the public," nor is it easy to ascertain how that fact is proved. An offer to the public is issued, I should suppose, when it is delivered by the issuer with the intention of effectuating the offer; in other words, when it is delivered as the document, it is an offer to the public. It would not be so issued if it were handed over merely as a precedent, good or bad, or a curiosity, or as a draft, or for the special and sole information of the person to whom it is delivered. On the other hand, if it is intended that in the hands of the person to whom it is delivered it shall serve the purpose of inviting anyone who may peruse it to subscribe, it appears to me to be issued. It can hardly be contended that the issue of a prospectus must be to a class co-extensive with those who are invited, that if you invite all the public you must issue to all the public. I am satisfied that the remedial nature of the legislation which, in this form, dates from the Act of 1900, would be greatly impaired by the view accepted in the Court below. A Judge may be allowed to know that grave public disadvantages have attended, on some occasions, the activities of so-called "share pushers," gentlemen who canvass numbers of the public to apply for or buy worthless shares. Such an agent, armed with one copy of a general offer to the public, defying all the statutory requirements, might succeed in raising the capital he required from even one, or certainly a few victims. Are they not within this statutory protection? Or could the statute be evaded by dribbling out the prospectus in small quantities to one limited class after another; and would the first issue be unprotected until the volume reached the dimensions of a public issue? I cannot think so.

The real difficulty in this case, in my opinion, arose on the question whether this was a prospectus or not. I think it may well have been contended, as I have no doubt it was, before the jury that the circumstances of this case, and the forms of the documents, especially the second document (document B) indicate that there never was an intention to offer the shares to any number of the public, but only to such favoured few as might be selected by the directors as suitable shareholders. On the other hand, the extent of the offer and the form of application and other circumstances afford evidence from which the jury might, in my view, have found that the documents did make an offer to the public. This finding was not attacked before us, and must stand. On this footing, it appears to me that there was no dispute that the document was issued in the sense I have described above. It was sent to the solicitor, Mr. Alcock, to serve as an invitation to any number of the public whom he might think likely to be interested. It appears to me, therefore, that there was no question to be left to the jury on the matter of "issue"; and that on the answers to the questions that were properly left the plaintiff is entitled to succeed. It was not disputed before us that the effect of the section is that though it contains no sanction for the prohibition, yet a person injured by the omission is entitled to damages, and this I think is the true view. It appears to have been the view of Mr. Justice Swinfen Eady in In re South of England Natural Gas and Petroleum Company, Limited ([1911] 1 Ch., 573).

There are no authorities which govern this case, and I do not, for my part, derive much assistance from cases upon other sections or different sections of the former Companies Acts. It may well be that the issue of a document to only a limited number of persons may be evidence of an intention not to offer shares to the public but to offer them to some class of a more restricted denomination, for example, evidence that the document is not a "prospectus." But, as I have said, the prospectus point is determined for us here by the unchallenged finding of the jury.

In these circumstances, the appeal should be allowed with costs, and judgment entered for the plaintiff for £2,000, with costs. As the trial was by jury, the defendant would in any event obtain his costs of the issues of fraudulent misrepresentation, but it may be as well to add that he should have these costs with a set-off.

MR. JUSTICE EVE.—On October 28, 1920, the British and Foreign Industrials, Limited, was registered under the Companies Acts, 1908 to 1917, with the primary object of acquiring as a going concern and upon the terms of an agreement, then already prepared, the business theretofore carried on by John Nash Royston and Co., Limited.

The capital was £50,000 divided into £1 shares, and by clause 5 of the Memorandum it was provided (inter alia) that any of the shares for the time being unissued, and any new shares from time to time created, might be issued as preference shares in respect of dividend or repayment of capital or both. By clause 3 the company was declared to be a private company and accordingly it was thereby provided that no invitation should be made to the public to subscribe for any shares of the company.

By the month of September, 1921, the company had issued 40,300 of its shares, of which 30,000 had been issued as fully paid up by way of consideration for certain patents and other assets, and the balance of 10,300 had been paid for in cash.

At the date just mentioned, the company was in want of funds for the further development of its business and contemplated an increase of capital and the issue of further shares—preference or ordinary as circumstances might demand. Oblivious of, or ignoring the provisions of, clause 3, the directors, or some one or more of them, thereupon drew up two documents, which, read together as one, the jury in this case have—in my opinion—rightly pronounced to be an offer of shares to the public, or, in other words, an invitation to the public to subscribe for shares.

The one document is signed by the four directors of the company; it begins by stating that "in order to meet the rapid development requirements of the company, it is now necessary to increase the nominal capital from £50,000 to £100,000," and goes on to say that "it is proposed to issue 20,000 7½ per cent. participating cumulative preference shares of £1 each at par" and that "every two preference shares allotted will give the applicant an option to take one ordinary share of £1 at par." Then follows what is called a brief and conservative description of the company, its properties, and its options. It concludes by pointing out that the company, without the aid of additional capital, will be making a yearly net profit of more than £20,000—more than twelve times the amount required to pay the preference share dividend on the then present issue, and that with the new capital available an increase of the annual net profit to £50,000 within the next two years would be a conservative estimate. Attached to this document is a form of application for preference shares addressed to the directors of the company. Except that it contains no reference to the prospectus, it is in the ordinary form.

The second document is a letter dated September 26, 1921, written on the company's paper, at the head of which appear the names of the four directors, by Mr. John Nash, one of the four, to Mr. A. D. Eshelby, another of the four. It is marked "strictly private and confidential," and after a full statement of assets and liabilities as on August 31, 1921, the writer goes on to point out the nature of the assets in some detail and the purposes for which the additional capital of £30,000 is required and concludes, "I shall be very happy to discuss the proposition in all its details with anyone who is really interested." Enclosed with the letter was a list of the customers with whom accounts were open on August 31 and attached was a form of application for ordinary shares in the same terms—mutatis mutandis—as the one for preference shares attached to the first document.

These documents were composed by the defendant, Mr. John Nash, the first was, as I have said, signed by him and his three co-directors; several copies—certainly a dozen, possibly 20 to 30—were typed and one, at least, of these was handed or sent to Mr. A. D. Eshelby—also a director—not with a view to his showing it to any particular individual, but to assist him in his quest for some person or persons willing to find the additional capital. It appears from the correspondence that he had already been making efforts in that direction before September 26, and on the 12th of the month had been supplied with a written statement, bearing that date and containing most, if not all, of the information to be found in the documents of September 26.

Among the individuals to whom Mr. Eshelby had spoken on the subject before September 26 was Mr. James Alcock, a solicitor of Liverpool, and on receipt of the documents from Mr. Nash he at once wrote the following letter to Mr. Alcock:—

"Further to our previous conversation, I now have pleasure in enclosing information concerning the proposition as follows: (1) General scheme for increase of capital as laid before the board of directors together with general particulars. This scheme is merely a basis and could be altered to accommodate any party proposing to invest a substantial sum. (2) A personal letter from the managing director, giving more specific information. This is for your confidential information and use. I understand you have wealthy clients who might be willing to become shareholders, or you may know of some one who would like to start a son in a prosperous concern. In either case, I think, there would be no difficulty in accommodating the conditions to suit your clients. The additional capital is required wholly for development purposes."

That letter is, in subtance, a request to Mr. Alcock to find some client or clients willing to provide the new capital upon the terms proposed by the company or some modification thereof, as an investment pure and simple, or, alternatively, as an investment coupled with a provision for a son. No limitation is imposed on the number or class of persons to whose attention the matter is to be brought. So long as the money is forthcoming, the source from which it comes is quite immaterial.

Mr. Alcock's reply reads as follows:—

"Your letter of the 26th instant, with its various enclosures, has come to hand, and I am much obliged to you for all the particulars you have sent me. I will go carefully through these and will take the earliest opportunity that arises of placing the matter before any of my friends to whom I think it may appeal. It may be some little time before I shall be able to report anything definite to you, but next week I am hoping to see some of my wealthy clients and will then see what can be done."

No information is forthcoming as to the extent to which Mr. Alcock placed the matter before his friends, but on October 4 he sent the papers to Major Wrigley, the plaintiff's brother-in-law. He, in turn, sent them to the plaintiff, an utter stranger to the company and its directors, who, within a few days and after an interview with the defendant whereat the various statements in the documents were discussed and their accuracy confirmed, agreed to and did in fact subscribe for 3,000 ordinary shares, for which he paid in full on October 25 and which were duly allotted to him on the 31st of the same month.

The shares having seriously depreciated in value, the plaintiff, on June 18, 1926, brought this action, wherein he claimed to recover damages from the defendant, Nash, for fraudulent misrepresentations and for breach of statutory duty in not complying with section 81 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908. On this appeal we are concerned only with the second claim.

The section in question requires that every prospectus—which, by section 285, means any prospectus, notice, circular, advertisement, or other invitation offering to the public for subscription or purchase any shares, issued by or on behalf of the company or by or on behalf of any person who is or has been engaged or interested in the promotion of the company, must state particulars with regard to certain matters therein enumerated, and among them, subsection (1) (e), "the number and amount of shares . . . which within the two preceding years have been issued . . . as fully or partly paid up otherwise than in cash . . . and . . . the consideration for which these shares . . . have been issued."

No attempt was made to comply with any of the requirements of the section in the documents of September 26. At the trial the plaintiff proved that had he known that of the 40,300 shares issued by the company before October, 1921, 30,000 had been issued to the vendors of the patents as fully paid, he would not have subscribed for the 3,000 shares and that he had suffered damage, and the jury answered in the affirmative the question, "Were the documents of September 26 an offer of shares made by the company to the public?" To the further question "Were these documents issued to the public?" they answered, "There is no proof of this." Judgment was not entered at the time, but after further argument on a subsequent date the learned Judge held that there was no evidence that the documents were ever issued to the public and entered judgment for the defendant.

With all respect to the learned Judge and my Lord, I cannot agree with that conclusion. In my opinion, the documents were issued to the public when Mr. Eshelby wrote on September 26 to Mr. Alcock asking him, in substance, to lay the proposition before his clients. That Mr. Alcock so understood it is obvious from his reply of the 28th, and that he did in fact bring it to the notice of one client, through whom it reached the plaintiff, is established.

The intention with which these documents were prepared must be determined by the construction properly imposed on them: they were drafted by the managing director and adopted and approved by the board collectively as an offer to the public to apply for shares, and for what purpose or with what intent were a dozen or two reproduced? If the answer were not obvious it would surely be supplied by the fact that almost before the ink was dry upon them—on the very day on which the directors affixed their approving signatures—one of their body despatched a copy to Mr. Alcock with the sole object of tapping the mineral resources of that gentleman's "well-to-do clients."

It has been well said that the true office of the prospectus is to secure applications from the public, and when the concomitant conditions exhibit a company making desperate efforts to raise further capital, a board of directors settling and approving an invitation to the public, a reproduction of that invitation adequate for the purpose of reaching the limited section of the public likely to entertain the investment, an open appeal to all and sundry in whom Mr. Alcock may succeed in arousing interest and the ultimate trickling of that appeal into the hands of an absolute stranger to the company and those who were in control of it, it is, in my opinion, impossible to resist the inference that the circulars were reproduced and in fact employed to fulfil the office of their existence and to reach a section of the public from which it was anticipated that a response might be forthcoming.

It is one thing for individuals engaged or interested in the promotion of a company to possess themselves of details, even in the shape of an advance copy of the prospectus, which may in due course be advertised or otherwise circulated, and to disclose the information so obtained to friends whose support they may wish to obtain or to whom they desire to point out an attractive investment, but quite another for the company, acting by the board, to hand the same details to any one or more of the directors or some other agent and authorize him or them to utilize the materials for the very purpose for which they were brought into existence—the securing of subscriptions from all and sundry willing to make an offer on the form so conveniently supplied with the information, and even on the former of these invitations I think it might well be held that the document was in fact issued to the public if it could be shown that the company authorized or was cognizant of the use which was being made of it.

The facts of this case are quite distinguishable from such a case as that of Sherwell v. Combined Incandescent Mantles Syndicate, Limited (23 The Times L.R., 482), where some of the directors, without any authority from the company, sent a prospectus marked "not for publication"—which is not the same as "issue"—to their personal friends. Here the invitation was extended, with the authority of the company, broadcast to any outsider whom Mr. Alcock might introduce, and it is idle to suggest that if that gentleman had produced applications from a dozen or more of his clients—wealthy or other—the company would have refused to accept their money.

Nor, with all respect, do I appreciate the relevancy of the argument based on the fact that the plaintiff's was the sole response. The question whether the prospectus was issued does not fall to be determined by the extent of its success, or by the number of copies circulated. The absence of a single response would not negative issue if otherwise established, and I do not accept the view that any burden is cast upon the plaintiff to establish a circulation to others besides himself if the circumstances proved are sufficient to establish an issue to him. Were it otherwise the Court might find itself involved in an inquiry as to the number of copies circulated or issued, and there is certainly nothing in any of the reported cases to suggest that course. Moreover, one can easily conceive a case where, the question of issue not being in dispute, the first individual applied to had agreed to provide all the capital required and had thereby obviated any necessity for further circulation. Could it be argued in such a case that the individual had lost the protection of section 81 because the issue had been confined to him and was therefore not an invitation issued to the public? And if so, at what numerical stage would the Courts recognize the issue as an invitation to the public?

There is no definition in the Act of the word "public." Mr. Justice Farwell in Burrows v. Matabele Gold Reefs and Estates Company, Limited (17 The Times L.R., 364; [1901] 2 Ch., 23), where he was dealing with section 8 of the Act of 1900, which commences with the words "Upon any offer of shares to the public for subscription" and which as amended by section 8 of the Act of 1907 is now reproduced in section 89 of the Act of 1908, said at page 27: "I think that the clue to the meaning of the word 'public' as used in this Act is to be found in section 10, subsection 4"—now section 81, subsection 7—and a little lower down on the same page the same Judge, after reading the subsection and the definition of the word "prospectus," adds, "An offer is not the less made to the public because it is sent to shareholders or debenture-holders as well as to other persons, or because it is not advertised in the public newspapers. But if it is sent solely to the shareholders or debenture-holders of the company, there is no offer to the public. The distinction is between persons who are members or debenture-holders of the company, on the one hand, and those who are not, on the other."

In the present case I do not think it is necessary to resort to that construction of the word—which may indeed be a little too refined, regard being had to places in the Act where the word is used without any apparent contrast between members and outsiders. But the observations of the learned Judge have never, so far as I know, been dissented from, and in construing the word in section 81 where there is a contrast between members and outsiders it may well be that his view ought to be adopted.

But, as I have already indicated, the plaintiff was, in my opinion, a member of the public in a wider sense of the word, ignorant of and unknown to the company and its directorate, to whom the existence of the company and its pecuniary requirements were first made known by what has been held to be "an offer of shares to the public" circulated on behalf of the company by its accredited agent through a particular channel, but with intent to obtain from all and sundry to whom its contents should be made known the much desired subscriptions. I cannot myself appreciate how such a procedure really differs, except in detail, from an advertisement in the public Press addressed to all and sundry who choose to read it. In either case, if the invitation falls short of the statutory requirements, any invitee thereby led to take up shares, if he satisfies the Court that he would not have applied for the shares had the invitation fulfilled the statutory requirements, is entitled to such remedy by way of damages as the Legislature has afforded him.

In my opinion the learned Judge was wrong in holding that there was no issue to the public, and the appeal ought to be allowed and judgment entered for the plaintiff for the damages awarded to him by the jury.

Chan. Div. (Tomlin, J.) 1928. Mar. 7.

ROYAL LONDON MUTUAL INSURANCE SOCIETY, LIMITED v. BARRETT.*

Insurance (Life)—Condition against suicide—Exception in favour of "third party" assignee—Assignment of policy to insurers—Suicide of assured—Whether insurers included in "third party."

An owner of leasehold premises demised them by way of mortgage to the plaintiffs, an insurance company, and assigned to them a policy of insurance effected with them upon his life. The policy provided:—

"The policy shall be void if the life assured dies by suicide or by the hand of justice. . . . The policy shall remain in force to the extent of the pecuniary interest of third parties bona fide acquired for valuable consideration, provided notice thereof in writing shall have been received and admitted by the directors at least one month prior to the date of death."

While the policy was in force the assured committed suicide. In an action by the insurance company against the assured's legal personal representative,

Held, that the insurers were not included in the expression "third party" and therefore the policy was void and they were not bound to satisfy themselves out of it but were entitled to enforce their security against the leasehold premises.

The plaintiffs in this action claimed £850, with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from February 1, 1927, from the defendant, the legal personal representative of an assured person who committed suicide in 1927. They also asked that the defendant should be ordered to deliver up to them certain leasehold premises known as 44, Balmoral-road, Maindee, Newport, Monmouth. By a mortgage dated February 1, 1927, and made between the assured and the plaintiffs, the assured, in consideration of the sum of £850, demised the premises to the plaintiffs for all the unexpired residue of the lease, and by way of additional security assigned to the plaintiffs a policy of assurance on his life effected with them.

Clause 5 of the conditions of the policy provided as follows:—

"Suicides, &c.—The policy shall be void if the life assured dies by suicide or by the hand of justice. . . . The policy shall remain in force to the extent of the pecuniary interest of third parties bona fide acquired for valuable consideration, provided notice thereof in writing shall have been received and admitted by the directors at least one month prior to the date of death."

The plaintiffs contended that the policy of assurance on the assured's life became void under clause 5.

The defendant alleged that by the policy of assurance the plaintiffs agreed to pay £900 to the borrower or to his personal representatives or permitted assigns on the death of the borrower, and that the borrower died while the policy was still in force.

Mr. Gavin Simonds, K.C., and Mr. E. E. H. Brydges appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. G. B. Hurst, K.C., and Mr. A. T. James for the defendant.

Mr. Simonds said that the question which arose was whether the policy became void under clause 5 so that the plaintiff company's only security was the leasehold premises, or whether the policy did not become void, so that the company were bound to satisfy themselves out of it. Where there was an instrument of this kind, there could not be a better way of excluding one or other of the parties than by using the expression "third parties" (White v. British Empire Mutual Life Assurance Company, L.R., 7 Eq., 394). It was not to be thought that it was the wish of the directors to be unjust in this case, but there were others who, in their view, had a better claim to their consideration than the defendant. The policy empowered the directors to make allowances, should the policy for any reason become void, and they wished to keep a free hand in this case.

Mr. Hurst submitted that "third parties" meant any persons other than the assured.

Mr. Simonds, in reply, contended that "third party" meant a person not a party to the transaction.

Mr. Justice Tomlin, in giving judgment, said that the only point was one of construction, arising out of the fact of the suicide of the assured. The policy was void, except in so far as it fell within the exception in clause 5. If the company were right, they could enforce their charge against the leasehold house; if they were wrong, the charge was enforceable against the policy to the extent of the mortgage money, and the leasehold house would go free.

It was impossible to say here that "third party" meant anyone other than the assured and therefore included the insurers. Upon the true construction of the clause the insurers were not included in the expression "third party," and the plaintiffs were entitled to enforce their security against the leasehold house.

Court of Appeal.
(Scrutton and Sankey, L.JJ., and Russell, J.)
1928. Mar. 5.

DE MONCHY AND OTHERS v. PHŒNIX INSURANCE COMPANY OF HARTFORD AND ANOTHER.*

Insurance (Leakage)—Certificate—Issue under alleged policies—Time limit for claim—Limit in policies—No limit in certificate—Volatility of thing insured—Bulk dependent on temperature—Whether "leakage" confined to loss of contents.

The plaintiffs had an interest in a certificate of insurance on 100 barrels of turpentine shipped from Florida to Rotterdam. This certificate had been issued under what were said to be policies of insurance subscribed by the defendants. The policies provided for payment for "leakage" in excess of 1 per cent., and, as the practice was to measure, but not to weigh, the amount shipped, and to weigh, but not to measure, the amount delivered, and as, owing to the volatility of turpentine, the weight of a gallon depended on the temperature, it was provided that the conversion of kilograms into American gallons should be on the basis of 3.25 kilograms to the gallon. The alleged policies contained a condition that no claim under them could be maintained unless brought within a year, but in the certificate there was no such condition. When the turpentine was discharged, the weight was short, as compared with the weight calculated from the number of gallons shipped, but the defendants declined to pay in the absence of injury to the barrels or some clear sign of leakage. The action was brought on the certificate but not within the year.

Held, that the contract was to pay for loss of weight or bulk, even if this was caused by change of temperature and not by loss of some of the contents of the barrels, and that, as the certificate was the actual insurance, and as, in the circumstances, the clause as to limitation of time could not be read into it, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

Decision of MacKinnon, J. (44 The Times L.R., 95), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Mr. Justice MacKinnon (44 The Times L.R., 95) in an action by the plaintiffs in respect of a loss of turpentine by leakage.

The plaintiffs were the owners of a quantity of turpentine which had been shipped in barrels from Florida. They had insured the turpentine with the defendants, two insurance companies, for the voyage. The perils insured against included leakage, and the plaintiffs claimed for loss alleged to have been caused by leakage.

The plaintiffs were interested in a certificate of insurance dated August 17, 1923, issued under an alleged policy of insurance subscribed by the first defendant company, and another alleged policy subscribed by the second defendant company. Each of the defendant companies insured respectively for 50 per cent. of 14,925 florins on 100 barrels of turpentine shipped from Jacksonville, Florida, to Rotterdam, on a steamship, the Cape Town Maru.

The alleged policies contained, inter alia, a clause "to pay leakage from any cause in excess of 1 per cent. on each invoice . . . conversion of kilograms into American gallons shall be made on the basis of 3.25 kilograms to the gallon."

The practice in the trade was not to weigh, but to measure, the amount of turpentine shipped, and to weigh, not measure, the amount of turpentine delivered.

On August 25, 1923, the plaintiffs shipped on the Cape Town Maru, at Jacksonville, 100 barrels of turpentine for carriage to Rotterdam. During the voyage the steamer met with heavy weather, and when the turpentine was discharged at Rotterdam it was alleged that 372.75 kilograms out of a total of 16,597.75 kilograms shipped had disappeared.

Turpentine was a volatile substance which expanded when heated, and the weight of a gallon would depend on the actual temperature at the moment, and a conventional weight per gallon was, therefore, agreed on. Up to a loss of 1 per cent. no claim could be made, but where there was a greater loss the underwriters had been in the habit of paying on the basis of the conventional weight, taking the difference between the weight shipped and the weight delivered as the amount of the loss. In this case the underwriters took the point that the insurance was only against leakage, and though, if the temperature fell, the contents of a barrel might occupy less space without any of the contents being lost, for such loss of bulk the underwriters would not be liable. They contended that "leakage" must be construed strictly, and that the word was applicable only where something which had been in a receptacle had accidentally got out of it and had been lost.

Another point taken by the defence was that the insurance was subject to a condition that no claim under it could be maintained unless brought within a year after the happening of the loss. The action had not been brought within a year. The condition referred to was in the original policies, but not in the certificate under which the plaintiffs were suing. The certificate stated that it represented and took the place of the policy.

Mr. Justice MacKinnon held that the contract was to pay for loss of weight or bulk, even if that loss of weight or bulk was caused by change of temperature and not by loss of some of the contents of the barrels, and that, as the alleged policies were not contracts of insurance at all, but the certificate was the actual insurance, and as, in the circumstances, the clause with regard to the limitation of time for making a claim could not be read into it, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

The defendants appealed.

Mr. W. A. Jowitt, K.C., and Mr. van den Berg appeared for the appellants; and Mr. Porter, K.C., and Mr. McNair for the respondents.

Lord Justice Scrutton.—This appeal against a judgment of Mr. Justice MacKinnon raises two questions, the first, as to the construction of a clause insuring against leakage of turpentine; the second, whether a term requiring an action to be brought within one year of the loss is part of the contract of insurance. This latter question involves the consideration of the important subject of the American system of insurance by American certificate to be tendered under a contract of sale of goods c.i.f. as "insurance."

It appears that turpentine expands and evaporates under heat, and that in the sale of American turpentine for export it is sold in barrels by gallons. A complicated system of gauging the barrels is deposed to in the affidavit of Mr. Register, which I do not repeat, but it includes a system of filling a barrel to one gallon short of its capacity to allow for expansion, which capacity is gauged in America, the turpentine is weighed on arrival in Europe, and a conventional measure to turn gallons into weight is used in the trade to see whether what is shipped is delivered, it being taken in the trade that the normal loss on a voyage by evaporation is 1 per cent. There is a system of insurance of leakage from any cause over the normal 1 per cent. This being the course of trade, on July 27, 1923, the Columbia Naval Stores Company sold to de Monchy, Rotterdam, the present plaintiffs and respondents, 100 barrels of turpentine at a c.i.f. price in Dutch guilders per 16 gallons net shipping weight "one gallon out per barrel," referring to the system of gauging barrels with one gallon short; American net weight to be reduced at one gallon=3.25 kilos; payment by draft at sight with bill of lading and insurance policy attached, and/or certificate of insurance; insurance documents to include risk of leakage in excess of 1 per cent. upon the basis of the above reduction of weight. To carry out this contract, Mr. Register on August 23 gauged 100 barrels of turpentine at Jacksonville, Florida, and made the capacity 5,207 gallons, from which he subtracted 1 gallon per barrel and certified the shipment of 5,107 gallons. The Japanese steamer Cape Town Maru was on the coast of Florida from August 23 to September 19 before she sailed from Savannah for Rotterdam, and there were, therefore, considerable possibilities of evaporation. Meanwhile, the sellers, to carry out their contract of insurance, obtained an American certificate of insurance from the Phœnix Insurance Company of Hartford, and the Great American Insurance Company of New York. This document must be seen to be believed. There is, apparently, a blank form of certificate of insurance which the companies issue to persons who have a contract of insurance with them somewhat similar to an open cover. Someone has filled in a blank certificate with the subject matter of the insurance, "100 barrels pure gum turpentine"; the voyage, "per steamer Cape Town Maru from Jacksonville to Rotterdam"; and the value insured, "14,925 florins"; and then someone has stamped on the front of the document a clause which is also completely illegible and which is stamped over what can be discovered from other sources to have been originally a warehouse to warehouse clause. Someone has stamped on the back two or three clauses which are again on the original almost completely illegible and which also obliterate the names of the agents to whom claims should be made. From a legible copy of another certificate, supplied to this Court by the underwriters, it is clear what has happened. The leakage clause should be stamped on the front of the certificate where there is room for it; and the warehouse to warehouse clause would appear clearly below. Instead of that, the war risks clause has been stamped on the front (1) illegibly, and (2) obliterating the warehouse to warehouse clause. Apparently this was appreciated, and the war risks clause has been stamped a second time on the back, also nearly illegibly, and then the leakage clause has been stamped underneath it. Whether this destroys the protection of the warehouse to warehouse clause we have not to determine.

There was no evidence who produced this monstrosity, but we were told in Court that the sellers put the stamps on and apparently the agents of the companies then countersigned and approved it. I have rarely seen a more discreditable document from a business point of view and the American companies and sellers ought to be ashamed of having tendered it as a business document.

However, for the present point its relevance is the clause as to leakage. The certificate states that the insurance is under policies No. 924 of the Phœnix Insurance Company 50 per cent. interest, and No. 387 of the Great American Insurance Company. Certain bundles of documents were produced to us as representing these policies, and again the originals must be seen to be believed. It is sometimes said that in English policies the office boy sticks on slips and imprints stamps at his own sweet will, regardless of contradictions and repetitions; but an English policy is simplicity itself compared to these bundles. I deal only with the clauses about leakage. In the bundle of documents said to be Policy No. 924 there will be found: (1) A clause "not liable for leakage to molasses or other liquids unless occasioned by stranding or collision." (2) A clause that the company are not liable for leakage from turpentine in barrels when the ship is stranded, &c., and then only for excess of 3 per cent. (3) A clause that for an additional premium leakage may be covered by a clause (a) to pay leakage over 3 per cent. in excess of ordinary leakage of 1 per cent., or (b) to pay leakage from any cause whatsoever in excess of 1 per cent. (4) A clause dated June 15, 1923, the so-called policy being dated September 21, 1921, providing a substituted clause for clause 3 (b) above. It is this clause, apparently, for parts of it are illegible, which is stamped on the back of the insurance certificate.

When the Cape Town Maru arrived at Rotterdam the cargo was weighed by warehousemen in the usual way and a weight note signed. It appears from this weight note that while the average gross weight was about 202 to 197 kilos a barrel, and the average tare 35 to 37 kilos, there was one barrel with only 144 kilos gross, one 181, one 183, one 190, and a series of 195, 195½, and 196 kilos. The weight and gallons converted at the rate in the certificate produced a shortage of 374 kilos or 115 gallons. One per cent. leakage would be 51 gallons or 166 kilos, and there was accordingly a claim for 64 gallons or 208 kilos leakage. On this being presented to the American companies they refused to pay, saying that they would only pay on barrels which showed signs of leakage and/or ullage at time of discharge from the steamer and that "Consignees are not entitled to claim the difference between the shipped and landed weights unless the entire consignment shows signs of leakage." They were told by their English agents, and evidence was given to that effect, that it is impossible to see signs of leakage owing to turpentine being so volatile, and, when dry, leaving no stain on the outside of the barrel. They persisted in their refusal to pay European consignees, though paying their American assured on similar claims.

The action was therefore brought by the consignees, and the companies argued that the evidence of loss of weight was unsatisfactory, that the claim of the consignees did not take into account that the same weight of turpentine would bulk more in Florida in August than at Rotterdam in October, and that there were no signs of leakage.

In my opinion the position of the American companies is untenable. It is probably quite true that the amount claimed as loss by evaporation or leakage from any cause (and evaporation is only a subtle form of leakage) is not the accurate amount, and that if the Kew Laboratory had investigated the matter with strict scientific accuracy a different result would have been arrived at; but the answer is that the insurers have adopted a conventional and business means of roughly estimating the loss; barrels do not all weigh the same, but they have agreed a conventional tare of 80lb. a barrel. The business methods of gauging and weighing are no doubt not precise, but they are those contemplated. The evidence by which they were proved is the ordinary evidence accepted in business matters and in the Commercial Court. It is known that American turpentine is sold and shipped by the gallon, and so a conventional method of turning gallons into kilos is agreed. The underwriters do not mean to insure ordinary evaporation or leakage, and so for one premium they only insure leakage in excess of 4 per cent., for a higher premium leakage in excess of 1 per cent. Anyone would expect turpentine which lay on a steamer on the coast of Florida for nearly a month in August and September to show more than ordinary evaporation or volatile leakage, and it did; in addition two casks leaked badly. In my view this defence of the underwriters fails, and does not reflect any credit on their business methods.

I now turn to the second and more difficult question. The voyage insured was in September and October, 1923. A long discussion as to this loss, and losses by other consignees, took place between the companies, their English agents, the consignees, and their insurance agents, during 1924 and 1925, and the writ was ultimately issued on February 12, 1926, on one consignment as a test case. The defence was delayed by the affidavit of ship's papers, but when in February, 1927, it was delivered it contained a defence which the Judge by mistake attributed to junior counsel for the defendants, but which we were informed was inserted by instructions of the American underwriters, to the effect that there was a clause in the contract of insurance that no action should be maintainable unless commenced within one year from the date of the loss. No such clause appears on the certificate and during the time that the case had been discussed, from the loss to the writ, no hint had been given by the underwriters that there might be such a defence to the action. Their solicitors had been asking for all sorts of information which was quite unnecessary if the point was good and protesting that the underwriters were anxious to get this test action decided as soon as possible.

The clause in question appears in a printed form of policy, headed in print "Cargo" and containing partly in writing the words "Columbia Naval Stores Company of Delaware . . . . Do make insurance and cause to be insured as per form attached." It is not clear who make insurance, the Columbia Company or the companies whose printed names appear at the top of the form. Otherwise the form throws no light on what is insured, nor does the "form attached" which consists of five or six different sets of clauses, in many respects contradictory. If material it would be interesting to set out the various clauses as to war risks, capture and seizure contained in the bundle. In the middle of the printed form of policy there appears this clause: "It is agreed that no suit or action for the recovery of any claim arising under this policy shall be maintainable in any Court unless such suit or action shall have been commenced within one year from the date of the happening of the loss out of which the said claim arose." No reference to it appears on the certificate, and if the European consignee wanted to comply with it he would first have to find out that it was on the form of policy in the United States, secondly, to decide whether it was part of the contract of insurance, thirdly, to find out in what State the policy was issued—which, as the two companies have their head offices in two different States, and the policy was countersigned in a third, is not very easy—fourthly, to ascertain what the laws of each State as to limitation were; and lastly, to see which was the "shortest time permitted." The forms bundled together contain many clauses which it is difficult to believe can apply. For instance, there is in the form attached a clause, "It is warranted by the assured that in all cases where certificates are issued in foreign currency the following clause shall be expressed in each certificate, 'premium and losses, if any, to be settled at .....,'" a sum to be filled in "per pound." No such clause appears in this certificate though it is countersigned by the underwriters. Is the clause part of the insurance in the certificates?—and instances might be multiplied.

I look at the matter from a business point of view. The underwriters know that these certificates will be tendered as contracts of insurance which can be sued on in Europe, thousands of miles from the bundle of documents called Policy No. 924. They say of the certificate that it "represents and takes the place of the policy." They say that "the clauses stamped or written on the back hereof are made a part of this certificate." They do not say that all or some of the clauses in a bundle of documents headed 924 are part of the certificate. On the contrary they say that the certificate takes the place of the policy and represents it. How is it open to underwriters to say that there is a clause not on the certificate which limits the right of recovery under it? If that is so, the certificate does not represent or take the place of the policy. The certificate contains the particulars of the goods insured and valued and the voyage and the ship and the full clause insuring against leakage, from all causes, above 1 per cent. Why cannot the consignee, taking the certificate, sue on it for loss by leakage according to its terms which are that it takes the place of and represents the policy? It may be that if any clauses on the form of policy are relevant to the amount of claim, they may be looked at for the purpose of "adjusting" the claim; but, in my opinion, if the underwriters wish to defeat the adjusted claim by the introduction of a time limit, they must give notice of it on the face of the certificate which takes the place of the policy; otherwise they are simply laying a trap for the European consignee who has no means of knowing of the time limit. Apparently, the question has arisen in the Courts of the State of New York, and in that case, Graham Brothers v. St. Paul's Insurance Company (1 American Maritime Cases, 836) the Judge, Mr. Justice Glennon, took the same view, and held that unless notice of such a clause was given on the face of the certificate it could not be enforced by the underwriters. The Judge said: "Notwithstanding that the certificate provides that the insurance is subject to the terms of the open policy, I think that a due regard for the holder's rights would require that this limitation be brought to his attention by a proper reference thereto in the certificate itself. While it is true that the so-called open policy produced upon the trial by the defendants contained such a limitation, still how is the holder of the certificate to know of such limitation ? " This seems a sound business view with no legal reasons against it and I accept it and am glad that the Courts of the country of origin of this certificate system take the same view of it as I do.

The case may be put in another way. The clause itself refers to a claim arising under the policy. It appears to me that this claim arises under the certificate which alone states the goods and voyage assured, and in this case the risk. If the underwriters wish to bind the assured by a clause of which they give him no express notice on the certificate they must at any rate make it clear in the document which they try to incorporate that any clause of limitation refers to a claim under the certificate. A somewhat similar line of argument was acted on by this Court in the case of Koskas v. Standard Marine Insurance Company (43 The Times L.R., 169) on which the appellants relied. I do not quite know why they relied on it, for what was decided in that case was that the underwriters had not made it clear that notice to Lloyd's agent of a loss was a condition of recovery on the policy, and so could not rely on such a clause as a condition precedent ; and all the Judges pointed out the extreme difficulty of knowing how much, if anything, in the policy was incorporated in the certificate. We were told in the present case : " You must incorporate something, for the perils insured against are not exhaustively stated in the certificate." They are for the purpose of claiming for " leakage from any cause " ; and if the warehouse clause forms part of the certificate, as it does, apparently, in the original form with which the Court has been supplied, the perils insured under the land portion of that clause are stated on the face of the certificate. So are the war risks. It is true that sea perils are not so stated, and underwriters would find some difficulty in resisting their incorporation in the certificate, as a clause against them, which they had negligently omitted. But it is a different thing to try to incorporate a clause in their favour of which they have given the European assured no notice. The judgments of this Court in the case of Donald H. Scott and Co., Limited v. Barclays Bank Limited (39 The Times L.R., 198 ; [1923] 2 K.B., 1) contemplate that a certificate may be such that an action may be brought on it. Incidentally the form of this certificate fully justifies the view in that case that some certificates may not be good tender to a purchaser. In this case, however, the purchaser accepted the certificate.

In my opinion the judgment of Mr. Justice MacKinnon was right and the appeal should be dismissed with costs. I would add that I see no reason to think that the American system of a supposed continuous policy and certificates is any improvement either from a business or legal view on the English system of open cover, declarations, and separate policies, where required—rather the contrary.

Lord Justice Sankey.—The plaintiffs in this case sued under a certificate of insurance dated August 17, 1923, issued under policies of marine insurance subscribed to respectively by each defendant under which the plaintiffs were insured on 100 barrels of turpentine valued at a sum insured for shipment by the steamship Cape Town Maru at and from Jacksonville, Florida, to Rotterdam, Holland, against the ordinary marine perils and against leakage, by a clause in the following terms : " To pay leakage from any cause in excess of one per cent. on each invoice, or whole leakage without deduction if vessel or craft be stranded, sunk, burnt, on fire or in collision, or there be any forced discharge of cargo at a port of distress." The said barrels of turpentine were duly shipped on board the said vessel, but according to the contention of the plaintiffs they suffered from leakage during the voyage and on arrival at Rotterdam there was a shortage, in respect of which they claim.

Three points were taken for the defendants : (1) That there was not sufficient evidence that there had been such a loss. (2) That in any event the loss was not caused by leakage. (3) That in the policy of insurance there was a clause under which the defendants were not to be liable unless the action were brought within a year of the loss.

The learned Judge decided in favour of the plaintiffs and from his judgment the present appeal is brought.

It is necessary to state a few facts before dealing with the points. The turpentine was bought by the plaintiffs from the Columbia Naval Stores Company under a c.i.f. contract. As is usual in this trade in America the vendors took out with the defendants what may be called general policies, which are the policies above referred to, and when they sold the goods under a c.i.f. contract they handed to the purchaser a certificate of insurance " under the general policy," which is the certificate above referred to. A difficulty in the trade is caused by the fact that the amount of the turpentine is ascertained in different ways at the port of shipment and the port of unloading. At the port of shipment it is measured and the result is expressed in gallons. At the port of discharge it is weighed and the result is expressed in kilograms. The certificate of insurance provided the method of converting the kilograms into gallons. At the port of shipment the number of gallons was found to be 5,107. At the port of discharge by the above-mentioned method of calculation it was found to be 4,992. The result was a shortage of 115 gallons.

The defendants claim that under the leakage clause they are entitled to 1 per cent. franchise, which would amount to 51 gallons ; further, that owing to the fact that the temperature at Jacksonville is 20 degrees higher than the temperature at Rotterdam the turpentine at the former place expands and occupies a greater amount of space—that is to say, contains a greater number of gallons than it does in the cooler air of Rotterdam. There was evidence that on a cargo of the present sort the difference would represent 44 gallons. Adding this to the 51 gallons above referred to the defendants say that the real shortage or leakage is only a few gallons, in respect of which they have paid into Court with a denial of liability a sum which is more than sufficient to discharge their liability.

I now deal with the three points : (1) That the evidence with regard to the weighing or measuring is unsatisfactory. It was suggested that the weighing and measuring were a rough-and-ready and so an inaccurate method of ascertaining the quantity, but in cases of this character meticulous accuracy is not demanded either in the City or in the Courts. You do not weigh coal in apothecaries' scales nor measure turpentine in medicine glasses ; neither common sense nor common law requires such a method. Here, according to the affidavits, the measurement at Jacksonville and the weighing at Rotterdam were done in the usual and ordinary way. The learned Judge found that the result was substantially correct and I see no reason to interfere with his decision.

(2) That the greater part of the loss in question was not caused by leakage, but by a physical alteration in the volume due to the difference in temperature. It was said that in effect the plaintiffs, subject to the franchise of 1 per cent. and to the amount for which the payment into Court was made, actually received at Rotterdam what was shipped at Jacksonville. The word "leakage" standing by itself might not perhaps include evaporation and might perhaps refer only to a loss of liquid caused by the liquid getting from inside to the outside of the cask. By custom, however, or by contract a special and artificial meaning may be attached to the word and parties may agree upon a conventional method of ascertaining an amount, although the result may not be mathematically correct. In my view, that is what happened in this case. By the certificate of insurance the defendants agreed to pay for leakage from any cause in excess of 1 per cent., and they agreed that the number of gallons shipped at Jacksonville should be ascertained and the number of kilograms unloaded at Rotterdam ascertained and translated into gallons by means of a conventional calculation, and that the result of that conventional calculation should be compared with the result of the measurement at Jacksonville in order to ascertain the leakage. (3) That there was a time limit for bringing the action. The defendants contend that the limitation clause of 12 months applies to and defeats the present action. That limitation clause does not occur in the certificate, which is the only document that the plaintiffs ever had or saw. It only appears in the policy which, as above pointed out, was the general policy issued to and kept by the vendors. The clause is in the following terms: "It is agreed that no suit or action for the recovery of any claim arising under this policy shall be maintainable in any Court unless such suit or action shall have been commenced within one year from the date of the happening of the loss out of which the said claim arose." It will be noticed that the clause does not contain the words "or any certificate issued thereunder." Indeed, the policy is a somewhat extraordinary document. It consists of an original with many addenda, some of which are stamped on the policy, in some cases over and above clauses already there, in other cases gummed on to it, and in the result it is an almost illegible and unintelligible jumble of stipulations.

The defendants contend that the policy is incorporated by the certificate and forms part of their contract. The plaintiffs, while admitting that some clauses of the policy are incorporated in the certificate, deny that so unusual a clause as this limitation clause ought to be read into it. The learned Judge has accepted this view and I think he was right.

The certificate sued on certifies that the barrels in question were insured under certain policies, No. 924 of the Phœnix Company and No. 387 of the Great American Company; it adds: "This certificate represents and takes the place of the policy and conveys all the rights of the original policy-holder for the purpose of collecting any loss or claims as fully as if the property was covered by a special policy direct to the holder of this certificate and free from any liability for unpaid premiums."

It may be that in order to validate the certificate it is necessary to incorporate certain clauses of the policies and to provide thereby for necessary terms omitted from the certificate, but I do not think it is permissible to incorporate clauses which are not only not necessary to validate the certificate, but which have the effect of restricting it in the way the defendants desire to do.

In my view, if the defendants wish to rely upon a clause of this character they should give ample notice of it by placing it upon the certificate itself in order to show that the right of the assured is a strictly limited one, namely, a right which can only be enforceable within 12 months of the loss. The American decision of Graham Bros. v. St. Paul's Insurance Company (1 American Maritime Cases, 836) is to this effect. See the judgment of Mr. Justice Glennon at page 839.

For these reasons and for those given by Mr. Justice MacKinnon I am of opinion that this clause cannot be read into the certificate. In coming to this conclusion we are not in any way impugning the decision given by this Court in Donald H. Scott and Co., Limited v. Barclays Bank Limited (39 The Times L.R., 198; [1923] 2 K.B., 1), where the real question was whether the certificate there was an approved policy within the meaning of the contract in the case and the Court of Appeal held that it was not, or in Koskas v. Standard Marine Insurance Company (43 The Times L.R., 169), where this Court held that they were not satisfied that compliance with the clause therein referred to was a condition precedent to the plaintiffs' success.

In my opinion the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Mr. Justice Russell.—I agree that this appeal should be dismissed and I only desire to express my views upon the question whether the one year clause applies, so as to defeat the plaintiffs' claim.

For brevity's sake I propose dealing with that matter as if only one policy, namely, No. 924 of the Phœnix Company, had to be considered.

In order to defeat the plaintiffs' claim the defendants must establish that the plaintiffs are bound by the one year clause as part of the contract under which they establish their claim to the insurance moneys.

The one year clause may, with diligence, be found in the crazy patchwork of documents and clauses which constitute Policy No. 924. The argument that the one year clause is part of the contract with the plaintiffs is based on the following matters. (1) The certificate states the insurance as being under Policy No. 924. (2) The certificate states only some of the risks insured: it does not mention perils of the sea. (3) The certificate provides in terms that claims are to be adjusted according to the usages of Lloyd's, but subject to the conditions of the policy and the contract of insurance. Koskas' case (43 The Times L.R., 169) is relied upon as establishing that, in these circumstances, one is bound to treat the policy and certificate as one document so that all the provisions contained in the policy are binding upon the holder of the certificate, except only such as are inconsistent with the provisions of the certificate. Hence it would follow that the certificate holder would be bound by the one year clause, even though he never knew of its existence.

On the other side the contention is that the certificate is stated to represent and take the place of the policy, and that, throughout the certificate, claims by the assured are described as claims "under the certificate"; further, it is pointed out that in some respects and for some purposes, the certificate specifically incorporates the terms of the policy, and this would be unnecessary if the provisions of the policy were intended to be incorporated en bloc.

There is no doubt much to be said in support of each of these rival views. There is, however, in my opinion, one thing which is reasonably clear about these documents :—namely, the intention of all parties that as far as is possible the certificates should be self-contained independent documents under which (without having recourse to any other document) insurance claims could be made and enforced by the indorsee against the Phœnix Company. In other words the terms of Policy No. 924 are not to be taken into account except to the extent that either the terms of the certificate or necessity may require. With those exceptions the rights of the indorsee are to be governed by the certificate and nothing else. To impute any other intention would be to impute an intention which would clog and hamper business, and which would be contrary to some of the express provisions of the certificate. There is in Koskas' case (supra) nothing which is contrary to this view. The point for decision in that case was whether compliance with a clause printed on and forming part of the certificate of insurance was a condition precedent to the right of the assured to sue. The certificate was silent as to risks insured. The Court held that in order to ascertain whether compliance was a condition precedent you must look at the whole contract, which in that case must necessarily include the policy which alone contained the risks insured. Upon a consideration of the policy and certificate they were unable to come to a conclusion that compliance with the clause was a condition precedent.

But for the purpose of making and enforcing their present claim against the Phœnix Company the plaintiffs have no need to refer to the policy at all except in regard to rates of exchange, the provision for which is contained in the policy and is specifically incorporated in the certificate as one of the conditions of the policy relating to adjustment. The risk in question in this action, namely, leakage, is specified in the certificate together with the machinery for comparing gallons with kilograms.

Why then, in this case, should or need the one year clause be imported into the certificate ? It applies in terms only to "any claim arising under this policy." It does not in terms apply to a claim under the certificate ; or a claim arising under the two documents jointly, or indeed to a claim arising by virtue of the policy. This may seem a narrow construction of the words used, but I see no reason for adopting, for the benefit of the underwriters, a more benevolent meaning of a clause inserted by them for the purpose of restricting the rights of their customers.

In my opinion where, as here, you have a claim under the certificate for loss in respect of a cargo specified in the certificate, by reason of a risk specified in the certificate, it would be wrong and contrary to the true intention of the parties, to apply to such a claim a provision of the policy which relates to a claim made under the policy and does not refer to a claim made under a certificate.

This is, in my view, sufficient to dispose of this point in the present appeal.

I express no opinion as to what the position would be if the claim had been in respect of a risk not covered by the certificate, but covered by the provisions of the policy ; where of necessity the policy must be referred to and read in conjunction with the certificate.

CREDITON GAS COMPANY v. CREDITON URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL.*

Contract—Determination—No provision giving power to determine—Supply of gas to local authority—Whether contract binding for ever.

The plaintiffs, a gas company, made a contract with the defendants, a local authority, to light all the public lamps in the defendants' area "from and after the first day of September in every year up to the following first day of May inclusive." The contract contained no provision for its determination by either party, but it recited an earlier agreement which was to remain in force until the defendants should determine it ; and a supplemental agreement provided that the property in new lamps was to vest in the defendants if the contract lasted 15 years. After some years the defendants served on the plaintiffs a notice determining the contract on the expiration of four months. In an action for a declaration that the defendants could not determine the contract without the plaintiffs' consent,

Held, that it was in the power of the defendants to determine the contract, and the action failed.

Decision of Russell, J. ([1927] W.N., 325) affirmed.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of Mr. Justice Russell ([1927] W.N., 325).

By the terms of the Crediton Gas Act, 1906, the Crediton Gas Company was a body corporate with perpetual succession and a common seal, and by an agreement under seal made on March 30, 1909, with the Crediton Urban District Council, the company undertook to light all the public lamps in Crediton "from and after the first day of September in every year up to the following first day of May inclusive." Certain rates of payment were agreed upon, which were varied by a supplemental agreement dated June 30, 1921.

Neither agreement contained any provision whether, or how, either party could determine the contract.

On April 30, 1927, the council served a notice on the gas company "to determine their agreement with you for the public lighting of their district on August 31, 1927." The gas company contended that the agreement could not be terminated by the council without their consent, and brought an action for a declaration to that effect.

Mr. Justice Russell said that the plaintiffs had relied on observations by Lord Justice James in Llanelly Railway and Dock Company v. London and North Western Railway Company (L.R., 8 Ch., 942, at p. 949), approved by Lord Selborne in the House of Lords (L.R., 7 H.L., 550, at p. 567), as indicating that an agreement of the kind, mentioning no limit of time, was perpetual, but he did not think these remarks applied to the contract in the present case. Nor could the contract be held to be permanent merely because the character of perpetuity attached to both contracting parties. He thought that there was an implication that either party could terminate on notice, and he therefore dismissed the action.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. Grant, K.C., and Mr. D. D. Robertson appeared for the appellants ; Mr. Spens, K.C., and Mr. H. S. G. Buckmaster for the respondents.

The MASTER of the ROLLS, in giving judgment, said that the question was whether, on the true construction of an agreement between the parties, under which the plaintiffs agreed to supply the defendants with gas, that agreement ought to be treated as a perpetual agreement under which the plaintiffs were entitled to supply the defendants with gas for ever. His Lordship then stated the history of the agreement, which confirmed a previous verbal agreement. The plaintiffs were incorporated as a statutory company under the Crediton Gas Act, 1906, which incorporated portions of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and the Gasworks Clauses Acts, 1847 and 1871. The plaintiffs were under a public duty to supply the defendants with so much gas as they should require to be supplied to them from time to time, and by section 10 of the Act it was provided that all existing contracts then in force should be as binding as if the statutory company had been a party thereto. These contracts were not under seal, and any contract with the defendant council would be invalid under the Public Health Acts unless under seal. But, as was said by Mr. Justice Walton in Brooks, Jenkins and Co. v. Torquay Corporation and Others (18 The Times L.R., 139 ; [1902] 1 K.B., 601, at p. 607), "it was not ultra vires for the local authority to pay for the work of which they had had the benefit."

On March 30, 1909, an agreement under seal was entered into between the plaintiffs and the defendants, at the instance of the defendants' auditors, and that was supplemented by a further agreement of June 30, 1921. These agreements were determined by notice dated April 30, 1927. No question was argued as to the length of notice, but it was said by the plaintiffs that there being no provision for the determination of the agreements they were still binding on the defendants, and for that proposition the authority of Llanelly Railway and Dock Company v. London and North Western Railway Company (L.R., 8 Ch., 942) was relied on. There Lord Justice James said (at pp. 949 and 950) :—

"I start with this proposition, that prima facie every contract is permanent and irrevocable, and that it lies upon a person who says that it is revocable or determinable to show either some expression in the contract itself, or something in the nature of the contract, from which it is reasonably to be implied that it was not intended to be permanent and perpetual, but was to be in some way or other subject to determination. No doubt there are a great many contracts of that kind : a contract of partnership, a contract of master and servant, a contract of principal and agent, a contract of employer and employed in various modes—all these are instances of contracts in which, from the nature of the case, we are obliged to consider that they were intended to be determinable. All the contracts, however, in which this has been held are, as far as I know, contracts which involve more or less of trust and confidence . . . . more or less of personal relations between the parties."

Here it was argued that no personal relations between the parties were involved in the present contract. But it was not unimportant to remember that the facts in that case were very special. The London and North Western Railway Company were anxious to obtain access to the town of Swansea, and agreed to use the access provided by the Llanelly Railway Company, which wanted money and agreed to give the London and North Western Railway Company running powers over their line into Swansea in consideration of a loan of £40,000. There was nothing of a transient nature in that contract. But how far did that principle apply to the present case ? Counsel had admitted that the defendants' obligation under the agreement was only to take so much gas as they wanted from time to time, and that they could have discontinued the use of half their street lamps if they wished.

The contract per se was not of the same character as that construed in the Llanelly Railway case (supra). There was a recital in the contract of 1909 referring to an earlier agreement which was to remain in force "until the council should determine the same," and that recital threw some light on the construction of the contract. There was, further, an indication contained in a clause of the supplemental contract, as to the property in new lamps, which was to vest in the defendant council if the agreement lasted for 15 years. Reading that supplemental agreement into the earlier one, it appeared clear that the determination of the contract was entirely within the power of the defendant council. It could not be said to be binding on the defendants in sæcula sæculorum. The appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

LORD JUSTICE SARGANT was of the same opinion. The contract itself must be examined in conjunction with the circumstances existing when it was entered into. On March 30, 1909, the parties were in this relative position. The plaintiffs were a statutory company bound to supply gas in accordance with their private Act. They were a new company formed, on the dissolution of an old limited company, by reincorporation of its members. Under the terms of the statute the engagements already binding on the limited company were made binding on the statutory company, and under section 24 of the Gasworks Clauses Act, 1871, they were bound to supply the defendant council with so much gas as they should from time to time require. On the other hand, it was a unilateral obligation, and their customers were not bound to take any more gas than they might require. The recital in the contract of 1909 showed that there was no definite scrapping of any existing agreement ; the intention of it was to state definitely and under seal the existing obligations of the parties. As far as he (his Lordship) could see there was no creation by the agreement of any obligation on the part of the defendants to take gas from the plaintiffs, only a right of the defendants to demand and an obligation on the plaintiffs to supply the gas demanded, with stipulations as to prices and times. What was alleged by the plaintiffs was that the agreement of 1909 had radically changed the position as between the parties, and bound the defendants to take a definite minimum supply of gas from the plaintiffs for ever afterwards. That was quite inconsistent with the recitals in the agreement, and if any further confirmation were required of the construction which he (his Lordship) preferred to adopt, it was to be found in clause 1 (c) of the supplemental agreement referring to a possible determination of the agreement, and what was to take place in that event. Reference had been made to the case of Llanelly Railway and Dock Company v. London and North Western Railway Company (L.R., 7 H.L., 550), but the circumstances of that case were so different that it could be no authority in the circumstances of the present case. His Lordship then referred to the judgment therein of Lord Justice James and proceeded. The agreement mainly contained a statement of the method by which the supply of gas should be given to the defendants, and how it was to be paid for. That being so, the local authority was at liberty to obtain light from another source, and to notify the plaintiffs that they would not require a supply of gas in the future.

LORD JUSTICE LAWRENCE, who agreed, said he would only add a few words. In arriving at the meaning of the agreement it was important to remember the circumstances at the time when it was executed; there was a verbal agreement for the supply of gas which was to remain in force until determined. The Government auditor insisted that in order to regularize the defendants' payments for gas there ought to be an agreement made under seal. Accordingly the agreement of 1909 was prepared and executed. It contained a recital of the arrangements in existence before it was executed, and referred to the verbal agreement "to remain in force and be binding upon both parties until determined by the council." There was not a word in the agreement binding the council to take gas in any particular quantity, or of any particular quality. There was nothing in it to bind the defendant council in perpetuity to take gas whether they required it or not; it was purely a record of the terms and conditions of the supply of gas, so long as the relation of supplier and customer should last, and the relation was to remain on the old footing. The revocable bargain recited should, if it had been intended so to do, have been expressly varied by the agreement. That view was amply fortified by the supplemental agreement of 1921, in which the parties incidentally recognized that the main agreement might come to an end at any time. The cases cited by counsel for the appellants were distinguishable. Mr. Justice Russell had come to a right conclusion, and the appeal must be dismissed.

IN RE PITT—PITT v. MANN AND OTHERS.*

Trust—Administratrix—Debts paid and estate cleared—Power of Court to confirm appointment of new trustees by administratrix.

An administratrix with the will annexed, having paid all the debts and cleared the estate, executed a deed appointing two trustees of the will in her place and asked the Court to confirm the appointment.

Held, that the new trustees had been properly appointed by the deed.

The plaintiff, Agnes M. M. Pitt, was administratrix with the will annexed of Fanny C. E. Pitt, who died on January 13, 1917. The plaintiff, after paying the debts and clearing the estate, by deed dated October 11, 1927, appointed T. M. S. Pitt and E. L. Rowcliffe trustees of the will in her place.

The plaintiff issued this originating summons asking, inter alia, that it might be declared that the defendants, T. M. S. Pitt and E. L. Rowcliffe, were duly appointed trustees of the will by the indenture dated October 11, 1927, and if so whether in the place of the plaintiff or jointly with her, or if not so appointed that the defendants or some other fit and proper persons might be appointed trustees thereof under section 41 of the Trustee Act, 1925.

Mr. A. L. Ellis appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. J. H. Barron for the defendant trustees; Mr. Stafford Crossman for the next-of-kin; and Mr. Howard Wright for persons claiming to be interested under the will.

Mr. ELLIS called the attention of the Court to the decision in In re Ponder—Ponder v. Ponder ([1921] 2 Ch., 59), where in similar circumstances it was held that the Court had the same power of appointing a new trustee jointly with the administrator as it had of appointing a new trustee together with an executor functus officio.

MR. JUSTICE CLAUSON made a declaration that on the true construction of the deed of October 11, 1927, the defendant trustees had been properly appointed trustees.

SINANIDE v. LA MAISON KOSMEO.*

Copyright—Original literary work—Phrase in advertisement—Beauty "a social necessity"—Copyright Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V., c. 46), s. 1.

The plaintiff, an electro-therapist, used in his advertisements of face treatment a phrase which he claimed to have invented, namely, that beauty (or youthful appearance) was "a social necessity, not a luxury." The defendant, who carried on the business of a beauty specialist and was in the habit of advertising his beauty treatment, then began to use in his advertisements the words, "A youthful appearance is a social necessity." In an action for breach of copyright,

Held, that the plaintiff's phrase was an "original literary work" within s. 1 of the Copyright Act, 1911, and was a good subject of copyright, and, as the defendant had unconsciously taken the phrase from some advertisement of the plaintiff, the latter was entitled to an injunction and nominal damages.

This action raised a question of infringement of copyright in an advertisement. The plaintiff, Dr. Oreste Sinanide, of 53, Sloane-street, S.W., an electro-therapist, contended that the defendant, Mr. Charles Francis Medlicott Abbott Brown, trading as La Maison Kosmeo, of 49, South Molton-street, W., who carried on the business of a plastic and cosmetic surgeon, had adopted in his advertisements a phrase which he (the plaintiff) had invented as a slogan for various advertisements connected with his work.

* Reported by T. R. F. BUTLER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. H. St. John Field appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Cartwright Sharp for the defendant.

Mr. St. John Field, in opening the case, said that the plaintiff had obtained diplomas in medicine and higher clinical training in the Universities of Athens and Paris. Since 1925 he had dealt mainly with the treatment of the human face, and it had been necessary for him to advertise to a considerable extent in connexion with that treatment. The plaintiff claimed to have invented a slogan in regard to those advertisements. The phrase was: "Beauty is a social necessity, not a luxury." The first word was sometimes varied to "youthfulness," or "youthful appearance," or "good looks"; but it was in the latter portion of the slogan—that was to say, the words "a social necessity, not a luxury"—that copyright was claimed. The defendant had also been advertising his beauty treatment for some time, but had not adopted a phrase similar to that used by the plaintiff before May 29, 1926, when he inserted in the Illustrated Sporting and Dramatic News an advertisement in these words:—"A youthful appearance is a social necessity."

The same phrase had been repeated in various subsequent advertisements. Before that date his usual slogan had been "Beauty is the best letter of introduction," a phrase which, counsel believed, was generally ascribed to Diogenes or Socrates. The plaintiff's contention was that the defendant's phrase was taken from that adopted by the plaintiff, and therefore constituted a breach of copyright.

The plaintiff gave evidence corroborating counsel's statement.

Mr. Cartwright Sharp, for the defendant, said that the defendant had been established for 23 years as a beauty specialist. He had sought to alter his advertisements at various times. In the spring of 1926 he wished to adopt a ladder design for a new advertisement. Various phrases were tried, till at last the right one was obtained in much the same manner as various words were tried, one after the other, to fit into the solution of a cross-word puzzle. The defendant had no idea that the particular phrase in question came from any other source.

Evidence was called on behalf of the defendant, and counsel addressed the Court.

Mr. Justice Humphreys, in giving judgment, said that the questions he had to decide were whether the phrase "Youthful appearance is a social necessity, not a luxury" could be the subject of copyright, and, if it could, whether the defendant had copied that phrase in such a way as to infringe the plaintiff's copyright therein.

Section 1 of the Copyright Act, 1911, provided that there should be copyright "in every original literary work." In considering whether the phrase in question was an "original literary work," the fact that it was used in an advertisement was no bar to its being a work of that kind. That followed from the decision in Maple and Co. v. Junior Army and Navy Stores (21 Ch. D., 369), which, so far as he was aware, was the first case in which it was decided that there could be copyright in an advertisement. The later cases had thrown no doubt on that point.

One of the reasons which led him to the conclusion that this phrase was "original" was that it was so obviously untrue. It was not correct to use the word "necessity" as a substitute for desirability of youthful appearance or beauty, which every one admitted. Beauty was certainly always an advantage, but he was not quite sure that the same applied to a youthful appearance. The phrase, however, was rather an arresting one, and if it had not been used by the plaintiff in his advertisement as "original" attention would, no doubt, have been called by the defendant to the use of the phrase in some other advertisement. In his judgment, therefore, the phrase did come within the language of the Copyright Act, 1911, as being the subject of copyright.

On the question whether the defendant had copied the phrase, it was not necessary that he (his Lordship) should find that there had been an intentional copying. He preferred to draw a distinction between stealing and copying of copyright. A breach of copyright might consist in the unconscious use of another's material, although the basis of copyright law might be the undesirability of breaking the Eighth Commandment. It was, however, significant that the defendant had been consistently varying his advertisements since 1905, but that it did not occur to him before 1926 how excellent the particular phrase adopted by the plaintiff would be to use in the exercise of a somewhat similar business; and that the first occasion on which it occurred to him was at a time when the plaintiff had been using that advertisement for some months with ever-increasing importance. He (his Lordship) therefore came to the conclusion that the defendant had unconsciously taken this phrase from some advertisement of the plaintiff which he had seen. There was nothing against the integrity or honesty of the defendant.

In the result the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction and nominal damages, which might be assessed at a shilling, and costs.

IN RE MADGE—PRIDIE v. BELLAMY.*

Will — Construction — Bequest—Articles to be selected by donee — Death of donee without making selection—Failure of bequest.

A testator bequeathed to his wife such articles as she should within two months select from the articles in certain rooms in a house. Five days after the death of the testator his wife died without having made any selection.

Held, that the right of selection did not pass to the wife's executors and therefore the bequest failed.

By his will, dated July 27, 1925, Sir William Thomas Madge, Bt., bequeathed to his wife "such articles of domestic or household use or ornament at Broughton Lodge, other than articles (not being pictures) belonging to or usually in the dining room or billiard room, as she should select within two months." Sir William Madge died on January 29, 1927. His wife died five days later without having exercised her right of selection. Her executors chose certain articles within the two months, and this summons was taken out to determine whether the right of selection was personal to Lady Madge, or whether it passed to her executors.

Mr. Wilfrid M. Hunt appeared for the independent executor of Sir William's will (two other executors were beneficially interested under the will); Mr.

* Reported by J. B. B. MacMahon, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

P. H. L. Brough for the executors of Lady Madge; Mr. Winterbotham for Sir Frank Madge, Bt., the testator's grandson; and Mr. David Ll. Jenkins for Mrs. Forman, the testator's daughter.

MR. JUSTICE RUSSELL, in the course of his judgment, said that there was no modern authority, and one had to go back to Coke upon Littleton and Sheppard's Touchstone. But apart from any authority, it seemed from the words of the gift that the choice of the articles was to be the personal choice of the widow, and that until it was made there was no gift to her. Two passages had been cited to him, one from Coke upon Littleton, and the other from Sheppard's Touchstone.

In Coke upon Littleton, at page 145 a, there was this passage:

"Note, as to elections, these diversities following: First, when nothing passeth to the feoffee or grantee before election to have the one thing or the other, there the election ought to be made in the life of the parties, and the heir or executor cannot make election. But when an estate or interest passes immediately to the feoffee, donee, or grantee, there election may be made by them, or by their heirs or executors."

So, too, in Sheppard's Touchstone, at page 251:—

"So it is when a man hath six horses in his stable, and he doth grant me one of his horses, but doth not say which of them; in this case I may choose which I will have; and in these cases, when I have made my election, and not before, the grant is good. And if, in these cases, the grantee doth not make his election during his life, it seems the grant will never be good."

Those cases dealt with grants, but it seemed to him (his Lordship) that the same principle applied to gifts by will. When nothing passed to the donee until election the choice must be made during life, and, therefore, in this case the bequest failed because the wife died before she made her election.

HEWETT AND OTHERS v. ESSEX COUNTY COUNCIL.*

Lands—Compulsory acquisition—Compensation—Bridge—Construction under statutory powers—Interference with access to wharf—Compensation obtainable by wharf-owners.

A county council was authorized by statute to construct a bridge over a navigable river giving access to a wharf resorted to by sea-going vessels and used for storage. The county council built the bridge and it interfered with access to the wharf, so that goods had to be transhipped into barges and the owners of the wharf had to acquire a new one. The freeholders and a mortgagee and the occupiers of the old wharf, the last-mentioned persons being tenants at will, claimed compensation as follows:—(1) Depreciation of freehold value of wharf, (2) cost of new wharf, (3) damage through loss of traffic at old wharf, (4) damage by reason of extra cost of handling traffic at new wharf, (5) damage to river sailing barge traffic, (6) damage from stoppage of dumb craft with goods for overseas, and (7) damage from loss of storage rents.

Held, that the wharf-owners were entitled only to compensation under the first head and not under any of the other heads.

This was an award in the form of a special case stated by Mr. Hugh C. Webster, an official arbitrator under the Acquisition of Land (Compensation) Act, 1919.

The claimants were chiefly members of the Hewett family, which had for generations owned a wharf, known as Hewett's Quay, on that part of the River Roding called Barking Creek, Essex. The claimants were respectively interested as follows:—Robert Muirhead Hewett, freeholder of part; Alice Minna Hewett, his wife, freeholder of part; Emily Ann Hewett, spinster, mortgagee; and the River Roden Company, Limited (a private company, whose directors and shareholders were all members or connexions of the Hewett family), occupiers.

The respondents, the Essex County Council, were empowered by the Essex County Council (Barking Bridge) Act, 1923, to construct a bridge for vehicular and pedestrian traffic across the river in question. The Act incorporated the Lands Clauses Acts (except sections 127 and 133 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845). The respondents, in pursuance of their statutory powers, constructed a bridge across the river. Barking Creek was navigable for sea-going vessels and sailing and other barges, and, before the construction of the bridge, gave access for such vessels and barges to Hewett's Quay, which was much resorted to by them for unloading goods. It was also much used for the storage and loading of goods consigned there for shipment.

The bridge constituted an obstruction to the navigation of the river and interfered with access to the wharf, so that sea-going vessels could no longer reach it, but had to tranship goods destined for the wharf into barges below the bridge. Sailing barges were also delayed owing to the necessity of lowering gear for the purpose of passing under the bridge. The business of Hewett's Quay was thereby much damaged and its value was much diminished, and the claimants were compelled to acquire a new wharf below the bridge for the purpose of dealing with such portion of their traffic as could be handled there.

They jointly claimed compensation under the following seven heads:—

(1) Depreciation of freehold value of wharf, £8,000. (2) Cost of new wharf, £9,900. (3) Damage sustained through loss of traffic at old wharf, £25,710. (4) Damage sustained by reason of extra cost of handling such portion of their traffic as they were able to deal with at the new wharf, £19,747. (5) Damage sustained to river sailing barge traffic, £500. (6) Damage sustained by total stoppage of dumb craft with goods for overseas, £62 10s. (7) Damage sustained by loss of storage rents, £3,900. Total, £67,909 10s.

Subject to the determination by the High Court as to the right of the claimants to recover anything in respect of items 2 to 7 inclusive, the arbitrator awarded the claimants £1,400 in respect of item No. 1 (depreciation of freehold), and £3,750 in respect of the other six items (depreciation of business). The arbitrator found that the River Roden Company, Limited, which carried on the business at the wharf, were tenants at will of the freeholders, Robert Muirhead Hewett and Alice Minna Hewett, and paid no rent. Mr. and Mrs. Hewett held 9,901 out of 9,917 shares, the other 16 being held by other members of the family. He found that the claimants in acquiring and equipping Orrock's Wharf acted reasonably in order to mitigate the loss and damage which would otherwise have been inflicted on them, which consisted of :—(1) Depreciation in the value of Hewett's Wharf ; (2) Injury to their trade, viz. :—(a) The expense of equipping Orrock's Wharf; (b) loss of trade ; (c) increased cost in carrying on their trade.

The claimants submitted the following points of law :—(1) They had joined all parties known to have any interest in Hewett's Wharf, and if the claimants failed to give the respondents a satisfactory discharge for the compensation awarded, the respondents could deposit the same in the bank as prescribed by section 76 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. (2) The claimants, as the owners of Hewett's Wharf, had the right of navigating Barking Creek as members of the public, but had, in addition, the exclusive access to and from Hewett's Wharf from and to the Creek, which was not a right in common with the rest of the public, and their right of exclusive access had been interfered with and injuriously affected by the construction of the bridge. (3) The claimants as the owners of that right of exclusive access to and from Hewett's Wharf were entitled to claim compensation for the resulting depreciation in value of Hewett's Wharf, and also for the loss and damage resulting to them by reason of the access of oversea and coast-wise vessels and sailing barges being obstructed, and for all other loss and damage thereby resulting. (4) On the assumption that it had become impossible for them to carry on at Hewett's Wharf the oversea and coast-wise portion of their business, it became their duty to mitigate so far as they could the resulting loss and damage and, for the purpose of so doing, they were entitled to acquire Orrock's Wharf below the bridge.

They therefore claimed to be entitled to recover compensation for (i.) the depreciation in value of Hewett's Wharf; (ii.) the cost of providing, equipping and maintaining Orrock's Wharf after giving the respondents credit for whatever sum might be awarded in respect of depreciation of the net annual value of Hewett's Wharf ; (iii.) all business lost by the obstruction, i.e., business which could not commercially be transferred to or carried on at Orrock's Wharf ; (iv.) any additional expense imposed on the claimants in carrying on business at either wharf.

The respondents submitted the following points of law :—

(1) That a mere tenant at will could not claim compensation for injurious affection; a mere tenancy at will could not be injuriously affected ; (2) that the company could not claim jointly with the freeholders ; they had no joint interest or interest in common which could be the subject of a joint award ; (3) that when no land was taken the measure of compensation for injurious affection was the depreciation, if any, in market value irrespective of any particular business carried on.

The question for the opinion of the Court was whether the claimants were entitled to recover in respect of items No. 2 to No. 7 of their claim.

Sir Lynden Macassey, K.C., and Mr. Tristram Beresford appeared for the claimants ; the Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Mr. W. Bowstead for the respondents.

In support of the respondents' third point the case of Metropolitan Board of Works v. Howard (5 The Times L.R., 732) was relied upon.

The Lord Chief Justice said that the question for the opinion of the Court was whether the claimants were entitled to compensation in respect of items No. 2 to No. 7 of their particulars of claim. In the opinion of the Court they were not so entitled, and, therefore, in the result, the claimants would receive £1,400 in respect of item No. 1. The arbitrator had dealt with the question of costs with the exception of the costs of the present argument, to which the acquiring authority were entitled.

LEVENE v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.
INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. LYSAGHT.*

Revenue — Income-tax — Exemption — "Resident"—"Ordinarily resident"—Meaning of expressions—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), s. 46 ; Sched. C, Rule 2 (d).

Consideration of the meaning of the expression "ordinarily resident" in Rule 2 (d) of Schedule C of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and of the expression "resident" in s. 46 of the same Act.

One decision of the Court of Appeal (43 The Times L.R., 337 ; [1927] 2 K.B., 38) affirmed, and another decision of the Court of Appeal (43 The Times L.R., 337 ; [1927] 2 K.B., 55) reversed.

In the first case Mr. Levene appealed against an order of the Court of Appeal (43 The Times L.R., 337 ; [1927] 2 K.B., 38), affirming an order of Mr. Justice Rowlatt (42 The Times L.R., 743), which affirmed a determination of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts in favour of the Crown. In the second case the Inland Revenue Commissioners appealed against an order of the Court of Appeal (43 The Times L.R., 337 ; [1927] 2 K.B., 55), reversing by a majority an order of Mr. Justice Rowlatt, which affirmed a similar determination of the Special Commissioners.

The House dismissed the appeal in Levene's case, and allowed (by a majority, the Lord Chancellor dissenting) the appeal in Lysaght's case.

The questions for the determination were (mutatis mutandis) the same in both appeals, but the facts of the two cases were different. Those questions were whether the appellant in the first case (or the respondent in the second case) was, during the material years, shown to have been (a) a person not "resident" in the United Kingdom for the purposes of Rule 2 (d) of the General Rules applicable to Schedule C of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and therefore entitled to relief from income-tax in respect of interest or dividends on securities of a foreign State or British Possession payable in the United Kingdom ; or (b) a person not "ordinarily resident" in the United Kingdom for the purpose of section 46 of that Act and therefore entitled to exemption from income-tax in respect of British War Loan.

* Reported by H. B. Hemming, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

LEVENE'S CASE.

In this case the material period consisted of the five income-tax years beginning on April 6, 1920, and ending on April 5, 1925.

Early in 1918 the appellant, who had then decided to live abroad, surrendered the lease of his house in London and sold his furniture. Thereafter, until December, 1919, he maintained no sort of establishment in this country, but stayed at various hotels here. The appellant had previously applied for a passport for himself and his wife to leave England in pursuance of his decision, but these applications were refused. Upon his third application, made in November, 1918, a passport was granted to the appellant and his wife, and they went abroad, though they were detained in England and unable to leave until December, 1919, owing to the state of health of the appellant's wife.

In the course of the five years above mentioned the appellant (who was not always accompanied by his wife) was in England for a total of 102 weeks only out of 260 weeks. For the remaining 158 weeks he was in Monaco or France. During the years 1922, 1923, and 1924 the appellant was in treaty for flats in Monaco (in which place he had decided to set up a permanent establishment), but no suitable premises could be found, and all negotiations fell through until, in January, 1925, the appellant took a nine years' lease of an unfurnished flat in Monaco, where he had since resided with his wife. Since he gave up his residence here in 1918 the appellant had never had any intention of again taking a flat or a house in Great Britain. While in Monaco or France, the appellant and his wife (until the flat at Monaco was taken) lived in hotels.

The reasons for the visits of the appellant and his wife to this country were to obtain medical advice; to visit relatives; to take part in certain religious observances; to visit the graves of parents; and to deal with income-tax matters, including preparation for and attendance upon the hearing of his claims for exemption from tax, the refusal of which was the origin of this appeal. In no year was the appellant physically present in the United Kingdom for a period equal to six months.

The income of the appellant was derived from securities of British Possessions and British War Loan, and in respect of the income-tax paid on or deducted from this income the appellant had preferred claims to relief and repayments.

The Special Commissioners rejected the appellant's claim, being of opinion that during the material period the appellant was resident and ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt affirmed the determination of the Special Commissioners, and his decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal (the Master of the Rolls (Lord Hanworth), Lord Justice Sargant, and Lord Justice Lawrence).

Mr. Maugham, K.C., and Mr. Nissim appeared for the appellant; the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.), the Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.), and Mr. R. P. Hills for the respondents.

The Lord Chancellor.—My Lords: The appellant, Mr. L. N. Levene, has been assessed to income-tax on his dividends from securities of British Possessions and from War Loan for the tax year 1920-21 and the succeeding four tax years, and has claimed to be excused from such tax, that is to say, from tax on the dividends from the securities of British Possessions, on the ground that during the years in question he was not "resident" in the United Kingdom within the meaning of Rule 2 (d) of the General Rules applicable to Schedule C of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and from tax on the dividends on War Loan on the ground that during the same years he was not "ordinarily resident" in the United Kingdom within the meaning of section 46 (1) of the Act. On appeal to the Special Commissioners under section 27 of the Finance Act, 1924, those Commissioners disallowed the appellant's claim to exemption and confirmed the assessment, subject to a case which they stated for the opinion of the High Court; and on the argument of the case the decision of the Special Commissioners was affirmed by Mr. Justice Rowlatt and afterwards by the Court of Appeal. Mr. Levene has now appealed to this House.

From the case stated by the Special Commissioners it appears that the appellant is a British subject, and formerly lived in a house in Curzon-street, London, of which he held a lease, until the month of March, 1918, when he decided to break up his establishment and (to use his own expression) to "live abroad"; that he then sold his furniture and surrendered the lease of his house, and until December, 1919, continued to live in the United Kingdom, in hotels. In December, 1919, he went abroad and did not return until July 10, 1920, since when he has been in the United Kingdom for the following periods:—

	Weeks.
1920—July 10 to November 24 ..	19
1921—July 2 to November 27 ..	21
1922—April 9 to June 18 .. and Sept. 10 to November 19	20
1923—April 12 to June 27 .. and Sept. 10 to November 15	20
1924—April 10 to July 1 .. and Sept. 10 to November 23	22

During the remainder of these five years he was staying at Monaco and at various places in France.

From March, 1918, until January, 1925, the appellant had no fixed place of abode, but stayed in hotels, whether in this country or abroad. In the course of the years 1922, 1923, and 1924, he made endeavours to find a suitable flat in Monaco, but the negotiations came to nothing since none of the premises inspected were suitable, until in January, 1925, the appellant took a lease of a flat in Park Palace, Monte Carlo, for nine years, for which he paid a premium of 130,000f. and he lived there with his wife until he came to England for the purposes of the appeal to the Special Commissioners. Both he and his wife have indifferent health, and have been advised to live in the South of France and avoid the United Kingdom in the winter months. One of the reasons for their visits to England was to obtain medical advice. They also came to visit their relatives in England, and (on one occasion) to make arrangements for the care of a brother of the appellant who is mentally afflicted. Other reasons for the appellant's coming to England annually were to take part in certain Jewish religious observances, to visit the graves of his parents, who are buried at Southampton, and to deal with his income-tax affairs.

After setting out the above facts and the contentions of the parties, the Special Commissioners gave their decision in the following terms:—

"The appellant is a British subject and until March, 1918, he was a householder in London. He then surrendered the lease of his house and sold his furniture, and from March, 1918, until January, 1925, he did not occupy any fixed place of residence, but lived in hotels whether in this country or abroad.

"He was admittedly resident and ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom until December, 1919. He then went abroad, and in each subsequent year he has spent between 7 and 8 months abroad and between 4 and 5 months in the United Kingdom.

"We are satisfied upon the evidence that when he left the United Kingdom in December, 1919, he had formed the intention, which he has consistently carried out ever since, of living abroad for the greater part of the year, but of returning to this country each year and remaining here for considerable periods though not for a period equal in the whole to 6 months in any year.

"The questions for decision are whether he was entitled to exemption from income-tax on War Loan interest under section 46 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, as a person not ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom, and on interest on securities of British Possessions under rule 2 (d) of the General Rules applicable to Schedule C as a person not resident in the United Kingdom.

"These are in our opinion questions of degree, and taking into consideration all the facts put before us in regard to the appellant's past and present habits of life, the regularity and length of his visits here, his ties with this country, and his freedom from attachments abroad, we have come to the conclusion that at least until January, 1925, when the appellant took a lease of a flat in Monte Carlo, he continued to be resident in the United Kingdom. The claims for the years in question therefore fail."

It is obvious that the conclusions of the Special Commissioners above quoted are so worded as not to be mere inferences in law from the facts found in the earlier part of the case, but to be themselves substantive findings of fact; and accordingly under the well established rule those findings cannot be disturbed by the Courts unless there was no evidence to support them. But before dealing with that question I think it desirable to say something about a matter which was much discussed during the argument namely, the meaning of the word "reside" and the expression "ordinarily reside" as used in the Income Tax Act, 1918.

My Lords, the word "reside" is a familiar English word and is defined in the Oxford English Dictionary as meaning "to dwell permanently or for a considerable time, to have one's settled or usual abode, to live in or at a particular place." No doubt this definition must for present purposes be taken subject to any modification which may result from the terms of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and the Schedules; but, subject to that observation, it may be accepted as an accurate indication of the meaning of the word "reside." In most cases there is no difficulty in determining where a man had his settled or usual abode, and if that is ascertained he is not the less resident there because from time to time he leaves it for the purpose of business or pleasure. Thus, a master mariner who had his home at Glasgow, where his wife and family lived, and to which he returned during the intervals between his sea voyages, was held to reside there, although he actually spent the greater part of the year at sea (In re Young, 1 Tax Cas., 57; Rogers v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, 1 Tax Cas., 225). Similarly a person who has his home abroad and visits the United Kingdom from time to time for temporary purposes without setting up an establishment in this country is not considered to be resident here—although, if he is the owner of foreign possessions or securities falling within Case 4 or 5 of Schedule D, then if he has actually been in the United Kingdom for a period equal in the whole to six months in any year of assessment he may be charged with tax under rule 2 of the Miscellaneous Rules applicable to Schedule D. But a man may reside in more than one place. Just as a man may have two homes—one in London and the other in the country—so he may have a home abroad and a home in the United Kingdom, and in that case he is held to reside in both places and to be chargeable with tax in this country. Thus, in Cooper v. Cadwalader (5 Tax Cas., 101) an American resident in New York who had taken a house in Scotland which was at any time available for his occupation, was held to be resident there, although in fact he had only occupied the house for two months during the year; and to the same effect is the case of Loewenstein v. de Salis (10 Tax Cas., 424). The above cases are comparatively simple, but more difficult questions arise when the person sought to be charged has no home or establishment in any country and lives his life in hotels or at the houses of his friends. If such a man spends the whole of the year in hotels in the United Kingdom, then he is held to reside in this country; for it is not necessary for that purpose that he should continue to live in one place in this country but only that he should reside in the United Kingdom. But probably the most difficult case is that of a wanderer who, having no home in any country, spends a part only of his time in hotels in the United Kingdom and the remaining and greater part of his time in hotels abroad. In such cases the question is one of fact and of degree, and must be determined on all the circumstances of the case (Reid v. Inland Revenue Commissioners [1926] S.C., 589; 10 Tax Cas., 673). If for instance such a man is a foreigner who has never resided in this country, there may be great difficulty in holding that he is resident here. But if he is a British subject the Commissioners are entitled to take into account all the facts of the case, including facts such as those which are referred to in the final paragraph above quoted from the case stated in this instance. Further, the case may be different, and in such a case regard must be had to rule 3 of the General Rules applicable to all the Schedules of the Income Tax Act, 1918, which provides that every British subject whose ordinary residence has been in the United Kingdom shall be assessed and charged to tax notwithstanding that at the time when the assessment or charge is made he may have left the United Kingdom, if he has so left the United Kingdom for the purpose only of occasional residence abroad.

Turning to the facts of this case, I think it clear that the appellant falls within the category last described. He is a British subject and formerly resided in England. Early in the year 1918 he formed the project of living abroad and thereupon broke up his establishment in this country; but in fact he continued to reside here in hotels until the end of the year 1919. He then went abroad from time to time, but continued to live in hotels either here or in France and he did not actually find a home abroad until the month of January, 1925, when he took a lease of a flat at Monte Carlo. The result is that during the period from the end of 1919 until January, 1925, he went much abroad, partly for the sake of his own and his wife's health, partly no doubt to search for a house or flat, and partly (as may be inferred from the finding of the Special Commissioners) in the hope of escaping liability to the English income-tax; but none of these purposes was more than a temporary purpose, and he regularly returned to England for the greater part of the summer months though for less than one-half of each year. On these facts I think that it was plainly open to the Special Commissioners to find that during the years in question he was resident in the United Kingdom, and I think it probable that Rule 3 above quoted applied to him.

It remains to be considered whether during the period in question the appellant "ordinarily resided" in the United Kingdom for the purposes of section 46 of the Act, and I think that there was material upon which the Special Commissioners could answer this question in the affirmative. The suggestion that in order to determine whether a man ordinarily resides in this country you must count the days which he spends here and those which he spends elsewhere, and that it is only if in any year the former are more numerous than the latter that he can be held to be ordinarily resident here, appears to me to be without substance. The expression "ordinary residence" is found in the Income Tax Act of 1842 and occurs again and again in the later Income Tax Acts, where it is constrasted with usual or occasional or temporary residence; and I think that it connotes residence in a place with some degree of continuity and apart from accidental or temporary absences. So understood the expression differs little in meaning from the word "residence" as used in the Acts; and I find it difficult to imagine a case in which a man while not resident here is yet ordinarily resident here. Upon this point also, as upon the other, I think that the finding of the Special Commissioners cannot be disturbed.

For these reasons I am of opinion that this appeal fails and I move your Lordships that it be dismissed with costs.

Viscount Sumner.—My Lords: Early in 1918 Mr. Levene, a British subject, formed the intention to "live abroad." He sold his house in Mayfair, sold such furniture as was not in settlement, and then lived in hotels in England for the best part of two years. I will assume that, but for passport difficulties and the condition of his wife's health, he would have gone abroad sooner. He left England in December, 1919.

Accordingly on April 6, 1920, at the beginning of the five years of charge now in question, he was, in the words of Rule 3 of the General Rules, "a British subject, whose ordinary residence has been in the United Kingdom" and so he remained chargeable to tax notwithstanding, if he had left the United Kingdom for the purpose only of occasional residence abroad. Was that the only purpose of his leaving so far as residence is concerned?

The Special Commissioners found that it was, and I think it is clear that they had evidence before them, on which they could so find. His only declaration was that he meant to live abroad, not saying whether it was to be an occasional or a constant, a part time or a whole time sojourn. He was advised by his doctor to seek a better climate, which is consistent with returning to England when English weather mends. He had gone out of business in England and had broken up his establishment, but he still had in England business interests connected with his income tax assessments, and ties of filial piety and religious observance, for his father was buried at Southampton and he was himself a member of the English community of Jews. What he actually did was to come back to England after an absence of about seven months, and he remained for nearly five. In the meantime he had not set up an establishment abroad, but had lived in hotels. This, however, was only what he had done in England from March, 1918, to December, 1919. I think there was ample evidence before the Special Commissioners to show that a man, who left England to live abroad as he had been living here, and when warm weather came returned to his native country and to his permanent associations, had in 1919 "left the United Kingdom for the purpose of occasional residence only." If so, he remained chargeable.

So much for the year of charge 1920-1921. In the following years he was a bird of passage of almost mechanical regularity. No material change occurred in his way of life, for his enquiries for a permanent flat came to nothing until so late as not to affect his life and residence for the period in question.

It is suggested that the Special Commissioners misdirected themselves in point of law, because they took into account, with regard to the earlier years, conduct which occurred only subsequently. I agree that the taxpayer's chargeability in each year of charge constitutes a separate issue, even though several years are included in one appeal, but I do not think any error of law is committed if the facts applicable to the whole of the time are found in one continuous story. Light may be thrown on the purpose, with which the first departure from the United Kingdom took place, by looking at his proceedings in a series of subsequent years. They go to show method and system and so remove doubt, which might be entertained if the years were examined in isolation from one another. The evidence as a whole disclosed that Mr. Levene continued to go to and fro during the years in question, leaving at the beginning of winter and coming back in summer, his home thus remaining as before. He changed his sky but not his home. On this I see no error in law in saying of each year, that his purpose in leaving the United Kingdom was occasional residence abroad only. The occasion was the approach of an English winter and when with the promise of summer here that occasion passed away, back came Mr. Levene to attend to the calls of interest, of friendship and of piety. My Lords, for these reasons I think it unnecessary to express, in regard to Mr. Levene's case, any opinion on the question of the tests of residence which are material for income tax purposes or on the meaning of "temporary" in this connexion, in cases where a person, not within Rule 3, comes from abroad to the United Kingdom and remains for a longer or shorter time, but not permanently. Of the other conclusions of the Special Commissioners I say nothing except that, in my opinion, they in no way impair the soundness of their conclusion on Rule 3.

I wish, however, to point out the position in which Mr. Levene and others like him now find themselves. It is trite law that his Majesty's subjects are free, if they can, to make their own arrangements, so that their cases may fall outside the scope of the taxing Acts. They incur no legal penalties and, strictly speaking, no moral censure if, having considered the lines drawn by the Legislature for the imposition of taxes, they make it their business to walk outside them. It seems to follow from this and from other general considerations that the subject ought to be told in statutory and plain terms when he is chargeable and when he is not. The words "resident in the United Kingdom," "ordinarily," or otherwise, and the words "leaving the United Kingdom for the purpose only of occasional residence abroad," simple as they look, guide the subject remarkably little as to the limits within which he must pay and beyond which he is free. This is the more likely to be a subject of grievance and to provoke a sense of injustice when, as is now the case, the facility of communications, the fluid and restless character of social habits, and the pressure of taxation have made these intricate and doubtful questions of residence important and urgent in a manner undreamt of by Mr. Pitt, Mr. Addington, or even Sir Robert Peel. The Legislature has, however, left the language of the Acts substantially as it was in their days, nor can I confidently say that the decided cases have always illuminated matters. In substance persons are chargeable or exempt, as the case may be, according as they are deemed by this body of Commissioners or that to be resident or the reverse, whatever "resident" may mean in the particular circumstances of each case. The tribunal thus provided is neither bound by the findings of other similar tribunals in other cases, nor is it open to review, so long as it commits no palpable error of law, and the Legislature practically transfers to it the function of imposing taxes on individuals, since it empowers them in terms so general that no one can be certainly advised in advance whether he must pay or can escape payment. The way of taxpayers is hard and the Legislature does not go out of its way to make it any easier. If it had been possible in this case to apply the principle that a taxing statute must impose a charge in clear terms or fail, since it is to be construed contra proferentem, our duty would have been plain, but since the words are plain and it is only their application that is haphazard and beyond all forecast, Mr. Levene has no remedy in your Lordships' House.

So far as it is permissible to express an opinion on the facts, I think that for the purpose of taxing his Colonial and Indian securities Mr. Levene was at all material times resident in the United Kingdom and, for the purpose of taxing his holding in War Loan, it could not be said of him that he was not ordinarily resident here. Accordingly in my judgment his appeal fails.

LORD WARRINGTON OF CLYFFE.—My Lords: The appellant in this case claims relief from income-tan for the financial years ending respectively o April 5, 1921, April 5, 1922, April 5, 1923, April 5, 1924, and April 5, 1925.

His claim falls under two heads:—(1) In respect of income payable in the United Kingdom on securities of British Possessions and (2) in respect of income of British War Loan.

The claim under the first head is based upon Rule 2 (d) of the rules applicable to Schedule C.

"No tax shall be chargeable in respect of . . . ahe interest or dividends on any securities of . . . British Possession which are payable in the United Kingdom, where it is proved to the satisfaction of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue that the person owning the securities and entitled to the interest or dividends is not resident in the United Kingdom. . . ."

The claim under the second head is based upon section 46 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1918:—

"Where the Treasury have before the commencement of this Act issued or may thereafter issue any securities which they have power to issue for the purpose of raising any money or any loan, with a condition that the interest thereon shall not be liable to tax or supertax, so long as it is shown, in manner directed by the Treasury, that the securities are in the beneficial ownership of persons who are not ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom, the interest of securities issued with such a condition shall be exempt accordingly."

War Loan Stock was issued under the condition mentioned in the section.

In order, therefore, to support his claims it was incumbent on the appellant to prove that in the one case he was not resident, and that in the other he was not ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom.

His claims having been rejected by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue he appealed to the Special Commissioners for Income Tax.

They expressed their decision in the following terms:—

"These (viz., the questions they had to decide) are in our opinion questions of degree, and taking into consideration all the facts put before us in regard to the appellant's past and present habits of life, the regularity and length of his visits here, his ties with this country, and his freedom from attachments abroad, we have come to the conclusion that at least until January, 1925, when the appellant took a lease of a flat in Monte Carlo, he continued to be resident in the United Kingdom."

It will be observed that they do not in express terms state that he continued to be ordinarily resident here, but, from the terms in which they state the questions they had to decide, it is clear that the decision was intended to cover both cases.

At the request of the appellant the Special Commissioners stated a case for the opinion of the High Court. The case came before Mr. Justice Rowlatt on July 23, 1926, who affirmed the decision of the Special Commissioners and dismissed the appeal.

An appeal to the Court of Appeal was dismissed by an order dated March 16, 1927.

It is not quite clear whether the Special Commissioners intended their decision to be a finding of fact or a conclusion of law. If it were the former there is at least ground for saying that it was not open to appeal, but as the case was argued in both Courts below and in this House upon its merits, I think I ought to state shortly my reasons for thinking that the decision was correct.

The appellant is a British subject. Down to March, 1918, he had a permanent home in London. In that month he sold his furniture and in April he surrendered the lease of his house. He continued, however, to live in England in various hotels until December, 1919. So far there is no question that he was both resident and ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom.

He is married, but has no children. His family ties are in this country, his wife having five sisters and he himself six brothers and sisters residing here.

Apparently under medical advice to the effect that he and his wife should live in the South of France and avoid the United Kingdom in the winter months, he and his wife in December, 1919, went abroad. They returned to this country on July 10, 1920. From that day until November 24, 1920, they remained in England. They then again went abroad until July 2, 1921, when they returned here and stayed until November 27. Thev then went abroad. On April 9, 1922, they returned to England, where they stayed until June 18. They were abroad until September 10. From that day until November 19 they stayed here. They then went abroad and remained there until April 12, 1923. On that day they returned and stayed in this country until June 27. They then went abroad, returning on September 10, and staying here until November 15. They were abroad from that day till April 10, 1924, when they returned here and stayed until July 1. From that day until September 10 they were abroad. They then returned and stayed until November 23, when they again went abroad. In no year of assessment did their stay here extend to six calendar months. While abroad, as well as while in England, they had no settled home but lived at hotels at Monaco and at various places in France. In England also they lived in hotels. The appellant states that he intended throughout to live abroad, but his intention does not appear to have been of a very pressing character, for though he made in the course of the years 1922 to 1924 endeavours to find a suitable flat he did not succeed until January, 1925. Since he gave up his house in 1918 he has had no intention of again taking a house or flat in the United Kingdom. He stated to the Special Commissioners various reasons for his visits to England—to obtain medical advice, to visit relatives, to take part in certain Jewish religious observances, to visit the graves of his parents, to deal with his income-tax affairs.

These being the facts, the question is whether the Special Commissioners, the King's Bench Division, and the Court of Appeal were wrong in the conclusion at which they respectively arrived.

I do not attempt to give any definition of the word "resident." In my opinion it has no technical or special meaning for the purposes of the Income Tax Act, 1918. "Ordinarily resident" also seems to me to have no such technical or special meaning. In particular it is, in my opinion, impossible to restrict its connotation to its duration. A member of this House may well be said to be ordinarily resident in London during the Parliamentary Session and in the country during the recess. If it has any definite meaning I should say it means according to the way in which a man's life is usually ordered.

In the present case, taking the several years of assessment in succession, in that ending April 5, 1921, there is no substantial difference between the nature of his residence abroad and that of his residence here, except that the former was for a longer period. He did, in fact, what many wealthy people do at the present time; he spent the winter and spring, and in this particular instance the early summer, abroad and the rest of the summer and the autumn here, again going abroad for the winter. In the year ending April 5, 1922, there was no substantial change, but in those ending April 5, 1923, and April 5, 1924, we find a change to this extent, that he now returns to this country in April, goes abroad for the usual summer holiday, and returns to this country till the winter season comes round again. I will assume that, for the purpose of determining whether in any year he is ordinarily resident, the usual ordering of his life must be judged by what he does in that and preceding years only; still in the first year the circumstances show that the stay in England was as much in the ordinary course as his previous residence, and in subsequent years he developed habits of periodical changes of abode, each one of which may be said to be in accordance with the usual ordering of his life.

I have not thought it necessary to rest my opinion upon the third of the general rules applicable to all schedules, but it is difficult to see any answer to the case of the respondent under it. The appellant is a British subject, his ordinary residence was unquestionably in the United Kingdom until December, 1919, and I fail to see that his subsequent departure from the United Kingdom in any of the years in question was otherwise than for the purpose of occasional residence abroad.

Rule 2 of the miscellaneous rules applicable to Schedule D has no direct application to this case, which is under Schedule C, and I do not see that it throws any light on the two questions which here arise for decision.

In conclusion, I desire, as far as I am concerned, to leave open the question whether the appellant's position has been altered by the acquisition in January, 1925, of a flat in Monte Carlo as his settled residence there.

On the whole I am of opinion that the appeal fails and ought to be dismissed with costs.

LORD ATKINSON and LORD BUCKMASTER concurred.

[Solicitors—Mr. M. A. Jacobs; the Solicitor of Inland Revenue.]

LYSAGHT'S CASE.

In this case the respondent claimed similar relief in respect of the tax years 1922-23 and 1923-24 as being a person not resident and not ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom in those years.

The respondent was born in England of Irish parents and was engaged from the age of 21 years in his uncle's business in England, which was subsequently turned into a limited company called John Lysaght, Limited, having its principal works at Bristol and Newport. By the year 1919 the respondent was a director and managing director, but on his partial retirement in that year he retained only a post of advisory director at a retaining fee of £1,500 a year and director's fees. On his partial retirement he sold the property called Backwell Down, near Bristol, where he had been living during his active participation in the affairs of John Lysaght, Limited, and went with his family to live permanently on a family property, "Hazelwood," Mallow, Ireland. After undertaking a visit to Australia on behalf of the company in 1919, he took a furnished house at Burnham, in Somerset, until 1920, but in 1920 he went to live permanently at "Hazelwood," and had never since had any place of abode in England.

The respondent went to the monthly meetings of the directors of John Lysaght, Limited, and on his visits for that purpose attended consultations and committee meetings, and had visited the branch business at Scunthorpe, Lincolnshire, on several occasions. The total number of days spent in England, which included two periods of delay in this country enforced by illness, was as follows:—

In the year ending April 5, 1923	..	101 days.
" " " 1924	..	94 "
" " " 1925	..	84 "
In the period from April 6, 1925, until September 25, 1925		48 "

The visits to England were solely for business purposes, and the respondent's wife never accompanied him. Save that he owned a field of about three acres near Burnham, which he was anxious to sell, and was a member of, but a very infrequent visitor at, the Savile Club, London, he had no real connexion other than a business one with England. His business activities in Ireland were confined to the management of his estate at Mallow, and his banking account was at the Mallow branch of the Bank of Ireland, a small account being also opened at a branch of the Westminster Bank at Bristol, but the registered address for his various securities was "Hazelwood," Mallow. Lengthy trips abroad had been undertaken during the past five years by the respondent on behalf of the company.

Upon those facts the Special Commissioners held that the respondent was both "resident" and "ordinarily resident" in the United Kingdom for each of the two years in question.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt affirmed the decision of the Special Commissioners, but his decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal by a majority (the Master of the Rolls (Lord Hanworth) and Lord Justice Sargant, Lord Justice Lawrence dissenting).

The Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.), the Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.), and Mr. R. P. Hills appeared for the appellants; Mr. Latter, K.C., and Mr. Stephen Benson for the respondent.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (read by LORD WARRINGTON OF CLYFFE).—My Lords: The facts in this case as found by the Special Commissioners may be very shortly stated. The respondent, Mr. S. R. Lysaght, who was born in England of Irish parents, was formerly the managing director of a company called John Lysaght, Limited, which has works at Bristol and Newport, and while he was so engaged owned a property near Bristol and resided there with his family. In the year 1919 he partially retired from the business but was appointed an advisory director. Thereupon he sold his property near Bristol and went to live on a family property at Mallow in Ireland, which he had purchased in the year 1916, and from that time he has had no definite place of abode in this country, but he comes to England from time to time in circumstances detailed in the following paragraph from the case stated by the Special Commissioners:—

"(4) The appellant [i.e., the present respondent] comes to England for a meeting of the directors of John Lysaght, Limited, every month and remains for consultations with the other directors and for committee meetings. The company have a branch business at Scunthorpe, Lincs, and the appellant has visited this business on several occasions during his visits to England. On the occasion of these visits he spends about a week in England. On two occasions his return to Ireland was delayed by illness. The total number of days spent in England in the respective years has been as follows:—

	Days
In the year ending April 5, 1923..	101
In the year ending April 5, 1924..	94
In the year ending April 5, 1925..	84
In the period from April 6 till September 25, 1925	48

When in England the appellant generally stays at the Spa Hotel, Bath, at which the meetings of the directors of the company are held. Occasionally he has stayed at his brother's house at Chepstow. These visits to England are solely for business purposes, and the appellant's wife never accompanies him on these visits. He owns a field of about three acres near Burnham, purchased many years ago, which he is anxious to sell. He has a few relatives and many friends in England. He has also relatives and friends abroad.

"(5) He has no business activities in Ireland except the management of his estate at Mallow, of which 800 acres are in hand.

"(6) His banking account is at the Mallow branch of the Bank of Ireland, but he has also a small account at a branch in Bristol of the Westminster Bank. The registered address of his various securities is 'Hazelwood,' Mallow. He is a member of the Savile Club, London, but hardly ever goes there. During the past five years he has made three lengthy trips to Australia and South America on behalf of the company."

The respondent, having been assessed by the General Commissioners to income-tax in respect of the tax-years 1922-23 and 1923-24 in respect of income from foreign and colonial Government securities and War Loan, claimed exemption from tax under rule 2 (d) of the General Rules applicable to Schedule C of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and section 46 (1) of the same Act on the ground that during the years in question he was neither resident nor ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom; but the claim was disallowed by the Inland Revenue Commissioners, and on appeal to the Special Commissioners they confirmed the decision of the Inland Revenue Commissioners subject to a case stated for the opinion of the High Court. After stating the facts and the contentions of the parties, the case proceeds as follows:—

"We held that the appellant was both ordinarily resident and resident in the United Kingdom for each of the two years ending April 5, 1923, and April 5, 1924, respectively."

On the case being argued, Mr. Justice Rowlatt refused to disturb the Special Commissioners' decision, but the Court of Appeal (by a majority) took a different view. The Crown now appeals to this House.

My Lords, this case differs in an essential respect from the case of Levene v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, which your Lordships have just decided. In that case the appellant, Mr. Levene, was during the period in question a homeless man living at different hotels in the United Kingdom and abroad. In the present case the respondent, Mr. Lysaght, has a permanent home in Southern Ireland, where he lives with his family; but he comes to England once a month for business purposes, stays at an hotel and, when his business (which usually occupies about a week) is concluded, he returns home. It is unnecessary for me to repeat the observations which I have made in the previous case as to the meaning of the expressions "reside" and "ordinarily reside"; and it is enough to say that, on the view which in that case I have taken as to the meaning of those expressions, there appears to me to be no reason whatever for holding that the respondent is resident or ordinarily resident in this country. It is true that he comes here at regular intervals and for recurrent business purposes; but these facts, while they explain the frequency of his visits, do not make them more than temporary visits or give them the character of residence in this country. That he has a small account at a bank in Bristol—doubtless for use during his visits to this country—and a club in London to which he hardly ever goes, appear to me to be trivial circumstances which cannot affect the decision. If the respondent is held to reside here and to be taxable accordingly, there would appear to be no reason why those many foreigners who periodically visit this country for business purposes, and having concluded their business go away, should not be made subject to a like burden.

But it was argued—and this was the point mainly insisted upon on behalf of the Crown—that the conclusion of the Special Commissioners that the respondent was both resident and ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom was a finding of pure fact, and accordingly could not be disturbed by the Court of Appeal. No doubt the rule is well established that a finding of the Special Commissioners on a question of pure fact cannot be reviewed by the Courts except on the ground that there was no evidence on which the Special Commissioners could as reasonable men have come to their conclusion, and this although the Court of review would, on the evidence, have come to a different conclusion. But it does not appear to me that the conclusion of the Special Commissioners in the present case was a finding of pure fact. It is true, as Mr. Justice Rowlatt said in Pickles v. Foulsham (39 The Times L.R., 478; [1923] 2 K.B., 413), that where a man resides is a question of fact to be determined on proper legal principles ; and it is true also, as he said in the same case, that when you get a case on the border line—i.e., where there is evidence both ways which is nearly balanced—it becomes very essentially a question of fact. A good instance of this is the case of Levene to which I have referred. But, as Lord Parker said in Farmer v. Cotton's Trustees (31 The Times L.R., 478 ; [1915] A.C., 922, at p. 932), it is not always easy to distinguish between questions of fact and questions of law for the purposes of the Taxing Acts ; and I venture to express my concurrence with the protest made by Lord Atkinson in Great Western Railway v. Bater (38 The Times L.R., 448 ; [1922] 2 A.C., 1, at p. 12) against the attempt which is often made to secure for a finding on a mixed question of law and fact the unassailability which belongs only to a finding on a question of pure fact. In the present case the Special Commissioners appear to me to have so framed their case as to prevent (if possible) any confusion of that kind. They have carefully and fully stated all the material facts found by them to exist and then, after setting out the rival contentions of the parties (some of them being contentions of law), they have "held" that the appellant was both ordinarily resident and resident in the United Kingdom in the years in question. This seems to me to mean that on the facts already found by them and on their view of the law they were prepared to draw the inference of residence. In short, it is a mixed finding of fact and law ; and unless such a finding is open to review by the Courts little benefit will accrue to the subject from the right which is given to him to have a case stated for the opinion of the King's Bench Division. In my opinion this argument fails.

I feel compelled to add that, if the Special Commisioners' decision is to be taken as a finding on the facts only, then it appears to me that there was on their own showing no evidence upon which that finding could properly be based.

For these reasons I would dismiss this appeal.

LORD SUMNER.—My Lords : What has to be decided in this case is really the meaning of the word "resident" in the Income Tax Act, 1918, and the mode in which that meaning is to be settled in particular cases. The respondent, who lives in the Irish Free State, claimed exemption from tax, as to some of his securities because he was "not ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom" within section 46 (1), and as to others because he was not "resident in the United Kingdom" within the General Rules applicable to Schedule C, No. 2 (d). The Commissioners for Special Purposes decided against him in both cases. Section 46 (1) provides that the non-residence there mentioned is to be shown "in manner directed by the Treasury," while Rule No. 2 (d) of the General Rules exempts a taxpayer for non-residence "where it is proved to the satisfaction of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue" but no distinction has been drawn nor has any point been taken on this ground.

There is, however, a preliminary question on the form of the Special Commissioners' decision. Their case stated is framed thus :—

"2. The following facts were admitted or proved in evidence. . . . . .

3. It was contended by the appellant. . . . .

4. It was contended on behalf of the Crown. . . . . .

5. We held that the appellant was both ordinarily resident and resident in the United Kingdom. . . . ."

Paragraph 2 set out under six heads the circumstances of various kinds relevant to the issue of Mr. Lysaght's way of life and particularly of his visits to England. It was contended that this paragraph and this alone stated the facts found by the Special Commissioners and that paragraph 5 found no fact but only stated their opinion of the consequences in law, which followed from their previous finding. In that case, if residence, ordinary or other, is a question of fact the case must have gone back to be completely stated ; if it is purely a question of law, the whole case would be open for your Lordships' decision as to the consequences legally arising from the facts found.

It is certainly much to be wished that the Special Commissioners should be scrupulously careful to say that they "find" a conclusion of fact, arrived at from other facts found, or, if they only mean to apply the law as they understand it to be and not to draw any conclusion of fact, should say, that they hold so and so in accordance with what they conceive to be the law, for a debate on the meaning of a case stated is an unsatisfactory prelude to a debate on the general law applicable. I have, however, no doubt as to the Special Commissioners' meaning here. Their experience makes them fully conversant with the wide scope of their functions and with its limits and it is most unlikely that they intended to leave unfound the ultimate fact of residence, which was the substance of the whole case before them. It is as though a jury, fully directed by the trial Judge, had found a special verdict stating the points which the evidence had proved to their satisfaction, and had concluded "We hold this to have been careless and unreasonable conduct on the defendant's part and we find for the plaintiff."

It is well settled that, when the Special Commissioners have thus ascertained the facts of the case and then have found the conclusion of fact which the facts prove, their decision is not open to review, provided (a) that they had before them evidence, from which such a conclusion could properly be drawn, and (b) that they did not misdirect themselves in law in any of the forms of legal error which amount to misdirection.

My Lords, the word "ordinarily" may be taken first. The Act on the one hand does not say "usually," or "most of the time," or "exclusively," or "principally" ; nor does it say, on the other, "occasionally," or "exceptionally," or "now and then," though in various sections it applies to the word "resident," with a full sense of choice, adverbs like "temporarily" and "actually." I think the converse to "ordinarily" is "extraordinarily" and that part of the regular order of a man's life, adopted voluntarily and for settled purposes, is not "extraordinary." Having regard to the times and duration, the objects and the obligations, of Mr. Lysaght's visits to England there was, in my opinion, evidence to support, and no rule of law to prevent, a finding, that he was ordinarily resident, if he were resident in the United Kingdom at all. No authority was cited which requires special consideration on this head.

Grammatically the word "resident" indicates a quality of the person charged and is not descriptive of his property, real or personal. To ask where he has his residence is often a convenient form of inquiry but only as leading to the question "then where is he resident himself ?" I think this distinction, though often pointed out, has too often been overlooked in the arguments in the reported cases. No doubt, on the authority of the merchant seamen's cases, Mallow was Mr. Lysaght's home and he resided there. There were his family seat and his demesne lands, his wife and family, his farming and his sport, and though some people may be able to make themselves at home from home anywhere, I do not suppose that the Spa Hotel, Bath, however excellent, was much of a home to Mr. Lysaght. This, however, is not conclusive. Who in New York would have said of Mr. Cadwalader "his home's in the Highlands; his home is not here"? After all, many nomads are homeless folk, though they may reside continually here and there within the limits of the United Kingdom. Property, obviously, is no conclusive test. Whether Mr. Lysaght resides in his own or in a hired house in Ireland cannot have much to do with it, nor is a person precluded from being resident, because he puts up at hotels, and not always the same hotel, and never for long together. It was said in Cadwalader's case (5 Tax. Cas., 101) that an establishment was set up in the United Kingdom. None was set up here and in fact Mr. Lysaght had closed his English establishment some years before, but although setting up an establishment in this country, available for residence at any time throughout the year of charge, even though used but little, may be good ground for finding its master to be "resident" here, it does not follow that keeping up an establishment abroad and none here is incompatible with being "resident here," if there is other sufficient evidence of it. One thinks of a man's settled and usual place of abode as his residence, that the truth is that in many cases in ordinary speech one residence at a time is the underlying assumption and, though a man may be the occupier of two houses, he is thought of as only resident in the one he lives in at the time in question. For income-tax purposes such meanings are misleading. Residence here may be multiple and manifold. A man is taxed where he resides. I might almost say he resides wherever he can be taxed.

There is again the circumstance that Mr. Lysaght only comes over for short visits. Does this make any conclusive difference? If he came for the first three months in the year for the purpose of his duties and then returned home till the next year, would there not be evidence that he was resident here, and, if so, how does the discontinuity of the days prevent him from being resident in England, when he is here in fact, though the obligation to come, as required, is continuous and the sequence of the visits excludes the elements of chance and of occasion. If the question had been one of "occasional residence" abroad in the language of General Rule 3 these facts would have satisfied the expression, for residence is still residence, though it is only occasional, and I see no such fundamental antithesis between "residence" and "temporary visits" as would prevent Mr. Lysaght's visits, periodic and short as they are, from constituting a residence in the United Kingdom, which is "ordinary" under the circumstances.

My Lords, I think it is the shortness of the aggregate time during which Mr. Lysaght is here that constitutes the principal, though by no means the only point in his favour, but the question of a longer or a shorter time, like other questions of degree, is one peculiarly for the Special Commissioners. I do not say that time might not be so short, or again so long, as to make it right to hold, no matter what other evidence there was, that, as the case might be, there was either no evidence of residence or that the evidence was all one way in favour of it, but these questions are not before us.

It is attractive to say, as in substance was the opinion of the Court of Appeal, that "resident" in this case is a matter of law, as being a matter of interpretation, but that does not cover the ground. Interpretation only says what the Act itself refrains from telling us, namely, the meaning of the word "resident," but, as that meaning is its meaning in the speech of plain men, the question still remains, whether plain men would find that the result of the facts found was "residence" in its plain sense, and I do not doubt that the Special Commissioners understood the word not otherwise than in its correct legal signification and so applied it. Accordingly I do not think that their decision can be interfered with.

It remains to notice an argument founded on the Finance Act, 1924, section 27. This section provides that, in the case of questions as to "ordinary residence" under section 46 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1918, or as to "residence" in Rule 2 (d) of the General Rules, applicable to Schedule C, a person aggrieved by the decision of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue can apply to have his claim for relief determined by the Special Commissioners, who are to proceed as on an appeal against an assessment under Schedule D, subject to all the provisions of the Income Tax Acts relating to such an appeal. This was what Mr. Lysaght did, and the section is supposed to show that "residence" and "ordinary" residence are questions of law. I do not think that it does. It only shows that they are questions which the Special Commissioners are competent to review, leaving the distinction between questions of law and questions of fact untouched. True, the Special Commissioners can state a special case for the opinion of the High Court on a question of law, but the section does not say that "residence" and "ordinary" residence in themselves are such questions of law and it is only on such questions as may arise, if any, that the case can be stated. The Special Commissioners are not required to find out or to formulate such questions. If, as here, they say "The appellant immediately upon the determination of the appeal declared to us his dissatisfaction therewith, as being erroneous in point of law, and in due course required us to state a case . . . which case is here stated," they have done their duty, and it is open to your Lordships to say that, not having misdirected themselves in point of law and not having proceeded without evidence on which they could properly find as they have found, their determination is not erroneous in point of law. This satisfies the section. It does not say, expressly or by implication, that "resident," whether "ordinary" or other, raises a question of law in itself.

LORD ATKINSON concurred in the following judgment of Lord Buckmaster.

LORD BUCKMASTER (read by LORD ATKINSON).—My Lords: The real question that arises in this case is whether the finding of the Special Commissioners that the respondent was resident and ordinarily resident in England is a finding of fact which cannot be disturbed, or whether it is open to examine the circumstances set out by the Special Commissioners for the purpose of seeing whether the conclusion they drew is one that this House will accept. The distinction between questions of fact and questions of law is difficult to define, but according to the respondent whether a man is resident or ordinarily resident here must always be a question of law dependent upon the legal construction to be placed upon the provisions of an Act of Parliament. I find myself unable to accept this view. It may be true that the word "reside" or "residence" in other Acts may have special meanings, but in the Income Tax Acts it is, I think, used in its common sense and it is essentially a question of fact whether a man does or does not comply with its meaning.

It is, of course, true that if the circumstances found by the Special Commissioners in the special case are incapable of constituting residence their conclusion cannot be protected by saying that it is a conclusion of fact, if there are no materials upon which that conclusion could depend. But if the incidents relating to visits to this country are of such a nature that they might constitute residence and their prolonged or repeated repetition would certainly produce that result then the matter must be a matter of degree, and the determination whether the degree extends so far as to make a man resident or ordinarily resident here is for the Special Commissioners and it is not for the Courts to say whether they would have reached the same conclusion. This case is an excellent illustration of this particular point. The respondent's home is in Ireland and he has no definite place of abode in England, as found by the Special Commissioners.

[His Lordship read section 4 of the case, already cited by the Lord Chancellor.]

It could not, I think, be denied that, even although the respondent had his home in Ireland, his sojourn in this country might be so prolonged as to place his residence here beyond dispute, but none the less I understand the judgment of the Court of Appeal to mean this, that they regard the purpose of his visits sufficient to show that he could not be regarded as resident. They state that it was not of his own free choice but in obedience to the necessities of his position in relation to the company of John Lysaght, Limited, that he was over here, from which it would appear that the element of choice is regarded by the Court of Appeal as a factor of great, if not of final, consequence in determining residence. In my opinion this reasoning is not sound. A man might well be compelled to reside here completely against his will ; the exigencies of business often forbid the choice of residence, and though a man may make his home elsewhere and stay in this country only because business compels him, yet none the less, if the periods for which and the conditions under which he stays are such that they may be regarded as constituting residence, it is open to the Special Commissioners to find that in fact he does so reside and if residence be once established "ordinarily resident" means, in my opinion, no more than that the residence is not casual and uncertain, but that the person held to reside does so in the ordinary course of his life.

Lord Warrington of Clyffe.—My Lords : This case raises under different circumstances the same questions as those raised in Levene's case just decided by your Lordships' House, viz., whether the respondent (as he is in this case) was in either of the years of assessment, viz., 1922-23 and 1923-24, resident and ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom.

The respondent was entitled to certain securities of British Possessions the interest on which was payable in the United Kingdom and to British War Loan Stock issued with the condition mentioned in section 46 of the Income Tax Act, 1918.

Having been assessed to income-tax on both classes of security, he appealed to the Special Commissioners, who decided that he was resident, in the case of one class, and was ordinarily resident, in the case of the other.

A case was thereupon stated by the Special Commissioners for the opinion of the High Court. The case was heard before Mr. Justice Rowlatt, who affirmed the decision of the Special Commissioners. The respondent appealed to the Court of Appeal, which, by a majority (Lord Hanworth, M.R., and Lord Justice Sargant, Lord Justice Lawrence dissenting), allowed the appeal and set aside the judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt and the decision of the Special Commissioners, being of opinion that the respondent was not at the material times either resident or ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom.

The argument of the Attorney-General in this House was rested exclusively on the contention that the questions to be determined are both questions of degree and therefore of fact and that there was on each question evidence on which the Special Commissioners might reasonably come to the conclusion at which they arrived, and consequently their decision was not subject to review.

I have reluctantly come to the conclusion that it is now settled by authority that the question of residence or ordinary residence is one of degree, that there is no technical or special meaning attached to either expression for the purposes of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and accordingly a decision of the Special Commissioners on the question is a finding of fact and cannot be reviewed unless it is made out to be based on some error in law, including the absence of evidence on which such a decision could properly be founded.

In Bayard Brown v. Burt (27 The Times L.R., 363 ; 5 Tax Cas., 667, at p. 670) Mr. Justice Hamilton after mentioning the finding of the Commissioners that the appellant was resident in the United Kingdom said :—"That only raises a question of law, if it can be contended that it is impossible to draw that conclusion of fact as to his residence in the United Kingdom from the facts set out in the case." This view was affirmed in the Court of Appeal (27 The Times L.R., 572).

The same view was expressed by Mr. Justice Rowlatt in Pickles v. Foulsham (39 The Times L.R., 478 ; [1923] 2 K.B., 413). The point was not raised in the Court of Appeal.

In Reid v. Inland Revenue Commissioners ([1926] S.C., 589 ; 10 Tax Cas., 673) (a Scotch case), the Lord President (Lord Clyde) at page 678 said :—"It is obvious that the more general and wide the scope of expressions used in a statute, the more difficult it may become to convict those whose duty it is to interpret it of an error or misdirection in applying it to a given state of facts. It may be possible in such cases to predicate of a particular state of facts that they lie outside the scope of the expressions used, although it may be really an impossible task to define that scope positively and with exact accuracy. The expression 'resident in the United Kingdom' and the qualification of that expression implied in the word 'ordinarily' so resident are just about as wide and general and difficult to define with positive precision as any that could have been used. The result is to make the question of law become (as it were) so attenuated, and the field occupied by the questions of fact become so enlarged, as to make it difficult to say that a decision arrived at by the Commissioners with respect to a particular state of facts held proved by them, is wrong."

In the same case Lord Sands said :—"When a statute uses ordinary non-technical language describing a certain person or thing in general or ambulatory terms, and it becomes merely a matter of impression or opinion whether, in relation to the special circumstances, a person or thing falls within the expression, the tendency of the law is to treat a finding upon the matter as a finding of fact." He concurred in refusing to disturb the determination of the Special Commissioners though he was not sure that he would have been prepared to differ had they decided the other way.

See also the opinion of Lord Halsbury in Smith v. Lion Brewery Company (27 The Times L.R., 261 ; [1911] A.C., 150, at p. 155) and that of Lord Buckmaster in Malcolm v. Lockhart (35 The Times L.R., 231 ; [1919] A.C., 463, at p. 466) and my own remarks in the Court of Appeal in Cooper v. Stubbs (41 The Times L.R., 614 ; [1925] 2 K.B., 753, at p. 772).

In the present case, after stating that certain facts set forth in detail were either admitted or proved, the Special Commissioners "held" that the present respondent was both ordinarily resident and resident in the United Kingdom for each of the two years in question.

The most material fact in the present case in favour of a finding contrary to that of the Special Commissioners was that the respondent had a permanent family home in Southern Ireland. His visits to this country were for business purposes as advisory director of John Lysaght, Limited, of which he had previously been director and managing director ; they were frequent and regular and the number of days spent in this country in the two years in question was 101 and 94 respectively.

I cannot say that there was no evidence on which the Special Commissioners could properly arrive at their conclusion, though I am not sure that I should have taken the same view.

I think the appeal ought to be allowed with costs here and below and the judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt restored.

Prob., Divorce, and Adm. Div. (Lord Merrivale, P.) } 1928. Feb. 27.

RAEBURN v. RAEBURN.*

Divorce — Judicial separation — Jurisdiction —Residence—Service—Respondent outside jurisdiction at commencement of suit—Matrimonial home—Statute of Citations, 1531 (23 Henry VIII., c. 9), s. 2—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 49), s. 32.

Personal presence of the respondent in England at the date of the filing of a petition for judicial separation is not essential for the founding of such a suit, although the proceedings are governed by the principles and rules of the Ecclesiastical Courts. The real question is whether at the time when the petition, endorsed with the citation, is issued for service the respondent is resident within the jurisdiction.

Graham v. Graham (39 The Times L.R., 139 ; [1923] P., 31) and Armytage v. Armytage (14 The Times L.R., 480 ; [1898] P., 178) distinguished.

This was an issue directed to be tried in connexion with a petition for judicial separation filed on October 3, 1927, by Lady Raeburn, formerly Mrs. Olga Lucia Hatton, widow, of Overdale, St. John's, Woking, Surrey, against Sir William Hannay Raeburn, Bt., a shipowner. The issue was whether there was residence of the parties, or either of them, within the jurisdiction of the Court at the material times so as to found the petition. Lady Raeburn was the plaintiff in the issue, and Sir W. Raeburn the defendant.

Mr. Bayford, K.C., and the Hon. Victor Russell appeared for the plaintiff ; Mr. Cotes-Preedy, K.C., Mr. Bush James, and Miss B. H. Davy for the defendant.

Mr. Bayford said that Sir W. Raeburn was a widower when he was married at St. Margaret's, Westminster, on June 5, 1917, to the plaintiff. The husband was a Scotsman, the wife English. After the marriage they lived at Wood End, Helensburgh, Dumbartonshire, which house was still retained by the defendant. In the year 1918 he became member of Parliament for Dumbartonshire, and in October, 1918, leased a flat at North Gate, Regent's Park, for his daughter by his former marriage, but had the right to stay at the flat when he pleased. In May, 1919, he bought the house Overdale at Woking, and in 1923 retired from Parliament. He and his wife continued to live at Wood End and at Overdale. Differences arose between them, and finally the wife filed a petition for judicial separation on October 3, 1927. It was alleged that the Court had no jurisdiction because the husband happened to be in Scotland at that time, and also on the ground that he was not resident in England. The petition was served on the respondent in England on November 19, 1927. Counsel read a number of letters from Sir W. Raeburn referring to his intentions as to residence.

Lady Raeburn, in cross-examination, said that her husband had an office in London, with a private secretary there. In November, 1927, her husband began proceedings in Scotland by a writ of non-adherence.

Sir William Raeburn gave evidence.

Mr. Cotes-Preedy, in submitting that there was no jurisdiction in England to entertain the petition, said that it was necessary that both parties should be resident here when the proceedings were begun, and the defendant was not so resident within the jurisdiction. He cited Graham v. Graham (39 The Times L.R., 139 ; [1923] P., 31) in which it was held that it had been established in Armytage v. Armytage (14 The Times L.R., 480 ; [1898] P., 178) and in Anghinelli v. Anghinelli (34 The Times L.R., 438 ; [1918] P., 247) that according to the practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts a suit for judicial separation, which was now substituted for a divorce a mensa et thoro, could not be entertained against a respondent who at the time of the citation or of the institution of the suit was resident out of the jurisdiction.

The President.—But Mr. Justice Horridge said in Graham v. Graham (supra) : "It must be shown that the respondent is resident in the jurisdiction at the time of the citation being issued and the proceedings commenced." When is the suit "commenced ? "

Mr. Cotes-Preedy.—Surely when the petition is filed.

Counsel said that the defendant was not resident within the jurisdiction at all, as the Regent's Park flat was taken for his daughter, and the Woking house merely as a residence while he sat in Parliament.

Mr. Bayford said that the correspondence showed that Sir W. Raeburn bought the Woking house with the intention of making it a home in England for himself and his wife during their joint lives, and for her after his death. He had a residence in Scotland also, but there was no limitation to the number of permanent residences that one might legally have, and the Woking house was a permanent residence at which he had the right to live. He went there from time to time. He spent money on it and enlarged it and left it to his wife by a will which he subsequently changed. It was a matrimonial residence in England, which gave the Court jurisdiction in this suit. In Armytage v. Armytage (supra) there had never been any matrimonial residence in this country.

The PRESIDENT.—It was a different class of case setting up the proposition that if it is necessary for the Court to assume jurisdiction, both the spouses being here, to protect one of the spouses, it assumes jurisdiction.

Mr. BAYFORD said that in Anghinelli v. Anghinelli (supra) the outstanding fact was that though the husband's domicile was Italian he lived with his wife in London when not travelling abroad on his business. He referred to Le Mesurier v. Le Mesurier (11 The Times L.R., 481 ; [1895] A.C., 517), Ward v. Ward (39 The Times L.R., 440), Donegal v. Donegal (3 Phillimore, 586), and Eustace v. Eustace (39 The Times L.R., 687 ; [1924] P., 45), in which it was held that there was jurisdiction to decree judicial separation at the suit of the wife where the husband was domiciled in England, although at the date of the institution of the suit he was not resident in this country. In his submission a suit "commenced" when the respondent was served. Until then the respondent knew nothing about the suit. As regards the Statute of Citations, citation could be served upon a person not resident within the jurisdiction, but if he were served within the jurisdiction the Court could entertain a suit in personam. Residence of the petitioner alone was sufficient to found jurisdiction, and the petitioner was undoubtedly resident here, and the respondent was admittedly served within the jurisdiction.

This is an issue directed to determine whether there was residence of the parties or either of them within the jurisdiction of the Court at the material times or time so as to found a petition for judicial separation. Actor sequitur forum rei, and the material question is whether on October 3, 1927, when the petition was filed, or November 19, when personal service was made on the respondent in England, he was resident in England so as to give jurisdiction here.

The parties are of Scottish domicile. The petitioner was of English birth, and the marriage of the parties took place in London in 1917. At all material times the respondent had and maintained a freehold house called Wood End at Helensburgh, Dumbartonshire, and a freehold house called Overdale at Woking in Surrey. He was also lessee of a flat at North-gate, Regent's Park. Differences between the petitioner and the respondent, which were to some extent disclosed at the hearing of the issue, have given an abnormal character to their marital relations. After a long period of recurring, if not continual, disagreement, their conjugal affairs reached a crisis in the autumn of 1927. On October 3 the petitioner filed her petition for judicial separation, alleging grounds which would be sufficient, if established, to procure dissolution of marriage, if the parties were domiciled here ; and in particular, so far as regards the matters now in question, alleging facts within and without the jurisdiction on which a finding of cruelty is sought. Pending this suit, on November 29 the respondent commenced proceedings in the Court of Session in Scotland, alleging non-adherence of the now petitioner, and claiming restitution of conjugal rights in accordance with Scottish law.

What is to be ascertained is whether the respondent was in October or November resident within the jurisdiction, as the petitioner no doubt was, so as to entitle her to bring her suit in this Court. While residence is the question raised by the issue, it is necessary before dealing generally with that matter to consider a contention raised on the respondent's behalf, that residence in the sense required by the authorities which govern the matter cannot be held to exist unless it be shown that on October 3, when the petition was filed, the respondent was within the jurisdiction. This was submitted as a consequence of the provision in the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, section 22 (continued by the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, section 32) which directs that in suits of judicial separation the Court shall give relief on principles and rules as nearly as may be conformable to the principles and rules on which the Ecclesiastical Courts acted and gave relief. It was said that, inasmuch as by virtue of the Statute of Citations (23 Henry VIII., c. 9) no person might be cited in an Ecclesiastical Court out of the jurisdiction where he should be inhabiting at the time of award or going forth of the citation, personal presence in England of the respondent at the date of the filing of the petition for judicial separation is essential.

To warrant this proposition reference was made to some words of Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes, as he then was, in Armytage v. Armytage (14 The Times L.R., 480 ; [1898] P., 178), to the effect that this Court would interfere if the parties were within the jurisdiction at the commencement of the suit, and an expression in the judgment in Graham v. Graham (39 The Times L.R., 139 ; [1923] P., 31), "It must be shown that the respondent is resident in the jurisdiction at the time of the citation being issued and the proceedings commenced." As no such contention as is raised here was in question in either of those cases, the cases have no direct bearing. The argument founded on the words cited ignores the language of the Statute of Citations as well as the procedure of the Ecclesiastical Courts. What was required by the statute was habitancy within the jurisdiction, that is to say residence. If residence was vouched by affidavit the Court issued a citation which might be served within the diocese or without it, as appears in numerous cases cited in Sir Robert Phillimore's Edition of Burn's Ecclesiastical Law (9th edition, 1842) and in the judgment of Dr. Lushington in Collett v. Collett (3 Curt., 726). It is interesting to note that in Collett v. Collett (supra) Dr. Lushington refers at p. 731 to the issue of citation as "the time of the quasi-commencement of the suit," and to bear in mind that at that period alimony pendente lite ran not from the date of the citation but from the return to the citation.

What is clear on the words of the Statute of Citations and in the proceedings of the Ecclesiastical Courts is that residence was the condition precedent of jurisdiction, and the present effect of this is apparent when regard is had to the statutory power of this Court, by virtue of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, section 42, in aid of the jurisdiction dependent on residence, to serve process out of the jurisdiction.

The real question in the case, therefore, is whether at the time when the petition, endorsed with the citation, was issued out for service the respondent was resident within the jurisdiction. By her petition Lady Raeburn alleged, as the fact undoubtedly was, that she was living at Overdale, Woking. She alleged further that the respondent at that time was living at North-gate, Regent's Park. She stated by affidavit that "in the year 1919 the respondent purchased Overdale, Woking, and it has been the matrimonial home in England of the respondent and myself. We have generally lived at Overdale when not residing at the respondent's house in Scotland, Wood End." In her evidence at the hearing she described Overdale as "the home in which I have lived with the respondent, and where I am living now." The respondent's case was outlined in an affidavit containing these statements :—"I was born in Glasgow of Scottish parents and have always resided in Scotland and have had my business in Scotland. I have never owned or rented a house or flat in England with the exception of the flat at 68, North-gate, Regent's Park, until I bought Overdale, Woking, in 1919, as a place at which to stay when up in London for my Parliamentary duties. When I left Parliament in 1923 I at once placed Overdale in the agent's hands for sale and received an offer, which I was about to accept, when, in order to prevent a complete breach with my wife and to keep alive the possibility of reconciliation, I refused the offer so as to be able to allow her to remain in the house as she desired. I, however, never withdrew the house from the agent's hands, and left the boards offering for sale still standing. Since 1925 I have slept at Overdale only on three occasions, and never for more than two nights. In 1918 I had also taken in my name a flat at North-gate for my daughter to reside in."

The respondent also gave evidence viva voce at the hearing. In effect he described Overdale as a house he had bought so as to have a place to go to while he was in Parliament. The period thus defined ended at the General Election in 1923, and the house had been purchased a few months after the General Election of 1918, at which the respondent became a member of Parliament. Speaking of the relation of Overdale to Wood End between 1919 and 1924, the respondent said, "I did not regard Overdale as a home any more than I would a furnished house at North Berwick." As to the suggestion on the petitioner's part that the respondent carried on in London a branch of the shipping business of his firm, no definite proof was given, and on the whole I am satisfied that although the respondent sometimes used the office of a shipping firm in London for business purposes he did not in the ordinary sense of the term carry on business here.

Some reliance was put for the petitioner on the respondent's user of a right to the flat at North-gate. The lease of the flat had been originally acquired in view of its contemplated occupation by the parties when they might think fit to be there, but for some years it had become the usual residence of the respondent's daughter, where from time to time, as he found it convenient, the respondent lived during varying periods. I do not find the respondent to have been a habitual or usual resident at the flat, or to have kept it as a residence.

The conflict of evidence as to Overdale necessitates a careful scrutiny of the statements and acts of the parties. That it was the petitioner's home before and at the date of the petition, formerly an house additional to the house Wood End and latterly a home exclusive of Wood End, I have no doubt. The respondent, however, did not use it as the petitioner did ; but that it stood on the same footing with him as a furnished house that he might take at a watering place is not the fact. The correspondence between the parties throws some light on the matter. On October 5, 1918, before the purchase the respondent wrote of "a little place in England which I can make your home while I live and leave to you when I have gone." On February 28, 1920, while improvements and furnishing were going on at a cost stated to be between £5,000 and £6,000 the respondent wrote from Overdale to the petitioner at Wood End of the time "when we come and settle down." On October 24, 1922, in correspondence during a period of acute differences, while writing to the petitioner in these words, "Return to me to my home at Helensburgh," he added :—"Although I do not need to live in the south I shall, as far as I can manage to, give you quite a good portion of the year in Woking." Other letters between 1922 and 1924 show the respondent's resolve to keep the house as a matrimonial home in the hope of better relations with the petitioner. There were in 1925 dates of critical disagreement between the petitioner and the respondent, and an arrangement was proposed by the respondent and accepted by the petitioner. The respondent set out his view thus :—"My idea was that I would be willing you should continue to occupy Overdale and I would come to try to show you the possibility to throw the past behind our backs." Letters in January, 1926, deal with a project for removal from Overdale to some smaller house. On July 30, 1926, a suspension of disputes for a year had been arranged "in the hope," as the respondent wrote, "that we shall be happy and united." In March, 1927, differences became acute, and in April the respondent's solicitors informed the petitioner that he would be closing Overdale by midsummer, and would be glad if she would make arrangements to join him at Wood End at that date. But the respondent did not close the house or call on the petitioner to leave it.

Discussions proceeded on the alternative of complete reconciliation and definite separation ; and meanwhile the petitioner, as the respondent's wife, remained mistress of the house at Overdale, the respondent maintaining the establishment under her control. On October 24, 1927, he wrote this, when the question was raised as to the household there :—"I pay their (the servants') wages. I am still the owner of Overdale and head of the house." The last interview between the parties before the service of the petition took place at Overdale on November 18. The respondent was there as master of the house to discuss with his wife, its mistress, "whether," to quote his words, "there was any way out from their dissensions." That the relation of the spouses was for years unsettled and unhappy, and that in consequence the respondent was commonly absent from Overdale, seem to me mere incidents of their mutual discontents. During the whole time he had the right to be whenever he would in the home he maintained and when he thought fit, though but rarely he acted upon his rights. A seaman ordinarily absent from this country is resident in the home which he provides here for his wife. So is a man of business whose employment keeps him constantly abroad.

I am bound upon the facts to hold that the respondent was resident within the jurisdiction of this Court at all material times, and that the petitioner is entitled to succeed on the issue, with costs.

BONHAM v. MAYCOCK.*

Mortgage—Redemption—Receipt of payment—Authority of mortgagee's solicitor—Receipt of interest—Whether an implication of authority to receive principal.

An authority to receive the interest on a mortgage does not imply an authority to receive the principal.

This was an action tried at Worcester Assizes. The plaintiff, Mr. Ellis Edward Bonham, of Box Hedge, Banbury, Oxfordshire, claimed from the defendant, Mrs. Bessie Henrietta Maycock, formerly Miss Wrightson, of Horne Farm, Stoke Bruern, Northants, £300 and interest due under a covenant in a mortgage deed dated June 28, 1922, made between Mr. Henry Alfred Savage and the defendant of the one part, as mortgagors, and the plaintiff of the other part, as mortgagee.

The defendant admitted the deed, but alleged that on or about July 21, 1923, she paid to the plaintiff's solicitor and agent, Mr. Harry Cecil Kilby, thereunto lawfully authorized, the £300 with all interest due thereon.

Mr. Ralph Thomas appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. W. G. Earengey for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE ROCHE, in his considered judgment, said that both the plaintiff and the defendant were clients of Mr. Harry Cecil Kilby, a solicitor, who had been dishonest and had taken the money of one of the parties. The defendant had been housekeeper to two of her uncles named Savage, and at their request approached Mr. Kilby and asked him to raise a loan. Ultimately, a mortgage was arranged for £300 on a farm belonging to the Savages, but before it was executed one of the Savages died, leaving his interest in the farm to the defendant, and the mortgage was, therefore, on property belonging to her and the surviving brother. The usual covenant for repayment was contained in the deed. Mr. Kilby, who carried the transaction through for both parties, kept the deed and paid interest to the plaintiff down to 1925. In 1926 he died, and the following state of facts came to light. In 1923 Mr. Kilby received £300 from the defendant and the surviving Mr. Savage to be paid to the plaintiff and gave a receipt for it in the following words:—

"July 21, 1923.

"No. — Stoke Bruern

"Received of Miss Wrightson and Mr. H. Savage the sum of three hundred and nine pounds to mortgage and interest to be paid to Mr. E. E. Bonham, of Banbury.—H. Cecil Kilby."

The defendant now alleged payment to the plaintiff "by his solicitor or agent, Harry Kilby," on the ground that Mr. Kilby had express or implied authority to receive the principal. Mr. Kilby had not at any time paid the money to the plaintiff, nor had he given up any deed or deeds to the defendant. No evidence was given or could be given by the defendant of express authority, and he (his Lordship) found as a fact that there was no holding out. The holding out of Kilby as entitled to receive interest was no holding out of him as being entitled to receive the principal. As regarded the deeds, there was no evidence that the defendant knew either where they were, or that Mr. Kilby had them.

The real question was whether, apart from express authority or holding out, there was implied authority. He was quite satisfied that there was no such implication. There was a short answer—namely, that Mr. Kilby did not receive the money as agent for the plaintiff at all, but as agent for the payors, not for the payee. But although that was his decision he would give his reason for differing from Mr. Earengey's contention that authority to receive interest or principal could be conferred by implication if the scrivener or solicitor was allowed to retain the security, and if it was one which did not require a reconveyance. That argument depended on cases relating to scriveners, and whether those cases were applicable to solicitors.

Scriveners were an extinct race. Apparently the last of them was a contemporary of Dr. Johnson; for the following passage was to be found in Boswell's "Life of Johnson" (vol. 3, p. 20, cited in Adams v. Malkin, 3 Camp., 534):—

"Johnson.—It is wonderful, Sir, what is to be found in London. The most literary conversation that I ever enjoyed was at the table of Jack Ellis, a money scrivener behind the Royal Exchange, with whom I at one period used to dine generally once a week.

"Note by Boswell.—This Mr. Ellis was, I believe, the last of that profession called scriveners, which is one of the London companies, but of which the business is no longer carried on separately, but is transacted by attornies and others. He was a man of literature and talents."

Reference was made to Henn v. Conisby (1 Ch. Cas., 93); to the Eq. Cas. Abr., 145; to Duchess of Cleveland v. Executors of Geo. Dashwood (Freeman, Ch. Rep., 249); Martyn v. Kingsly (Prec. Ch., 209). His LORDSHIP also read a passage of some length from the judgment of Chief Justice Gibbs in Adams v. Malkin (supra), decided in 1814, in which it was stated:—

"The banker would not be an attorney, though he were occasionally to fill up bonds for his customers; nor does the attorney become a money scrivener, though on particular occasions he incidentally has the money of his clients to lay out for them. In order to make a man a money scrivener, he must carry on the business of being trusted with other people's monies to lay out for them as occasion offers. . . . Nor, if on one or two occasions money were deposited with him to lay out, would that constitute him a money scrivener."

Apart from express decisions as to solicitors, his LORDSHIP continued, he would hold on the facts which he learned from those cases that a solicitor was not a scrivener. But there was direct authority in two cases cited by Mr. Thomas for the plaintiff. The first was Wilkinson v. Candlish (5 Ex., 91), in which Baron Parke said:—

"An authority to receive the interest of a mortgage by no means imports an authority to receive the principal"; and again, "There is nothing but an authority for the payment of interest to him, and that is no authority for him to receive the principal."

The other case, Kent v. Thomas (1 H. and N., 473), was even more decisively in the plaintiff's favour, for in that case a solicitor received a part of the principal and did not pay the mortgagee, and Baron Watson said:—

"He was the agent of the plaintiff to receive the interest; but as to the principal, Baron Parke in

* Reported by J. W. HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Wilkinson v. Candlish (supra) pointed out that an authority to receive the interest on a mortgage by no means imports an authority to receive the principal."

For those reasons the plaintiff was entitled to judgment for £300, with costs.

LOWE v. BENTLEY.*

Limitations (Statute of) — Counterclaim—Calculation of period—Date to be taken—Whether issue of writ or delivery of counterclaim—Limitation Act, 1623 (21 Jac. I., c. 16), s. 3.

Section 3 of the Limitation Act, 1623, bars a counterclaim on a cause of action which arose more than six years before the delivery of the counterclaim, though less than six years before the issue of the writ in the action.

In this action the plaintiff, Mr. Alfred Lowe, of Edgbaston, Gammon-lane, Watford, issued the writ on December 23, 1926, claiming from Mr. Walter Bentley, of 122, Shaftesbury-avenue, W.C., (1) £515 alleged to be due on an account stated contained in letters between the parties in 1921 and 1922—that claim was not persisted in ; (2) £60, the amount of a cheque drawn by the plaintiff on December 24, 1920 (five years and 364 days before the writ), and paid to the defendant in settlement of bets on horse races.

The statement of claim in the action was delivered on July 4, 1927. On October 19, 1927, the defendant delivered a defence, set-off, and counterclaim, in which he said that if, contrary to his contention, the plaintiff was entitled to recover the sum of £60 from him he paid to the plaintiff by cheques dated December 28, 1920, and January 17, 1921, £65 and £67 10s. respectively in settlement of bets on horse races. He set-off the plaintiff's claim of £60 and counterclaimed £72 10s. The plaintiff, in reply, pleaded the Statute of Limitations (21 Jac. I., c. 16).

Mr. Claude Grundy appeared for the plaintiff ; Mr. J. P. Valetta for the defendant.

Mr. GRUNDY admitted the set-off, since it was held in Walker v. Clements (15 Q.B., 1,046) that, a set-off being matter of defence, the period allowed by the Statute of Limitations must be estimated to the date of the plaintiff's writ.

Mr. VALETTA contended that a counterclaim was in the same position as a set-off and relied on Walker v. Clements (supra). Lightwood on the Statute of Limitations was apparently of the same opinion.

Mr. GRUNDY referred to Halsbury's Laws of England (Vol. 19, p. 184). The author of the article took the opposite view to Lightwood. McGowan v. Middleton (11 Q.B.D., 464) and Beddall v. Maitland (17 Ch. D., 174) were referred to, but were admittedly not directly in point. Counsel submitted that, a counterclaim being in its nature a cross-action, the material date was the date on which the counterclaim was delivered, and not the date of the writ.

* Reported by J. W. HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

MR. JUSTICE MACKINNON, in giving judgment, said that the proceedings arose out of gaming transactions. On December 23, 1926, the plaintiff issued his writ claiming £60 on a cheque dated December 24, 1920, under a now repealed statute of William IV. The defendant replied by a set-off and counterclaim, alleging that on December 28, 1920, and January 17, 1921, he paid £65 and £67 10s. respectively, which he claimed to be entitled to recover under the same statute. The counterclaim was delivered on October 19, 1927, more than six years after the defendant's right accrued under the Act of William IV.

It was admitted by Mr. Grundy that the set-off was good, notwithstanding that the debt accrued more than six years before the delivery of the counterclaim, because there was clear authority in Walker v. Clements (15 Q.B., 1,046) that the Statute of Limitations was not a bar to a set-off unless the six years had expired before the plaintiff's action was brought. There remained the defendant's counterclaim for the amount by which the £132 10s. he had paid exceeded the plaintiff's claim.

He had heard an interesting argument on the question whether the Statute of Limitations operated in the same way as to a counterclaim and as to a set-off. Was the period of six years to be taken to the date of the issue of the writ or to the date of the delivery of the counterclaim ? Lightwood on the Statute of Limitations expressed the opinion that in counterclaim as in set-off the period was reckoned to the date of the writ, and referred in support of that contention to the judgment of Lord Campbell, C.J., in Walker v. Clements (supra) and to Ord v. Ruspini (2 Esp., 569), which had not been cited before him (his Lordship) in the present case ; and he doubted whether a decision in 1797 could assist him much.

But a writer in Halsbury's Laws of England equally confidently asserted that a counterclaim was different and that the time ran to the date of delivery. Mr. Valetta relied on the words of Lord Campbell, C.J., in Walker v. Clements (supra) :—

"The set-off is substituted for a cross-action. When are we to suppose that cross-action brought ? Clearly at the time of the commencement of the plaintiff's action, since a set-off not then existing cannot be insisted upon."

And Mr. Justice Coleridge said :—

"I am of the same opinion. A set-off must be available as a cross-action would be."

At that date there was no practice or right to set up a counterclaim, which was first created by section 24 (3) of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873. Lord Campbell, therefore, was not referring to the modern practice of counterclaim. He meant that a set-off was the setting up of a cross-demand by way of defence to the plaintiff's claim, and it must, therefore, be established at the date of the writ.

He did not think that the reasoning applied to a counterclaim, and the judgment of Mr. Justice Fry in Beddall v. Maitland (17 Ch. D., 174) showed that a modern counterclaim was entirely different from the old set-off. The question in Beddall v. Maitland (supra) was whether relief could be given in respect of a counterclaim which arose since the date of the writ. Sir George Jessel, M.R., in Original Hartlepool Collieries Company v. Gibb (5 Ch. D., 713) held that the counterclaim could not extend to any right of action subsequent to the date of the original writ. From that decision Mr. Justice Fry differed, and he (his Lordship) thought that the reasoning of Mr. Justice Fry, which was approved in McGowan v. Middleton (11 Q.B.D., 464), was right in showing that a counterclaim was essentially different from a set-off. A counterclaim, therefore, was only good if the cause of action arose less than six years before the delivery of the counterclaim. In this case, therefore, the counterclaim was barred, and there must be judgment for the defendant on the claim with costs and for the plaintiff on the counterclaim with costs.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. LUNCHEON AND SPORTS CLUB, LIMITED.*

Revenue — Betting duty — Totalisator — Pari-mutuel—Management by proprietor of club—Transactions by members—Whether bets—Whether proprietor a bookmaker—Finance Act, 1926 (16 and 17 Geo. V., c. 22), ss. 15, 18.

The defendant company owned a club and managed on the premises a totalisator and a pari-mutuel by means of which members could back horses running in races. The amount staked by backers of losers formed the fund for paying the backers of winners, the defendant company deducting 10 per cent. for expenses.

Held, that the transactions constituted bets within s. 15 of the Finance Act, 1926, and the defendant company was a bookmaker within s. 18 and was liable to pay betting duty thereon.

This was an information in which the Attorney-General alleged that the Luncheon and Sports Club, Limited, the proprietors of the Stadium Club, of 85, High Holborn, W.C., were liable to pay betting duty in respect of wagers on horse-races made by the members of the club by means of the totalisator and pari-mutuel managed by the company on the premises of the club.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Mr. Bowstead appeared for the Attorney-General; Mr. Roland Oliver, K.C., Mr. G. D. Roberts, and Mr. D. A. S. Cairns for the defendant company.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL, in opening the case, said that the Stadium Club was formed for the promotion of special intercourse among its members. The defendant company had entire control of all matters of finance in connexion with the club. The members of the club were elected in the ordinary way, but their election was subject to confirmation by the defendant company. The club consisted mainly of a large hall, at one end of which were the totalisator and the pari-mutuel, and a gallery which was used as a restaurant. On the ground floor was a boxing ring. The totalisator was a mechanical apparatus, which was used on "big race" days. The pari-mutuel was worked on exactly the same principle but it was operated by hand.

Members wishing to back horses by means of those instruments were required to join, at a fee of 10s. 6d., the club pool, which had certain rules, one of which stated that the club acted merely as distributing agent. By another rule the club was empowered to deduct 10 per cent. of the gross amount of the stakes in respect of the facilities provided to members and the superintendence and general running expenses of the pool.

A member of the club pool obtained a credit voucher for 10s., which he marked with the name and number of the horse which he wished to back for a win or a "place." He handed the voucher to a clerk, who sat before the pari-mutuel, and that clerk handed it to the clerk who operated the board. On the board were shown the numbers of the horses on the race-cards, the names of the jockeys, and the number of vouchers which had been handed in in respect of each particular horse. The same procedure was adopted with regard to place-betting. The board recorded the result of the race and showed how much each backer was entitled to win.

The fund from which the winnings came was formed by the wagers made by the members who had backed the losing horses. The backers of the winners received the purely honest starting price. The odds continually altered during the wager as each voucher was handed in. Settlement was made by or with backers every Saturday.

In those circumstances the questions arose whether a bet had been made, whether the defendant company was a "bookmaker," and whether a "bet" had been "made with a bookmaker" within section 15 of the Finance Act, 1926, which rendered payable a duty "on every bet made with a bookmaker." The Crown alleged that those questions must be answered in the affirmative. By subsection (3) of section 15 betting duty was payable by "the bookmaker with whom the bet is made." In section 18 "bookmaker" was defined as "any person who, whether on his own account or as a servant or agent to any other person, carries on, whether occasionally or regularly, the business of receiving or negotiating bets. . . ." "Bet" was defined as "a bet on an event of any kind."

The substance of the transaction had to be regarded and not what it was called in the rules. The method of calculating the odds—whether they were made by a bookmaker leaning over the rails on a racecourse or whether they were regulated mechanically by the number and sagacity of the backers of the losing horses—could not possibly affect the substance of the matter. A member of the pool made a wager or venture of a sum of money on the result of a race. The person to whom he looked for payment of his winnings was the defendant company, and the only person to whom he was liable to pay if he lost was also the defendant company. Those circumstances made the transaction a bet which was dependent on the result of a race. The defendant company was in the same position as a successful bookmaker. When it had paid out the sums due to winners and received the sums due from losers it found itself in possession of a very handsome profit. The defendant company took the risk of any bad debts. He referred to Tollett v. Thomas (L.R., 6 Q.B., 514) and Dark v. Island Bay Park Racing Company (4 N.Z.L.R., 301).

Mr. OLIVER submitted that persons who invested in a totalisator pool did not in law make a bet. If that were not so, in the circumstances of the present case no bet was made with a bookmaker within section 15 of the Act of 1926. If the test were that money was won or lost on the result of a race it would be betting to engage in a sweepstake. Distinction had been drawn between gaming and betting contracts, and the present contracts were gaming contracts. The only thing which differentiated what had occurred in the present case from a sweepstake was that the member who ventured his money could choose his horse, whereas in a sweep-stake his horse was allotted to him by chance.

Counsel referred to the definitions of gaming and wagering contracts given by Lord Justice Cotton in Thacker v. Hardy (4 Q.B.D., 685, at p. 695), and by Mr. Justice Hawkins in Carlill v. Carbolic Smoke Ball Company (8 The Times L.R., 680 ; [1892] 2 Q.B., 484, at p. 490), and said that the defendant company could not win as the result of any transaction in the pool. The 10 per cent. deduction made by them was in no sense winnings but was merely a commission charged for the expense and trouble of conducting the pool. Nor was it certain that the backers of a winning horse would win. If the winner was a "red-hot" favourite, which had attracted practically all the bets in the pool, the deduction of the 10 per cent. might result in the backers of that winner receiving sums which were less than their stakes.

No one who used accurate language could describe the transactions which had been referred to as "bets." They were no more "bets" than to play bridge for a stake was to make a bet. He referred to Reg. v. Hobbs (14 The Times L.R., 573 ; [1898] 2 Q.B., 647).

If the transactions through the pool were held to be bets the defendant company was admittedly a bookmaker. The Act gave a very wide definition of a bookmaker, but that did not make taxable every bet negotiated with a bookmaker. The only thing at which the Act had struck was a bet made with a person in the ordinary sense of the English language. It did not tax a bet negotiated by a person. If what had occurred was a bet it was not made with a bookmaker but with the other members who had backed horses. The defendant company was only the stakeholder. The fact that the defendant company paid to the winners the money of the losers before it was actually received by them did not affect the question but was merely a matter of accountancy.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL replied.

MR. JUSTICE ROWLATT, in his considered judgment, said that the issue raised by the information was whether, when the totalisator or the pari-mutuel was used at the Stadium Club, bets were made so as to attract the betting duty imposed by section 15 of the Finance Act, 1926. Two questions arose. One was whether the transaction which took place constituted a bet. The second was whether, if it did, that bet was made with a bookmaker within the meaning of that phrase as defined in section 18 of the Act of 1926.

The real point to be determined was between what parties the transaction took place. If a number of persons paid money into a pool, each naming a competitor in some contest in respect of which he paid in his money, and those persons later divided the pool among those who had named the winner in proportion to the amounts which they had respectively paid in, they would gamble on precisely the same principle as the members of the Stadium Club did by the use of the totalisator and the pari-mutuel. Possibly there would be no bet, and at any rate there would be no bet made with a bookmaker. On the other hand, a person might accept sums from backers not at odds then declared but at such odds as in the event would show a book exactly balanced subject to a percentage for himself. In that case there would be a series of bets, and of bets made with a bookmaker, because, although in the aggregate the balancing of the book eliminated all chance of the person who kept the book winning or losing anything, nevertheless, in respect of each particular transaction he and the backer were parties to a simple bet.

The contention made on behalf of the defendant company was that the present case was of the former description, the club being a mere distributing agent. In his opinion, however, the club was a principal in each transaction, and was only a mere distributing agent in the sense that the various transactions balanced. There was no getting away from the fact that the winners looked to the club and the club looked to the losers. The winners did not look to the losers directly. The circumstance that the fraction of the pool remaining in the hands of the club after the payments had been more than enough to recoup defaults did not affect the matter. The Crown was entitled to the relief they claimed, with costs.

A stay of execution for ten days was granted on the usual terms.

Ship—Practice—Collision—Bail given to avoid arrest of ship—Additional bail demanded after judgment—Arrest of ship—Warrant of arrest set aside—Effect of giving bail.

The defendants in an action in rem for damage by collision gave bail in an amount specified by the plaintiffs in order to avoid the arrest of their ship. After judgment had been delivered in the action, pronouncing the defendants' ship alone to blame, the plaintiffs, who in the meantime had dry-docked their vessel and discovered further damage, demanded additional bail and arrested the defendants' ship. The defendants gave the additional bail under protest and moved to set aside the warrant of arrest.

Held, that the effect of giving bail was to extinguish the plaintiffs' maritime lien and to release the defendants' ship altogether in that action, and the warrant of arrest must, therefore, be set aside.

This was a motion brought by the defendants, the owners of the American motor-ship Point Breeze, to set aside a warrant of arrest in an action in rem for damage by collision.

The facts were shortly as follows : On November 6, 1927, a collision occurred between the plaintiffs' steamship Flamand, a French cross-Channel steamship, and the Point Breeze, which was owned by the United Petroleum Company, Inc., of America. The Flamand, after the collision, proceeded on her voyage, but having encountered fog she ran aground on a shoal when approaching Dunkirk. She remained aground for an hour and after getting off took tug assistance into port.

On December 6 the plaintiffs issued a writ against the Point Breeze and the defendants' solicitors accepted service and gave an undertaking to put in bail. On December 19 the defendants provided a bail bond in the sum of £3,500, the amount of security demanded. On December 21 judgment was pronounced by the Admiralty Court, holding the Point Breeze alone to blame and referring the damage to the Registrar for assessment. On December 28 the plaintiffs demanded additional bail in £3,000, and, without any application to the Court, arrested the Point Breeze at Southampton shortly before she was due to sail. On December 29 the defendants, under protest, gave an undertaking to provide the additional bail, and they now moved to set aside the warrant of arrest. By the collision the Flamand sustained bow damage, and the first demand for £3,500 bail was apparently based on the survey of that damage. After being dry-docked, however, damage caused by the stranding was revealed, and the plaintiffs apparently contended that that damage was due to the collision.

Mr. C. R. DUNLOP, K.C., who with Mr. R. F. HAYWARD appeared for the defendants in support of the motion, contended that when bail was given by a defendant in the amount specified by the plaintiff, for the purpose of releasing a ship from arrest or liability to arrest, the effect was to extinguish the plaintiff's maritime lien and to release the defendant ship altogether. She could not afterwards be arrested in the same action. If the defendant appeared to defend the action and judgment was given against him and his bail, as in the present case, the plaintiff's cause of action was merged in the judgment. It was a judgment in personam and could be enforced by writ of fi. fa. or other mode of execution in the High Court. Counsel proceeded to cite the cases of The Kalamazoo (15 Jurist, 885); The Wild Ranger (Br. and Lush., 84); The Zephyr (11 L.T. (N.S.), 351); The Hero (Br. and Lush, 447); The Flora (L.R., 1 A. and E., 45); The Johannes (L.R., 3 A. and E., 127); The Freedom (L.R., 3 A. and E., 495); The Dictator ([1892] P., 304); The Gemma (15 The Times L.R., 529; [1899] P., 285); and The Joannis Vatis (No. 2) (38 The Times L.R., 566); [1922] P., 213).

Mr. A. T. BUCKNILL, opposing the motion, submitted that the fact that the plaintiffs, owing to a mistake, had demanded bail for less than the amount of their damage and less than the value of the res, did not debar them, either on authority or in equity, from obtaining further bail up to the full value of the delinquent ship. A plaintiff undoubtedly had a right to maintain the arrest of a defendant ship until he had obtained bail for the full value of that ship.

MR. JUSTICE BATESON.—You say you can go on arresting every day for a week.

Mr. BUCKNILL.—Subject, of course, to these considerations, that I must not exceed the value of the ship, and if I act unreasonably the Court can penalize me. Leave of the Court might be necessary where the ship had already been under arrest and released, because the Court had had its hand on the ship and as a matter of courtesy leave of the Court must be obtained before re-arrest. There was no clear authority against the right to arrest after bail had been given for less than the full value of the ship. On the other hand there were clear cases where re-arrest had occurred without leave. The observations of Dr. Lushington in The Kalamazoo (supra) and The Wild Ranger (supra) must be read in the light of his later decision in The Hero (supra), which was entirely favourable to the present plaintiffs. The Dictator (supra) and The Gemma (supra) had superseded most of the older decisions. The plaintiffs at any rate had the right to re-arrest for costs (see The Freedom (supra) and The Lorena (Roscoe's Admiralty Practice, 4th Edition, p. 340)).

MR. JUSTICE BATESON.—I think this motion must succeed. The collision happened on November 6, 1927, between the Flamand, a French ship, and the Point Breeze, an American ship. On December 2 the vessel was surveyed in Dunkirk for damage, and all the damage that was found was damage to her stem. On December 6 a writ was issued against the Point Breeze. The defendants' solicitors accepted service and gave the usual undertaking to put in bail. On December 19 the bail bond was completed in the sum of £3,500 as demanded by the plaintiffs. On December 21 judgment was given that the Point Breeze was alone to blame, and on December 28—that is seven days after the judgment—the plaintiffs asked for additional bail of £3,000, and they arrested the Point Breeze at Southampton for that amount in this action. On December 29 the defendants' solicitors gave an undertaking to give the additional bail, but they gave it under protest. Now they move before me to set aside that arrest. The case seems to be covered by the clear expression of opinion of Dr. Lushington in The Kalamazoo (15 Jurist, 885, at p. 886): "but the effect of taking bail is to release the ship in that action altogether. It would be perfectly absurd to contend that you could arrest a ship, take bail to any amount, and afterwards arrest her again for the same cause of action. The bail represents the ship, and when a ship is once released upon bail she is altogether released from that action." He goes on to say that there is no way of making the defendants pay—that is putting it in quite general language—except through the bail or the res. That part of the judgment has since been overruled in The Gemma (15 The Times L.R., 529; [1899] P., 285), The Dictator ([1892] P., 304), and other cases, whereby it is made plain that anybody getting judgment in an action in rem is entitled to issue execution for any balance against the parties who have appeared to defend in such an action. But the earlier part of the judgment that I have read does not seem to me to have been qualified, except possibly by Dr. Lushington himself, and I shall deal with this later. In The Wild Ranger (Br. and Lush., 84, at p. 87) Dr. Lushington repeats: "Now bail given for a ship in any action is a substitute for the ship; and whenever bail is given, the ship is wholly released from the cause of action, and cannot be arrested again for that cause of action." It is true that the facts of The Wild Ranger (supra) were these—the owners of the ship and of the cargo each arrested the ship. The shipowners obtained bail for some £92 less than their claim turned out to be. The cargo owners had the ship sold, and their claim was satisfied out of the proceeds, leaving a balance in Court. The shipowners then sought to get the balance out of the proceeds in Court, and that was refused. That, of course, nowadays would not be so, but the statement of Dr. Lushington that I have read is a repetition of what he said in The Kalamazoo (supra), and as I have said, as far as I know, has not been directly overruled. The Wild Ranger (supra) was decided in 1863. It is quite true that in 1865 and 1866 he decided two cases, The Hero (Br. and Lush., 447) and The Flora (L.R., 1 A. and E., 45), which seem to throw some doubt on this general statement that I have referred to. In The Hero (supra) Dr. Lushington at page 448 says: "In The Kalamazoo (supra) and The Wild Ranger (supra) are expressions which, literally interpreted, would indicate that I have no power to grant a re-arrest for the same cause of action after the property has been released on bail: but those expressions must be read subject to the fact which formed the ground of the decision in each of those cases, that the cause of action had passed into res judicata. I am of opinion that where application to increase the amount of the action is made before judgment has been pronounced, the Court has power to direct measures to be taken to do full justice to the plaintiff," but he limits any power to re-arrest or arrest after bail to applications made before judgment has been pronounced. Therefore it does not help Mr. Bucknill here because judgment pronouncing for liability had been given before he attempted to arrest. It is also to be noted that application was made to the Court apparently for leave to arrest the ship. The other case was The Flora (supra), and I confess that The Flora (supra) is a difficult case to follow from the report in L.R., 1 A. and E., 45. It seems from the headnote that the defendant there had consented to have the amount in the action increased, and the Court made an equitable order allowing the re-arrest to stand, but cancelled the bail bond already given. Nothing of that is said in the judgment or in the argument, and although Mr. Vernon Lushington—as he then was—relied on The Kalamazoo (supra) and The Wild Ranger (supra) as to there being no power to re-arrest without leave of the Court, Dr. Lushington said at p. 46 that "it was the practice to arrest the cargo whether freight was due or not, and held the re-arrest to be valid"—but on what ground exactly that was done, and how far the headnote, which speaks of the amount in the action being increased by consent, and so forth, affected it, does not appear, and I do not think, in face of the distinct expression in The Kalamazoo (supra) and The Wild Ranger (supra) that you cannot arrest a vessel after she has been once released on bail in the same action for the same cause of action, that ruling should be departed from. One other case which seems to support my view to some extent is The Johannes (L.R., 3 A. and E., 127). That was a case before Dr. Phillimore. The only significance of that is that the claim to re-arrest was abandoned by the eminent counsel who was conducting the case for the plaintiff. The other cases where re-arrest has been allowed are cases with regard to costs, which started with The Freedom (L.R., 3 A. and E., 495). I am not at all sure that The Freedom (supra) really decided that there was power to re-arrest for costs, except in the sense that it was the method of execution most convenient in the Admiralty Court, although it has always been treated, I think, as being a re-arrest for costs. That course has been followed in the case of The Lorena (unreported)—a case noted at page 340 of Roscoe's Admiralty Practice (4th Edition) and The Falk (4 Asp. M.C., 592).

Those, of course, are re-arrests for costs after judgment given, and after costs have been ascertained. If bail were given after such an arrest as contemplated in this case, or a re-arrest after judgment, there is no judgment against such bail, nor so far as I know, any means of obtaining one in the action.

In this case what the plaintiffs have been trying to do is to arrest the ship after they have got bail for their claim and have released the ship, and have got judgment, but before the amount of their claim is ascertained. They got judgment referring the matter to the Registrar, but he has not ascertained what amount is due, and it may well be that it will be some time before he does ascertain it. If the plaintiffs are right in their contention that they are entitled to arrest this ship it seems to me that it will open the door to the re-arrest of vessels or their arrest after getting bail whenever a party thinks that his claim might be bigger than it is. No immunity from arrest will be obtained by giving bail, and the effect on maritime liens might be very serious. If there is a right to arrest it is the right to arrest in a damage case, and the only right to arrest in a damage case is that which the party claiming has got by a maritime lien, and a maritime lien follows the ship into other people's hands. The position of people who have ships that have been released on bail (if I were to allow this arrest to stand) would be very unfortunate. So far as I know what is being attempted in this case has never been attempted before. I have dealt with The Hero (supra) and The Flora (supra), and I have also dealt with The Freedom (supra) class of case, which does not seem to me to be this case at all. I do not think, in these days at any rate, it is desirable to extend the power of arresting the property of a defendant. It may be very hard in the sense that Mr. Bucknill's clients may be defeated by the owners of the Point Breeze from prosecuting part of a just claim which they may be able to substantiate because the Point Breeze may never come back to this country. I should hope that that would not be the result, but I cannot help it if it is. I have not referred to The Zephyr (11 L.T. (N.S.), 351) or to The Joannis Vatis (No. 2) (38 The Times L.R., 566; [1922] P., 213) because I do not think they carry the case any further, but I think I have referred to all the others that have been mentioned.

Of course there is the point, I suppose, that if application for leave to arrest had been made—before this arrest was actually made—to try and bring the case within The Hero (supra) I think leave would have had to be refused upon the same grounds as those which I have indicated for allowing this motion with costs.

SYMINGTON AND CO. v. UNION INSURANCE SOCIETY OF CANTON, LIMITED.*

Insurance (Loss)—Clause in policy but not in slip—Warehouse to warehouse clause—Loss "reasonably attributed to fire."

The respondents, who were cork growers and had a factory and a warehouse near Algeciras, sent from the factory to Algeciras quantities of cork for shipment and allowed it to accumulate on the jetty till there should be enough for a cargo. While an accumulation on the jetty was awaiting shipment the respondents effected with the appellants an insurance by a slip. Before the policy was issued a fire broke out on the jetty, and to prevent its spreading to the cork the authorities jettisoned part of the cork and threw sea-water on the rest, with the result that a large portion was lost or damaged. The policy, when issued, contained a warehouse to warehouse clause and provided for payment of any loss "which may reasonably be attributed to fire," and a clause in the margin provided that shore risk against fire was not covered where the assured had fire insurance. The marginal clause was not in the slip. The respondents, who had another insurance against fire, claimed under the insurance, and in an arbitration an award was given in their favour.

Held, (1) that as the slip contained the real contract the marginal clause must be treated as non-existent, (2) that as the goods at the time of the loss were in the ordinary course of transit they were covered by the warehouse to warehouse clause, and (3) that the loss might reasonably be attributed to fire, and therefore the award must be affirmed.

This award of an arbitrator, stated in the form of a special case, raised a question of the construction of a contract of insurance.

Mr. Le Quesne, K.C., and Mr. Simey appeared for the insurance company, the appellants; Mr. Porter, K.C., and Mr. Somervell for the claimants, the respondents.

By an insurance effected in 1919 the company insured goods of the claimants, Symington and Co., at and from any port or ports, place or places between Bordeaux and Nice, both inclusive, to the United Kingdom and until delivered at destination inland . . . in the vessel called the Hillhouse . . . sailing February, 1920. . . . Beginning the adventure upon the said goods and merchandises from the loading thereof on board the said ship. . . .

The claimants were cork growers, carrying on business in Spain. In 1919 they had a factory and warehouse at San Roque, which is about eight miles north of Algeciras, and is connected therewith by railway. The cork was sent down from the claimants' warehouse at San Roque to Algeciras, where there was a jetty but no warehouse, and was either shipped from the jetty at Algeciras or was ferried across from the jetty to Gibraltar and shipped there. Owing to lack of railway facilities the cork was sent down to Algeciras in small quantities day by day, and was allowed to accumulate on the jetty till there was enough to be shipped to the United Kingdom.

On February 9, 1920, there was on the jetty at Algeciras awaiting shipment an accumulation of cork consisting of 1,105 bales of large grain and 1,006 of small grain. Some of the small grain had been lying on the jetty since August, 1919, and the rest of the cork had been sent down from the warehouse at San Roque in November and December, 1919, and January, 1920. The claimants expected to ship the accumulated cork on a steamer, the Hillhouse, about February 20, 1920.

On November 25, 1919, the claimants effected an insurance of £20,000 on the cork with the present appellants and other companies, the insurance to begin on January 1, 1920.

On February 9, 1920, before any declaration had been made under the insurance and before a policy had been issued, a fire broke out on the jetty at Algeciras at some distance from the claimants' cork. To prevent the fire from spreading to the claimants' cork the port and military authorities decided to jettison part of it and to throw sea-water on the part which remained on the jetty. As a consequence 1,011 bales of large grain and 205 bales of small grain were lost or damaged. The claimants claimed under the policy, and the claim was referred to arbitration. The arbitrator awarded in favour of the claimants subject to the decision of this special case.

The policy contained material clauses as follows:—

"1. Warranted free of capture seizure arrest restraint or detainment. . . .

"6. The insured goods are covered subject to the terms of this policy from the time of leaving the shipper's or manufacturer's warehouse during the ordinary course of transit until on board the vessel . . . and from the vessel whilst on quays wharves or in sheds during the ordinary course of transit until safely deposited in consignee's or other warehouse at destination named in policy.

"9. Warranted free from particular average . . . but notwithstanding this warranty the assurers are to pay the insured value of any package or packages which may be totally lost in loading transhipment or discharge, also for any loss . . . which may reasonably be attributed to fire. . . ."

There was also inserted in the margin of the policy the following clause:—

"This policy not to enure to the benefit of any Fire Insurance Company. It is warranted and agreed by the assured that any shore risk against fire granted herein shall not cover where the assured or any carrier or other bailee has fire insurance which would attach if this policy had not been issued."

The arbitrator held that the policy should be read as not containing that marginal clause, because it was not contained in the slip which represented the real contract between the parties.

Mr. Le Quesne, in opening the case, submitted, first, that when the loss occurred the risk had not attached. The insurance was from any port or ports, place or places between Bordeaux and Nice, and that must mean some place on the coast line from Bordeaux to Nice and could not include San Roque, which was eight miles inland. The policy was evidently only intended to cover the goods from some place to which ships could go. The warehouse to warehouse clause must be read as beginning from the claimants' warehouse at the port or place of loading. These goods were never in a warehouse, because the arbitrator had found as a fact that the Algeciras jetty was not a warehouse.

Secondly, clause 9, the "free from particular average" clause, making the insurers liable for damage attributable to fire, could not have the effect of doing away with the rule as to proximate cause, and here the proximate cause of the loss was the action of the port authorities and was not the fire, which was admittedly some distance away. Thirdly, the insurers were entitled to rely on the marginal clause, and the claimants could not recover because they had another insurance against fire.

Mr. Simey, who followed, submitted that the loss was not attributable to fire but to acts done in apprehension of fire; the loss was not due to a peril insured against.

Mr. Porter supported the award in favour of the claimants, and Mr. Le Quesne replied.

Mr. Justice Roche stated the facts, and said that the first point he would deal with was the marginal clause providing for the case of another insurance against fire. The arbitrator had held that that clause must be treated as non-existent because it did not appear in the slip, and the slip contained the real contract between the parties. In that he thought that the arbitrator was right.

Then it was said that the risk had not attached when the damage occurred. Reading the whole policy together, he concluded that, whether San Roque was a place within the meaning of the first part of the policy or not, the goods at the time of the loss were in the ordinary course of transit, and were covered by the warehouse to warehouse clause. He held, therefore, that the risk had attached, and that the goods were covered by the policy.

It was further said that there was no loss by a peril insured against, but that the cause of the loss was the action of the authorities, for which the insurers were not liable, as the policy was expressed to be warranted free of capture, seizure, &c. As to that, he thought that the case was within the principles laid down by Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes in The Knight of St. Michael (14 The Times L.R., 191 ; [1898] P., 30, at pp. 34-35). There was imminent danger of fire, and the loss, if not strictly speaking a loss by fire, was a loss ejusdem generis. The arbitrator had held that the loss might reasonably be attributed to fire, and he thought that the view of the arbitrator was right. It was not necessary to attempt to define "restraint of princes," but he held that the action of the authorities in this case did not constitute such a restraint. The arbitrator had come to a right conclusion, and the award must be affirmed.

Prob., Divorce, and Adm. Div. (Lord Merrivale, P.) } 1928. Mar. 6.

Divorce — Practice — King's Proctor's rights—Powers of the Court—Intervention by King's Proctor before decree nisi — Collusion not charged — Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 and 21 Vict., c. 85), s. 29—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1860 (23 and 24 Vict., c. 144), s. 7—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 49), ss. 178, 181.

It is open to the King's Proctor by direction of the Court to intervene during the progress of a divorce suit with new evidence before decree nisi, subject to the direction of the Attorney-General, not only when collusion is in question but when other matters are in question. It was held that the Attorney-General was entitled, in the circumstances, to direct the King's Proctor to present new evidence.

This was a summons adjourned into Court for argument.

Mrs. Mary Sybil Williams Sloggett, née Lane, petitioned on December 8, 1926, for the dissolution of her marriage with Mr. Albert Arthur Sloggett, on the ground of his adultery with Marjorie Bragazzi Turner at the Grand Hotel, Leigh-on-Sea. The petition showed that the marriage took place at St. Giles' register office, London, on November 5, 1920, and the parties lived at 1, St. Mary's Mansions, St. Mary's-terrace, Paddington, and at other places. There was no issue.

The petitioner also said that on or about October 25, 1925, she cohabited with a man at the Hotel Cecil, Strand, and that on or about October 29, 1925, she cohabited with the same man at the Hotel Russell, Russell-square. She asked the Court to exercise its discretion in her favour.

The case came on for trial before the President on May 25 and 26, 1927, the petitioner's counsel being Mr. Cotes-Preedy, K.C., and Mr. W. N. Stable. After hearing the evidence and the arguments of counsel his Lordship adjourned the suit in order that the King's Proctor might be heard in argument upon the matter. The King's Proctor accordingly took out the present summons for directions.

The Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. Clifford Mortimer appeared for the King's Proctor ; Mr. W. N. Stable and Mr. J. M. Buckley for the petitioner.

The Attorney-General submitted that it was desirable that the Court should make a definite pronouncement as to the powers and duties of the King's Proctor in such circumstances as were disclosed in the present case. At the hearing Mr. Cotes-Preedy had presented a very remarkable story. He said that the petitioner was a foundling, supposed to have been born in 1901, who did not know her parents. She was given the name of Mary Lane by the Board of Guardians under whose care she came. In 1917, when quite a young girl, she became the mistress of a man whose name was not mentioned. A year later she met Mr. Sloggett and became his mistress, and she married him on November 5, 1920, the home being for the most part provided by her first lover, who for a time continued, it seemed, to be the chief means of the married couple's support. The first lover visited them, but apparently his old relation with the wife had ceased. In January, 1923, Mr. Sloggett was convicted at the Central Criminal Court on a charge of false pretences and sentenced to a term of imprisonment. Meanwhile Mrs. Sloggett had lived with her mother-in-law until she left the house because of differences between them in March, 1923. The same day she met an elderly man whose name was written down and not disclosed, who took her temporarily to a hotel, and adopted her as his niece. She continued to live with him as a member of his family, but it was stated that there had never been any suggestion of immoral relations between them.

On the release of Mr. Sloggett from prison in May, 1925, Mr. Martin, a brother-in-law of the petitioner, with the knowledge of her solicitors, saw Mr. Sloggett and made an offer of £300 for him to go abroad, and asked him for the name of the woman with whom he had committed adultery as revealed in the police court proceedings. The petitioner's solicitors found that the husband was arranging to commit adultery for her benefit and they declined to entertain such an arrangement. There were constant entries in their bills of costs relating to the matter. In a subsequent letter Mr. Sloggett said that he was offered £100 down, £100 on decree nisi, and £100 on decree absolute ; he said that he received £30 in all but withheld the information as to his adultery until he got full payment.

Then the wife, as she said everything seemed so hopeless, herself committed adultery, and sent her husband information of it in order to enable him to divorce her, and she told him to employ a certain firm of solicitors, and that his costs would be paid. Towards the end of 1925 there were further police-court proceedings against Mr. Sloggett, and in November of that year she learned of his adultery with the woman Turner. At the time she was afraid of publicity and delayed filing her petition for a year. Before the petition was filed she saw Mr. Sloggett at Pentonville Prison, and offered him £50 not to defend the case, as it would make things easier for her.

After the hearing the President said that three questions presented themselves : (1) Was there connivance by the petitioner in the adultery of her husband ? (2) Did these discussions amount to a scheme of collusion? (3) Was there conduct conducing to adultery on his part? He adjourned the case for the King's Proctor to be heard in argument upon it.

Continuing, the ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that he thereupon directed the King's Proctor to ascertain the facts, and as a result of the investigation he was prepared to adduce evidence showing that the adultery which the petitioner admitted having committed at the Hotel Russell on October 29, 1925, really occurred on November 24, 1925. Not only did she commit adultery in a moment of despair, but, owing to some difficulty in proving identification, she committed another act of adultery in order that the evidence should be complete. That was a very grave fact. He would not be justified in asking the Court to act on the evidence of the husband with regard to collusion, and the position now was that either the King's Proctor, in obedience to the direction of the Court, had to argue on a false state of facts or he had to bring the real facts before the Court before decree nisi.

The matter was governed by the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, section 181, which did not alter the old law, and by section 183. Section 181 (2) and (3) read:—

"(2) Any person may at any time during the progress of the proceedings or before the decree nisi is made absolute give information to His Majesty's Proctor of any matter material to the due decision of the case, and His Majesty's Proctor may thereupon take such steps as the Attorney-General considers necessary or expedient:

"(3) If in consequence of any such information or otherwise His Majesty's Proctor suspects that any parties to the petition are or have been acting in collusion for the purpose of obtaining a decree contrary to the justice of the case, he may, under the direction of the Attorney-General, after obtaining the leave of the Court, intervene and retain counsel and subpœna witnesses to prove the alleged collusion."

The last subsection re-enacted section 7 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1860, which created the decree nisi. In Hudson v. Hudson and Poole (1 P.D., 65) it was suggested by Sir James Hannen, President, that only in the case of suspected collusion could the King's Proctor intervene during the progress of a divorce suit, and if there were any other material facts in question he must watch and take action if necessary after decree nisi. In that case the Queen's Proctor desired to intervene after decree nisi on the grounds of the petitioner's cruelty and adultery but not collusion. Sir James Hannen said: "If the information leads the Queen's Proctor to suspect collusion, then the direction of the Attorney-General will be that the Queen's Proctor should intervene in the suit. . . . But if the Queen's Proctor does not, from the information he has received, suspect collusion, the statute does not enable him to intervene at all in his official capacity."

In Jackson v. Jackson (26 The Times L.R., 476; [1910] P., 230) the view was expressed by Mr. Justice Bargrave Deane on behalf of himself and Lord Mersey, both great authorities on the practice of the Court, that before decree nisi the King's Proctor, on the direction of the Attorney-General, could, if necessary, call evidence. The Attorney-General of the day (now Lord Reading) did not feel disposed to take such action in that case, but in view of this judicial expression of opinion he (Sir Douglas Hogg) thought it necessary to ask for a judicial opinion on the respective responsibilities of the Attorney-General and of the King's Proctor. That officer now applied for leave to ask questions with the object of satisfying the Court that the petition had been falsely presented, and, as to the duty of the Attorney-General, he submitted that a Law Officer might be left to perform his duties with discretion. He referred to Lautour v. Her Majesty's Proctor (10 H.L. Cas., 685), which was a decision that there was power to award costs to the Queen's Proctor when he intervened as to collusion but not otherwise. The general power to award costs to the Queen's Proctor was provided in the subsequent Matrimonial Causes Act, 1860.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL referred to Masters v. Masters (34 L.J., P. and M., 7), and said that Sottomayer v. de Barros (5 P.D., 94) was a direct decision that the Queen's Proctor might before decree nisi file pleas other than that of collusion. Thereby Sir James Hannen seemed to have given a decision conflicting with his previous one in Hudson v. Hudson and Poole (supra).

LORD MERRIVALE.—Matters before decree nisi were in issue in Sottomayer v. de Barros (supra). Sir James Hannen's observation in Hudson v. Hudson and Poole (supra) was obiter.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL referred to Drummond v. Drummond (2 Sw. and Tr., 269), Boardman v. Boardman (L.R., 1 P. and D., 233), Dering v. Dering (L.R., 1 P. and D., 531), and Gaskill v. Gaskill (38 The Times L.R., 1; [1921] P., 425) in which the Attorney-General appeared as amicus curiae and called expert evidence on the question of the period of gestation, and Lord Birkenhead, sitting as a Judge, gave judgment on the basis of the specialist's evidence.

LORD MERRIVALE.—No question was raised as to the procedure. It was taken for granted.

In conclusion, the ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that though he submitted that the King's Proctor clearly had the right of intervening before decree nisi, if so directed by the Attorney-General, the last thing the former would desire was a decision making him a sort of poor respondent's solicitor to act whenever the respondent did not want to bear the expense. In all the cases in which the parties were before the Court the King's Proctor during the six months elapsing between decree nisi and decree absolute made inquiry and in proper cases adduced evidence. But he might intervene at an earlier stage, and if such a power existed there could not be a better case for its exercise than the present. The evidence had raised in his Lordship's mind some doubt as to connivance if not collusion. It might be that there was new evidence sufficient to prove connivance and not collusion as to the particular adultery. Therefore he asked leave to cross-examine the petitioner and call evidence from the Hotel Russell.

Mr. STABLE said that he offered no opposition on the petitioner's behalf, but would merely cite certain authorities. He referred to Gethin v. Gethin (2 Sw. and Tr., 406) and submitted that Lautour v. Her Majesty's Proctor (supra) was a decision negativing the Attorney-General's argument. The "steps" to be taken by the Attorney-General under the section of the statute cited above were confined to watching and inquiry. A possible escape from the dilemma caused by the ambiguity of the statutes might be found in section 178 (1) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, which re-enacted section 29 in the 1857 Act imposing upon the Court the duty to satisfy itself both as to the facts alleged and as to any possible connivance or collusion and as to any countercharge against the petitioner. Possibly this gave the Court authority to direct the King's Proctor to intervene during the progress of the suit, and then his costs would have to be borne by the public.

LORD MERRIVALE.—That may be so, as neither of the parties is here in the public interest. Some months ago a grave question arose as to territorial waters in the Admiralty Court in the case of The Fagernes (43 The Times L.R., 746 ; [1927] P., 311) and the Attorney-General was called in.

Mr. STABLE referred to Higgins v. King's Proctor and King's Proctor v. Carter (26 The Times L.R., 303 ; [1910] P., 151) and submitted that the position was as follows : The Court might at any time direct the King's Proctor to argue under section 181 (1) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925. After decree nisi the King's Proctor, like any other member of the public, could for any material reason show cause why the decree nisi should not be made absolute, but intervention by the King's Proctor was confined to cases where collusion was alleged either alone or at least as one of the elements to be brought to the notice of the Court. If the King's Proctor took any part in a suit before decree nisi apart from this it could only be by virtue of section 178 (1) of the 1925 Act.

In answer to the PRESIDENT, Mr. STABLE said that in Gaskill v. Gaskill (supra) it was difficult to see upon the authority of what statute or rule the expert evidence was called.

In reply the ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that the real point was : If material facts, not collusive, were brought to his knowledge what "steps" was the Attorney-General to take ? Surely those which he thought expedient, and his object must be to ensure, in the public interest, that the Court should be satisfied that all the truth should be before it.

Directions of the Court are asked in this case with a view to the determination of certain questions, which arise from time to time with regard to the powers and duties of the King's Proctor in relation to suits for divorce. The matter arises upon a reference to the King's Proctor made by the Court upon the hearing of an undefended suit wherein, upon inquiries by the Court, facts appeared which needed investigation.

In view of certain doubts expressed in the course of the proceedings in the case of Jackson v. Jackson (26 The Times L.R., 476 ; [1910] P., 230) and of the necessity for and importance of the regular conduct of proceedings in divorce the Attorney-General appeared for the King's Proctor and asked that, if the proposal should commend itself to the Court, facts resulting from inquiries made and to be made by the King's Proctor should be duly considered at the adjourned hearing of the suit and that for that purpose counsel nominated by the Attorney-General should be present.

Counsel appeared for the petitioner and stated that the petitioner did not oppose the application for an order for intervention of the King's Proctor in the present case—if the Court should think it admissible under the statutes—but submitted that upon the true construction of the Matrimonial Causes Acts, now contained in the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, intervention of the King's Proctor before decree nisi is limited to cases in which he suspects collusion.

The words in the section which might, prima facie, appear to warrant action by the King's Proctor in cases like the present were—it was said—those of the enactment which appeared fourth in order among the provisions of section 7 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1860—the section introducing into the practice of the Divorce Court the decree nisi—and which is now embodied substantially in the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, section 181.

Shortly put, the argument upon section 181 (2) and (3) is that expressed in the maxim expressio unius exclusio est alterius. The generality of the enactment that the King's Proctor may take such steps as the Attorney-General may direct was said to be limited by the subsequent provision for intervention in the suit if collusion is suspected. It was also said that there is no express authority for directions by the Court in a case like the present. The question for decision does not depend upon the precise effect on the powers and duties of the King's Proctor of the successive enactments in the section in question. Wider considerations are involved. It is necessary to take into account the subject-matter of the statute and the various provisions which relate to it. Foremost of them is the enactment originally contained in the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, sections 29 and 30, now embodied in the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1926, section 178 (1) and (2), whereby on a petition for divorce it becomes the duty of the Court to satisfy itself so far as it "reasonably can both as to the facts alleged and also as to whether the petitioner has been accessory to or has connived at or condoned the adultery or not, and also to inquire into any countercharge which is made against the petitioner," and in case of an adverse finding against the petitioner in respect of either of the matters specified, or a finding of collusion between the parties, to dismiss the petition. Contrary to the ordinary course of trial of civil proceedings the Court is required not only to deal with issues raised by the parties but with independent matters deemed by the Legislature fit to be dealt with in respect of a larger interest, namely, that of the community.

No doubt has ever been thrown, so far as I am aware, on the peremptory character of the obligation which was cast upon the Court by section 29 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857. Very soon after the passage of the Act a practical demonstration of its effect was given.

In a case of Lloyd v. Lloyd and Chichester (1 Sw. & Tr., 567) the Judge Ordinary, Sir Cresswell Cresswell, called for a bill of costs of one of the parties, called and examined a witness on a question which thereon arose, and adjourned the case for further evidence which was dealt with in like manner.

At the time of the hearing of Lloyd v. Lloyd and Chichester (supra) the statute which gave the King's Proctor special duties in relation to suits for divorce had not been passed. The need of some provision such as it enacted was, however, making itself felt.

In a case heard when the 1860 Act, by which this provision was made, was newly in operation, Forster v. Forster (3 Sw. & Tr., 151, at p. 156) the Judge Ordinary made these observations : "Soon after the Court was established it was suspected that attempts had been made to procure a dissolution of marriage by means of collusion, and there had been other instances in which both the party suing and the party sued were equally anxious to obtain a divorce, and without collusion the party sued abstained from setting up matter which might be set up in answer to the petition. It was in order to check these practices that the statute was passed."

So far as I know the power of the Court to require the services of the King's Proctor in aid of the discharge of its duties under section 29 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, has never been seriously questioned. The matter is of course not of a purely judicial character, so far as the administration of justice inter partes is concerned. There are, however, references to it in reported cases. For example, when Sir James Wilde, afterwards Lord Penzance, had succeeded Sir Cresswell Cresswell, in a case of Masters v. Masters (34 L.J., P. and M., 7) the matter was discussed, and in a case of Richards v. Richards (21 L.T., 598) action such as is in question here was taken. Comparatively recent instances in reported cases are found in the action taken by Sir John Bigham, President, (Lord Mersey), and Mr. Justice Bargrave Deane in Jackson v. Jackson (supra) and by Lord Birkenhead, L.C., when he came to the assistance of the Court, in Gaskill v. Gaskill (38 The Times L.R., 1 ; [1921] P., 425). Both warrant the view that the several relevant enactments are properly regarded as enabling the Court to seek the aid of the King's Proctor in respect of questions of fact as well as those of the Law Officers of the Crown upon questions of law at any stage of a case.

Numerous cases were cited before me in which discussions arose as to the limits of the action of the King's Proctor where there was no antecedent direction of the Court. Some of these cases determine that he may intervene in respect of matters other than collusion (Sottomayer v. De Barros, 5 P.D., 94 ; Drummond v. Drummond, 2 Sw. and Tr., 269 ; Boardman v. Boardman, L.R., 1 P. and D., 233) and in his official capacity or as a member of the public (Lautour v. Her Majesty's Proctor, 10 H.L. Cas., 685), or they decide in what cases before the Judicature Act he had a statutory right to costs as against a party to the suit (Masters v. Masters, supra). Discussions which arose on these topics do not affect the more important of the matters now under consideration.

The report of the proceedings in Jackson v. Jackson (supra) indicates a doubt on the part of the Law Officers at that time as to the extent of the obligation cast then and now on the King's Proctor by the provisions of the statutes. No such doubt, however, was suggested in the more recent case of Gaskill v. Gaskill (supra). What was then done was consistent with the course taken by Lord Penzance at an earlier time, when perhaps the process of reference to the King's Proctor of matters requiring investigation, in aid of the discharge of the duties of this Court, was easier of comprehension.

The King's Proctor was, before the Divorce Court existed, an officer of the Court, as a solicitor is now, with defined duties in the ecclesiastical jurisdiction. Probate was dealt with in the Court of Admiralty. When a new duty and new powers were put upon him his relation to those courts was a matter of common knowledge. Remembrance of that fact helps to a better understanding of the cases before Lord Penzance.

The two questions to be dealt with now are whether the services of the King's Proctor were properly required by the Court in this case, and whether a direction that he should be represented at the hearing can properly be given. Regarding the first question in the light of the statutory duty of the Court to which the King's Proctor's office is ancillary, I have no doubt that the direction given him in this case was a valid direction. Giving the effect which I ought to give to the submissions made by the Attorney-General, what seems to me proper to be done now is that particulars should be given to the petitioner of the matters deemed proper to be brought by the King's Proctor to the attention of the Court, and that at the further hearing of the cause the King's Proctor should be represented in order that such facts or matters may be duly presented and considered.

FRANCE v. J. COOMBES AND CO.*

Master and servant—Minimum wage—Trade board—Employment both on work of "specified trade" and on other work—Claim for wages at minimum rate during whole time of employment—Trade Boards Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 32), s. 8.

The plaintiff was employed by the defendants as "working manager" of a branch shop. During about half of the business hours he was employed in working at a trade for which minimum rates of wages had been fixed under the Trade Boards Acts, 1909 and 1918. During the rest of those hours he was engaged in cleaning the shop, keeping the books, selling goods by retail and performing under his contract of service other duties for which no minimum wage had been fixed.

Held, that the plaintiff was not, by s. 8 of the Trade Boards Act, 1918, to be deemed to have been employed during all the business hours on work for which a minimum rate of wages had been fixed, since the defendants had proved that he was present on their premises during those hours for some purpose, (a) unconnected with the work for which a minimum rate of wages had been fixed, and (b) other than that of waiting for work to be given to him to perform.

Judgment of MacKinnon, J. (44 The Times L.R., 126 ; [1928] 1 K.B., 457), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment of Mr. Justice MacKinnon (44 The Times L.R., 126 ; [1928] 1 K.B., 457) in favour of the defendants.

Mr. Herbert France, a Manchester boot and shoe repairer, claimed from Messrs. J. Coombes and Co., boot and shoe repairers, of Harrogate, Yorkshire, £363 odd which he said was owing to him as wages.

For about three years Mr. France was employed by the defendants as "working manager" of a branch shop at Openshaw, Manchester, under an agreement by which he agreed "to do all kinds of boot repairing and other work" required by the defendants ; to be responsible for all moneys and goods at the branch; to render to the defendants all accounts as required ; to account for and pay over all moneys of the employers ; to keep all books and documents ; and to keep open the branch shop and remain in attendance at it during business hours. The parties also signed a document headed "Rules for Managers of Branch Shops," which specified the business hours and provided that the shop must be cleaned before

* Reported by T. W. Morgan, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

10 o'clock, that cash must be balanced and the day-book entered up nightly; and that a balance-sheet must be completed every week.

During the currency of the agreement the defendants paid to Mr. France the full amount of the wages provided for in it. After he had left their employment, however, he brought an action, alleging that the amount of wages due to him was regulated by the Trade Boards Acts, that he had not received the sums provided by those Acts, and that the defendants were liable to pay him the balance.

The primary purpose of the branch shop of which Mr. France was manager was to repair boots and shoes brought there for that purpose by customers but there was also a retail trade of selling blacking, laces, and other "sundries." Mr. France was employed, on the average, during about half the business hours in actually repairing boots and shoes. During the rest of the time he served in the shop, attended to it, kept the books and accounts, and performed his other duties under the contract.

The boot and shoe repairing trade was a trade for which minimum piece rates and time rates had been fixed by the trade board for the industry under the Trade Boards Acts.

Mr. France based his claim on section 8 of the Trade Boards Act, 1918, which provides:—

"For the purpose of calculating the amount of the wages payable in the case of a worker employed on any work for which a minimum rate of wages has been fixed under the [Trade Boards Act, 1909], the worker shall be deemed to have been employed during all the time during which he was present on the premises of the employer, unless the employer proves . . . that he was so present for some purpose unconnected with his work and other than that of waiting for work to be given him to perform. . . ."

He said that, in view of that section, during the whole time that he was in the defendants' shop he was to be "deemed to have been employed" there in repairing boots and shoes, and that he was entitled to time and overtime minimum rates in respect of all the business hours which he spent at the shop.

The defendants contended that Mr. France was not to be deemed to have been acting as a boot and shoe repairer during all the time when he was at the shop, but that he was only employed on that work during the actual periods in which he was repairing boots and shoes, and for that he had been paid the full legal rates.

Mr. Justice MacKinnon held that the plaintiff was not, by section 8 of the Trade Boards Act, 1918, to be deemed to have been employed during all the business hours on work for which a minimum rate of wages had been fixed, since the defendants had proved that he was present on their premises during those hours for some purpose—(a) unconnected with the work for which a minimum rate of wages had been fixed; and (b) other than that of waiting for work to be given to him to perform.

The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. Schiller, K.C., and Mr. Malcolm Hilbery appeared for the appellant; Mr. Neilson, K.C., and Sir Robert Aske for the respondents.

Lord Justice Scrutton.—There are undoubtedly some difficulties in this case, and the fact that the Government department concerned has changed its mind in the course of years shows that the matter is not an easy one, but having listened with due care to the argument of Mr. Schiller, I am not convinced that the judgment of Mr. Justice MacKinnon was wrong, in fact I think it was right; and I would have been quite content to adopt that judgment, but in deference to the argument which has been addressed to us, and in order to show that I have formed an independent view of my own, I will deal with the substance of the matter.

The plaintiff is a workman named Herbert France. He brings this action and says that for a period of nearly three years he was paid less than he ought to have been paid under the Trade Boards Acts and rules made thereunder, and he says that he is short paid by a very substantial amount because, looking at the figures on his writ, for 15 weeks he was paid £2 15s. a week, for 13 weeks he was paid £2 18s., and for 12 weeks he was paid £3 3s. a week, and he says: "The result of that is that I was short paid by no less a sum than £363," which forces upon one's attention this fact, as appears by the figures, that the total takings of the shop in which he was working were for the greater part of the time that he was there only between £4 and £5 a week. His case is that the Trade Boards Acts entitle him to have 55s. or 58s. a week plus 48s.—rather more than £5 a week in wages alone—which, in addition to what the employers have to pay for materials, would have this result, if the plaintiff is right, that the shop would not show any profit, but a loss, during those three years when the plaintiff was there.

The nature of the case is this. The employers admit that the plaintiff was employed in boot repairing, and, further, I think that the workman is entitled to say that part of his work was that of a foreman or manager and boot repairer as defined by the Act. The employers say that the plaintiff was also employed in another capacity, that he was clerical manager, and financial manager, and an accountant or clerk, and a financial manager or clerk is not a boot repairer. They say that the plaintiff was there to do two things, that his wages for a full week of boot repairing are so much, and if he worked at boot repairing for a less period than a full week of 48 hours then his wages were to be proportionately reduced. The plaintiff himself was, according to his own evidence, only employed at boot repairing work for about four hours a day. Now, if the employers had added some infinitesimal amount of work which was not boot repairing, simply to evade the provisions of the Trade Boards Order, I hope the Courts would be clear-sighted enough to see through that and strong enough to defeat the attempt to evade the Act in that way. But it seems to me on the facts here, that it is quite impossible to say that that is the state of things revealed by the evidence.

The defendant firm, James Coombes and Co., and, if Mr. Schiller is right, a number of other employers, run their business in this way. They have a number of small shops, many of which, I gathered, only employ one man, and the man in that small shop has to do, firstly, the repairing that comes in; secondly, he has to keep all the accounts of the shop; and, thirdly, (this may or may not be substantial, according to the neighbourhood), he has to sell small sundries which are very often bought by people who bring boots for repair, and which do not constitute repairs. The result is that you have a composite servant who is devoting part of his time to repairs, a servant who is devoting part of his time to clerical and financial work and sales which do not come within the Boot Repairing Order.

The trade which is the subject-matter of this Trade Boards Order fixing rates is defined in this way: "The boot and shoe repairing trade, that is to say, the repairing, wherever carried on, of boots, shoes, slippers, and all kinds of leather footwear, including the making of bespoke handsewn, riveted or pegged leather footwear"—I suppose no one would call making boots ordinary repair, but in this case they have called the making of boots repair—"but excluding the manufacture of leather footwear on a large scale, the repairing of saddlery and leather goods other than leather footwear, and the retailing of leather footwear." One does not quite see why anybody should have thought that saddlery came within boots and shoes, but the Department apparently did think that saddlery came within boots and shoes and footwear. The effect of the Order is that if you are there to sell goods you are not within the Order.

Then comes the part of the Order applying to this class of work—namely, repairing—and it says that the male workers, the journeymen, are to have for a 48-hours week wages varying according to the percentage of the cost of living from 65s. to 60s. and 57s., and a manager or foreman is to have a larger allowance, 80s., 74s., or 72s., which is the rate that the plaintiff got in this case. Then there comes a proviso as follows: "The weekly rates specified in this part of this schedule are based on a week of 48 hours and are subject to a proportionate reduction according as the number of hours of employment in any week is less than 48." That clearly contemplates that if a workman only works half of 48 hours at the specified work—24 hours—his fixed wages will be only half the figures that are mentioned.

There is in the Order a definition of a foreman or manager. It is as follows: "A foreman or manager is a worker who is employed in any branch of the trade specified in the Trade Boards (Boot and Shoe Repairing) Order, 1919, and (a) who exercises sole supervising authority over all journeymen exceeding three in number"—that is not this man's case because he alone was in the shop and only exercised supervision over himself and nobody else—or "(b) who (whether working alone"—that is this man's case, as he was working alone—"or with any other worker) under the terms of his employment, in addition to any work which may be required of him as a journeyman, fits up, or supervises the fitting up of the work and has control of the repairing or making and the technical direction thereof." Now that seems to me clearly to point only to a foreman who is doing technical direction, who is technically directing the work of boot repairing. It is not necessary for me in this Court to go fully into the mysteries of what fitting up work is, as any attempt to illustrate it only produces contradiction from the counsel concerned; at any rate, it is something which is a skilled part of boot repairing in the sense that it is directing the journeymen with regard to the repairing—the technical direction—and there is nothing whatever in the Order about the work of the shop manager, who manages the finance and accounts and the clerical work. That is treated as not being the work of boot repairing. The work of financing and boot repairing are quite different.

If you put a man into a shop where there are a dozen journeymen workers, and all he had to do was to book the orders, and see that the orders were paid for, to keep the accounts, to keep the lists of stock, to pay the money into the bank, to give information to the inspector who came round, and generally to do clerical and accountancy work, it seems to me quite clear that such a man would not be within the Repairing Order. Of course, these are questions of degree. It might be that the man did so little in this respect, that the Court would not trouble about it, as he was substantially a boot repairer. But when one looks at the agreement which regulates this kind of work, one sees that the plaintiff has a very substantial amount of clerical and financial work to do. Every day, as I gather, he has to prepare and fill up a form of the work which is finished during the day, and the wages for the day, the number of hours employed on the work; and every week he has to fill up another and rather complicated form, a form which does not appear to be very easy to fill up, because in this particular form which has been handed to me of this particular man the inspector has found three mistakes, and has had to correct them. I can quite see that it is a form in which it is very easy to make mistakes when you fill it up. There are a number of matters that have to be filled up of various sorts, and that has to be done every week. Every week that form has to be filled up, the money has to be checked and paid into the bank, and every fortnight a further form has to be made out of stock in hand, repairs in hand, finished and unfinished, and consequently there appears to me to be a very substantial amount of clerical work to be done by this man which does not come within the Boot Repairing Order at all.

In addition to that, there is a class of work which Mr. Schiller says in this case is small, but which, according to the district, may be small or large; that is to say, this man has to act as salesman of a number of articles apart from repairs, and he has to keep his shop open for a certain time in order to sell these things, which are called sundries. When you understand that that is the position, it appears to me that you have got a man who is doing two distinct kinds of work, not substantially one kind of work with a colourable addition to defeat the Trade Boards Order, but two distinct kinds of work, and this man comes and says: "My boot repairing work takes up only four hours a day." It seems to me, subject to the consideration of section 8, to which I am now coming, that if once you get a case where he cannot say: "I am entitled to the full wages for boot repairing" because, on his own evidence, he is not working 48 hours a week, or anything like it, on boot repairing, but is working only about half that time—namely, 24 hours—if that is the correct view, then there is no dispute that he has not been underpaid.

Now comes the only question which, in my mind, raises any difficulty, and that is the question in regard to section 8 of the Act of 1918. That is the only point on which we desired to hear Mr. Alexander Neilson. The section provides: "For the purpose of calculating the amount of the wages payable in the case of a worker employed on any work for which a minimum rate of wages has been fixed under the principal Act, the worker shall be deemed to have been employed during all the time during which he was present on the premises of the employer, unless the employer proves that he was so present without the employer's consent express or implied"—that does not arise here, because no doubt he was in the shop by the employers' consent—"or that he was so present for some purpose unconnected with his work and other than that of waiting for work to be given to him to perform. . . ."

The only question is: Does the employer prove, when he proves that the man has to be there so many hours a day for clerical work, financial work, and for the purpose of selling sundries, that he is present for some purpose unconnected with his work? I think he does. I agree that it is a nice question, but I do not think that when Parliament was using that phrase it was thinking that if the workman is on his employer's premises for some purpose which is not boot repairing, but which has some remote connexion with it in the sense that if the workman sells a bootlace, or anything that relates to the same subject matter, namely, a boot, therefore it is connected—I do not think that Parliament was thinking of anything so remote as that. I think Parliament was thinking of work which could be really said to be connected with the technical work of repairing, involving manual labour. One knows that, fortunately or unfortunately (I do not express an opinion which it is), clerical work is paid at a much lower rate than skilled manual work. If you compare the wages of a skilled manual labourer with the wages of a teacher, or the wages of a curate, or the wages of people who do skilled head work, you will find that the skilled manual labourer has very much the best of it, and the sort of work added here does not seem to me in any degree work connected with the technical work, but it is work of quite a different character. That seems to me to answer the only question left. It is said that this man must stay in the shop because he is waiting in case a repair comes in. That is true, but he must also stay in the shop because he has been engaged to do that work which is not repairing, and he could not, if he knew that no repairing was coming in, shut up the shop, go away, and say : "I shall not stay any longer," because he has contracted to stay in the shop for work which appears in the agreement that he has entered into.

That disposes of the main question in this case. The man was there employed in doing work not within the Boot Repairing Order, and, having regard to the provision that if it does not occupy 48 hours a week his fixed wages are to be reduced, he has not been underpaid, in the amount that he has had.

It is strictly unnecessary to consider the remaining matter which was mentioned, and that is whether, assuming that you are to take the whole amount into account, you could not deduct the time occupied for meals. The provisions relating to meal times are that the workman has six hours for meal times during which he is not to do any boot repairing, he is not to sell sundries, and the only thing he can be required to do is to take an order if it comes in for boot repairing, or take payment from a person who comes in to get finished repairs. That not being work which is, in my view, within the Order, it follows that if there were any question of underpayment at all he could not have claimed for the meal hours mentioned in this agreement.

For these reasons I think that the appeal fails, and I am the more confident in coming to that conclusion because I think it would be rather a scandal that a man could stay at his work for three years, and then at the end claim this amount as underpayment, whereas if he had claimed for underpayment at the beginning of his work, or if his Union had claimed it at the beginning of his work, the shop would have been shut up at once, and he would have lost the whole of his employment. I think that, besides being according to law, the decision that Mr. Justice Mackinnon came to worked substantial justice.

Lord Justice Sankey said :—The plaintiff's claim is against the defendants for a sum of £363 10s. 6d., being the balance of wages which he alleges is due and owing by them to him in accordance with the Trade Boards Acts, 1909 to 1918, in respect of his employment with the defendants as manager of the defendants' boot repairing business at Ashton Old-road, Openshaw, in the City of Manchester. To that claim the defendants put in a defence, one of the paragraphs of which is this :—They say : "The plaintiff was employed by the defendants on the terms of an agreement in writing between them dated January 3, 1923, and not otherwise. The defendants refer to the said agreement for its terms." Then they say : "The defendants have paid to the plaintiff all wages and other moneys payable under the said agreement." The plaintiff in his reply admitted the agreement, but said that by reason of section 6, subsection 5, of the Trade Boards Act, 1909, that agreement is void. Section 6, subsection 5, of that Act is in the following terms : "Any agreement for the payment of wages in contravention of this provision"—that is, of that Act—"shall be void." The plaintiff also said that the agreement was in contravention and was void, and, therefore, could not be relied upon.

Now it is necessary to look at the agreement in question. It is stated to be between Messrs. James Coombes and Co. of the one part and Mr. Herbert France of the other part, and it provides in paragraph 1 : "The employer shall employ the employee and the employee shall serve the employer from the date hereof as working manager at the branch shop of the employer at Ashton Old-road, Openshaw, Manchester," and it refers to the printed rules and conditions for managers which are annexed to the agreement and signed by both parties, and which are alleged to form part of the agreement. Now when you look at the agreement itself as distinct from the printed rules and conditions for managers which are to form part of the agreement it is obvious that Mr. France has a number of duties of very different kinds to perform. First and foremost he agreed in paragraph 2 (a) "To do all kinds of boot repairing and other work required by the employer and devote the whole of his time, ability and attention to the employer's business." Now stopping there for a moment, it is clear that in respect of that paragraph 2 (a) he is to do manual work—he is to do all kinds of boot repairing and other work required by the employer. It may be that he does it merely with his hands ; it may be that he does it sometimes with the assistance of some machinery, but in addition to that work, under sub-paragraphs (f), (g), and (h), he has a very different sort of work to perform. Under sub-paragraph (g) he has "To keep all business books and documents on the premises at which he is employed," and under (h) he has "To keep open the branch shop and remain in attendance thereat during business hours."

Upon the agreement itself, it is therefore clear, as it appears to me at any rate, that Mr. France is engaged in a dual or double capacity ; he has the manual work of repairing all kinds of boots, he also engages to keep the branch shop open and to remain in attendance during business hours, and to keep all business books and documents on the premises at which he is employed. There is evidence, too, that a small amount of sales of accessories went on.

Now turning to the rules to which I have referred, they are headed : "Rules for Managers of Branch Shops," and those rules contain a variety of obligations with regard to keeping books and accounts, paying money into the bank and so forth. I am not going to read all of them, but I will read two as a specimen, and refer to others. Rule 7 is : "Cash and tickets must be balanced and day book entered nightly. In case accounts do not balance when official checks same or if any boots are found in the shop which are not entered in the repairs book, or incorrect charges made or wrong class or size of sole leather used according to price charged, managers will be liable to instant dismissal or suspension." Similar rules are 10, 11, and 15. Rule 18 refers to how to dress the shop window. It is headed : "Window dressing." Rule 19 is with regard to the amount to be charged for repairs. There, again, it is obvious that Mr. France is employed in two capacities, namely, the capacity of boot repairing and the capacity of keeping the accounts and keeping open the shop at the place in question.

It is necessary, before turning to the law, to look for a moment at the evidence. Mr. France, the plaintiff, was there for three years. He left at the end of three years, and then brought this action. What he said in his evidence was : "On the average when I was there the hours when I was at the bench were less than those when I was not at the bench. Of my 63 hours in a week, 24 hours would be at the bench and 39 hours not." I read that as saying that he was employed in his clerical work, as distinguished from the manual work, rather more than half his time. Now, turning to the various Orders and Acts of Parliament which govern this case, it is necessary first to refer to the Order which brings this particular trade within the Trade Boards Acts. It is "Statutory Rules and Orders, 1919, No. 543." The then Minister of Labour, Sir Robert Horne, under the powers that he had, added this to the trades to be governed by the Trade Boards Acts : "The boot and shoe repairing trade, that is to say, the repairing, wherever carried on, of boots, shoes, slippers, and all kinds of leather footwear, including the making of bespoke handsewn, riveted or pegged leather footwear, but excluding the manufacture of leather footwear on a large scale, the repairing of saddlery and leather goods other than leather footwear and the retailing of leather footwear." That being the Order which brought this trade within the operation of the Trade Boards Acts, various regulations were issued from time to time, and the one with which we are concerned now was called D (19), D (20), and D (21), which was effective from August 28, 1922. That lays down certain rates of wages, and certain definitions relating to the various people employed in the trade. Section 6 of that Order provided as follows : "The weekly rates specified in this part of this Schedule are based on a week of 48 hours"—this is the important part—"and are subject to a proportionate reduction according as the number of hours of employment in any week is less than 48." Then section 3 of Part IV. defines what a foreman or manager is. It says : "A foreman or manager is a worker who is employed in any branch of the trade specified in the Trade Boards (Boot and Shoe Repairing) Order, 1919, and (a) who exercises sole supervising authority over all journeymen exceeding three in number (excluding the foreman or manager) working in the same shop or department ; or (b) who (whether working alone or with any other worker) under the terms of his employment, in addition to any work which may be required of him as a journeyman, fits up or supervises the fitting up of the work, and has control of the repairing or making and the technical direction thereof." Now stopping there for a moment, I desire to point out, although my Lord has already done so, that that appears to refer to the manual part of the work. It says : "In addition to any work which may be required of him as a journeyman, fits up or supervises the fitting up of the work, and has control of the repairing or making and the technical direction thereof."

Now those being the relevant Acts of Parliament, Rules and Orders, and the facts applicable to this case, what are the contentions of the parties ? On the one hand, Mr. France says : "The agreement is void, the defendants cannot rely upon it because it is in contravention of the Act of Parliament, and I rely upon section 8 of the Trade Boards Act, 1918." He also says : "By that section I must be deemed to have been employed at the minimum rate of wages during all the time that I was present at the premises of the defendants. I was present a great many hours ; it is perfectly true that during part of that time I was doing very little as distinguished from manual work, but I must be deemed to have been employed at the minimum rate of wages during all the time that I was present on the premises of the defendants unless they prove (1) that I was present for some purpose unconnected with the work, and (2) for a purpose other than that of waiting for work to be given me to perform" ; and he adds "while I was not employed on the actual repairing of boots I was attending to customers, and was keeping the books and minding the shop" ; and he says further : "This cannot be purposes unconnected with my work as a boot and shoe repairer."

Now the contention on behalf of the defendants is this : They say that the real question is during what time he was acting as an actual boot and shoe repairer, not during what time he was a member of the boot and shoe repairing trade. They go on to say that he was only actually engaged in repairing boots and shoes during about half the time for which he was paid at the shop, and he has been paid the minimum rate of wages in respect of that time.

Those being the two contentions of the parties, it appears to me that you may have a case where, beyond all question, the man was employed at work which comes within the Trade Boards Acts. On the other hand, as it appears to me, you may have a case where the man was employed for part of his time on such an employment, but for the remainder of his time had nothing at all to do under that employment. Between those two extremes you may have a border line case, and border line cases always lead to difficulties. In my view this is a border line case, and I think it is a difficult case, but the learned Judge, in my view, has come to a correct determination with regard to it. He says in his judgment : "The real question here, I think, is whether the plaintiff can say that he was employed in this trade of boot repairing during the whole time that he was in that shop, or whether the defendants can say to the plaintiff : You were only employed during part of it, during the time when you were in fact repairing boots and shoes."

We are not concerned, as I think, here, on the evidence, with any question of waiting for work, and the real difficulty in the case is the application of section 8 of the Trade Boards Act of 1918, to which my Lord has already referred. I agree with the learned Judge in the Court below that that contemplates the case of a man who is definitely employed during the whole of his time to do boot and shoe repairing, and to do it all the time, so long as there are boots and shoes to be repaired.

Then we have to deal with the difficulty in section 8, which is concerned with the onus of proof which is placed upon the employer, because the man is "deemed to have been employed during all the time during which he was present on the premises of the employer, unless the employer proves . . . that he was so present for some purpose unconnected with his work, and other than that of waiting for work to be given to him to perform, and in the case of a worker employed on piece work shall be deemed during any time during which he was so present and was not doing piece work to have been employed at the general minimum time-rate applicable to workers of the class to which he belongs."

Having regard to the dual capacity in which the plaintiff was engaged, and to which I have already referred, having regard to the numerous stipulations in the agreement which are closely connected with boot repairing simply, and having regard also to all those various stipulations to which I have referred, which are of a wholly different character, and which compel the employee to do all clerical work, and to keep the books—we have had the advantage of seeing specimens of the wages list which a gentleman in his position has to prepare and send up, and also the balance-sheet which he has to prepare and send up—I have come to the conclusion that there was an entirely different employment here in respect of part of the man's time from that which comes within the regulations of the Trade Boards Acts.

There was the obligation on him, moreover, to keep the shop open during business hours. It is, to some extent, a question of degree, and, to some extent, a question of fact, but having regard to the proper interpretation of the sections of the Act of Parliament, and giving the best consideration that I can to the documents in the case, and to the facts as found by the learned Judge, with regard to the hours of this gentleman's employment, I have come to the conclusion that the employers have discharged the onus placed upon them by section 8 of the Act of 1918. In my view the judgment was right, and the appeal should be dismissed.

MR. JUSTICE ROMER.—I agree that the appeal should be dismissed for the reasons that have been given by the Lords Justices, and I only desire to add a very few words.

It may, I think, be taken that the plaintiff was a foreman or manager within the meaning given to the words of section 3 of Part IV. of the Order in question, because he was a worker employed in the trade specified in the Order, and he, as he was working alone, fitted up or supervised the fitting up of the work, because there was no one else to do it, he had control of the repairing, or making the things in relation thereto, because nobody else had that control, but I think it is reasonably plain that all the work that the plaintiff did as foreman and manager must have been done within the hours during which he was—to use the phrase used in the evidence—at the bench.

The other observation that I wish to make is one in relation to section 8 of the Act of 1918. It is to be observed that, in order to escape from the provisions of that section, the employer has not to prove that the employee was present exclusively for some purposes unconnected with his work, and other than that of waiting for work to be given to him to perform. It is sufficient, as I read the section, if the employer proves that one of the purposes (that means one of the substantial purposes) for which the employee was present on the premises was a purpose which was both unconnected with his work, and other than that of waiting for work to be given to him to perform. Now if the question is asked : For what purpose was the plaintiff present on the premises during the hours when he was not working at the bench, the answer must be that he was present for the purpose specified in his agreement of service. When one looks at the agreement of service, one finds that he was employed, not only for the purpose of discharging the duties of foreman and manager but also for the purpose of discharging the duties which, in my opinion, were wholly unconnected with his work as foreman and manager.

K.B. Div. (Wright, J.) 1928. Mar. 23.

SUNDERLAND AND SOUTH SHIELDS WATER COMPANY v. HILTON AND OTHERS.*

Water — Supply — Premises consisting of two unconnected floors — Whether each floor a separate house—One communication pipe—Failure of one occupier to pay water rate—Cutting off water from both floors—South Shields Water Act, 1921 (11 and 12 Geo. V., c. xlvii.), s. 36.

By s. 36 of the South Shields Water Act, 1921, "The company shall not be bound to supply more than one house by means of the same communication pipe and they may if they think fit require that a separate pipe be laid from the main into each house supplied by them with water."

Certain premises in South Shields consisted of a building of two floors wholly unconnected and let to separate occupiers, who had the common use of a yard with a washhouse and other conveniences. A single pipe brought water into the premises.

Held, that as the common user of the yard was essential for the reasonable enjoyment of the premises they were not separate houses for the purposes of the section, and the water company was not entitled to cut off the supply to both floors if the occupier of either floor failed to pay his water rate.

In this case a dispute had arisen between the Sunderland and South Shields Water Company and the owners and occupiers of certain premises in South Shields. By agreement between the parties a special case had been stated for the opinion of the Court.

Mr. W. T. Monckton appeared for the owners and occupiers ; Mr. W. Hedley for the water company.

By a private Act, the Sunderland and South Shields Water Act, 1921, the Waterworks Clauses Acts, 1847 and 1863, were incorporated in the private Act so far as they were not inconsistent with the Sunderland and South Shields Water Acts, 1852 to 1921. By section 36 of the Act of 1921 it was provided that :—

"The company shall not be bound to supply more than one house by means of the same communication pipe and they may if they think fit require that a separate pipe be laid from the main into each house supplied by them with water."

The premises in question consisted of a building of two floors, each floor having its own separate entrance and being entirely without connexion with the other floor. At the back of the building was a yard, to which each floor had a separate access. In the yard were a washhouse and other conveniences, which were used in common by the occupiers of the separate floors. On the farther side of the yard was a wall in which there was a door leading into a back street. The water main passed along the back street, and a single pipe brought water into the premises. A branch from the pipe supplied the conveniences and a tap in the yard, which was used by the occupiers of both floors. The pipe went on to the scullery on the ground floor and passed up to the scullery on the floor above.

In November, 1926, the occupiers of both floors were in arrears with their water rates, and the company, under section 74 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, cut off the supply of water. On January 10, 1927, the occupier of the ground floor left the premises and the arrears then due from him had never been paid. The ground floor was then relet by the owners. On January 17, 1927, the occupier of the upper floor paid up his arrears of water rate and half the cost of cutting off and disconnecting the supply. On January 24, 1927, the occupiers of both floors applied to the company for a supply of water, but the company refused to give it. On March 4, 1927, the company informed the owners of the premises that the water had been cut off and that the supply would not be renewed unless they installed at their own expense a separate pipe to each floor, or undertook to be responsible for the water rates instead of the occupiers.

On May 11, 1927, the occupiers made a formal demand for a supply of water, but the company refused to supply it until their demands had been complied with, contending that each floor was a separate house within the meaning of section 36 of their Act of 1921, and that persons entitled under section 53 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, to demand a supply could only do so subject to the provisions of section 36 of the Act of 1921.

On the hearing of this special case the company claimed a declaration that the two floors were separate houses within the meaning of section 36 and that they were entitled to cut off the water supply to the premises by the common communication pipe if and when the occupier of either floor failed to pay his water rate.

Mr. Justice Wright delivered the following considered judgment*: This is an action brought by the Sunderland and South Shields Water Company, as plaintiffs, against certain defendants. The defendants are, first, the owners of certain premises in South Shields, Nos. 254 and 256, South Palmerston-street, and, in addition, the two occupiers of those premises at the present time. The writ was issued by the plaintiff company claiming certain declarations, but the matter comes before me on a special case stated by agreement between the parties under Order XXXIV., Rule 1. The question which I have to decide, I am told, is one of considerable importance to water companies in general, because it involves the construction of a section which is found in this Act and which is also found in the model clauses for water companies and found in many Acts of water companies throughout the country.

The case was very fully argued before me by the able counsel on either side, but, as I was told that the intention of the parties was not to appeal, whatever my decision might be, I thought it desirable to reserve my judgment, as I have actually done.

The facts in question are comparatively simple. The premises are described in the special case, which is accompanied by a plan. There is one building, which in ordinary parlance would be called a house under a single roof, and it consists of two floors, the ground floor and the first floor. Each floor is quite separate, so far as access or communication is concerned, from the other floor. The ground floor has its own door of entrance from the front street, and the first floor also has a separate door opening from the front street and leading up a flight of stairs to the rooms on the first floor. On each floor there are a bed room, a living room, and a scullery. On the first floor there is also a pantry. At the back of the building there is a yard, there is a separate door on the ground floor into that yard, and from the first floor there is also a separate door leading down a flight of steps into the yard. The yard has an outer wall with a single door opening on to a back street. In the yard there is a washhouse with a copper; that washhouse is common to the occupiers of both flats. There is also a w.c. which is common to both occupiers. There are two coal-houses, one for each occupier. The yard is enjoyed in common by both occupiers, and the only mode of exit for both occupiers to the back street is through the single door out of the yard.

The water supply is arranged in this way. The main is in the back street, and the company have a branch from the main which goes towards the premises and stops just short of the back wall of the yard; there it is joined up to a communication pipe belonging to the premises; that is a single pipe which goes through the yard, and there are branches from it, first of all to the w.c., secondly to a tap in the yard which is in the common use of both occupiers, and then there is a further branch which goes to the scullery on the ground floor and which is also continued up through that floor into the first floor and is carried to a tap in the scullery on the first floor. It follows from that description that so far as the supply of water is concerned there is one communication pipe communicating with the main; there are two branches from that pipe, common to both flats (as I shall call the two floors of the building), and then there are two separate water supplies drawn from the common communication pipe, one to the scullery on the ground floor, the other to the scullery on the first floor. I think that is all that is material for me to refer to in the description of the premises.

In November, 1926, the then tenant of the ground floor was one Ward, and the tenant of the first floor was the defendant Robertson. They had both fallen into arrears in the payment of their water rate, and the plaintiff company thereupon, under their powers under their Acts, cut off the water supply by disconnecting the pipe at a point in the back public street outside the premises. On January 10, 1927, Ward gave up his tenancy, and he has not paid to the plaintiff company the arrears of water rate due from him. The ground floor was thereupon relet by the owners to the defendant Calder. On January 17, 1927, the defendant Robertson paid all arrears of water rate, together with a sum in respect of the expense of cutting off the water supply and of reconnecting the supply, and thereupon an application was made to the plaintiff company by the defendants Calder and Robertson, as the occupiers of parts of a house, for a supply of water to the premises. That application was refused. On March 4, 1927, the plaintiff company sent to the defendants, the owners of the premises, a notice informing them that the water supply had been cut off and stating that the plaintiff company were not prepared to reconnect the supply unless the owners either installed a separate communication pipe to each of the said dwellings or flats, at their own expense, or agreed to be themselves responsible for the payment of the water rates in respect of the premises instead of the occupiers. I ought to say that these premises are each of greater annual value than £10, and, therefore, the water rate under the Acts is payable by the occupiers and not chargeable to the owners. On May 11, 1927, a formal tender of one quarter's water rate in advance for each of the said dwellings or flats, together with a sum sufficient to meet the balance of the plaintiffs' costs of cutting off and reconnecting the water supply to the said premises, was made to the plaintiff company on behalf of the defendant Calder, the defendant Robertson having already paid his share, and a formal demand was made on their behalf for a supply of water to the said premises on the same date, but the plaintiffs refused to reconnect the said communication pipe to the main or to give the defendants Calder and Robertson a supply of water for the premises, on the grounds which have now to be considered.

They issued their writ, and in the writ and in the special case, their contentions and claims are set out in this way. I think I must read them. They claim, in effect, the following declarations : " (1) That each of the said two separate dwellings or flats is a separate house within the meaning of section 36 of the Sunderland and South Shields Water Act, 1921, and that the said premises comprise two houses within the meaning of the said section. (2) That the persons who under section 53 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, are entitled to demand a supply of water from the plaintiff company are only entitled to receive such supply subject to the provisions of the said section 36 of the Sunderland and South Shields Water Act, 1921. (3) That the defendants Calder and Robertson in the circumstances of the case are not entitled to have the said common communication pipe reconnected to the plaintiffs' said main. (4) That the plaintiff company are entitled to cut off the supply of water to the said premises by means of the said common communication pipe if and when either of the said tenants fails to pay his water rate." The plaintiff company's right to these declarations is contested by the defendants, and I must now consider what the result of these respective contentions is.

The section which I primarily have to consider is section 36 of the Sunderland and South Shields Water Act, 1921, which is in these terms : " The company shall not be bound to supply more than one house by means of the same communication pipe and they may if they think fit require that a separate pipe be laid from the main into each house supplied by them with water." The question, therefore, which I have to determine is whether these premises, Nos. 254 and 256, South Palmerston-street, being such as I have described, constitute for the purposes of the Act one house with two parts separately occupied, or whether they constitute two houses within the meaning of the section.

It will be convenient to refer to some other sections of the Acts under which the plaintiff company carry on their undertaking. The principal Act of the company is the Sunderland and South Shields Waterworks Act of 1852. That Act incorporates, with an immaterial qualification, the Waterworks Clauses Act of 1847. By section 60 of this principal Act it is provided that " the company shall, at the request of the owner and occupier, furnish to every occupier of a private dwelling-house or part of a dwelling-house within the limits of this Act in any street or place near to which any service pipe of the company shall be laid, a sufficient supply of water for the domestic uses of every such occupier," at certain rates ; and section 62 deals with the supply of water to water-closets.

Certain sections of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, have been referred to. Section 43 imposes penalties on the plaintiff company for failing to furnish a supply of water to any owner or occupier entitled under the Acts to receive a supply of water, subject to the corresponding obligations on the part of such owner or occupier. Section 48 deals with communication pipes, and it provides that any owner or occupier of any dwelling-house or part of a dwelling-house within the limits of the Special Act who shall wish to have water from the waterworks brought into his premises and who shall have fulfilled the obligations resting upon him, may, by taking the appropriate steps, obtain communication with the pipes of the plaintiff company ; and the sections which follow contain provisions for giving effect to that right. Section 53 provides that every owner and occupier of any dwelling-house or part of a dwelling-house within the limits of the Special Act, shall, when he has laid such communication pipes as are dealt with in the previous sections, and has paid or tendered the water rate payable in respect thereof, according to the provisions of the Acts, be entitled to demand and receive from the undertakers a sufficient supply of water for his domestic purposes. Section 69 provides that, when several houses or parts of houses in the separate occupation of several persons are supplied by one common pipe, the several owners or occupiers of such houses or parts of houses shall be liable to payments at the same rates for the supply of water as they would have been liable to if each of such several houses or parts of houses had been supplied with water from the works of the undertakers by a separate pipe. Then there are further provisions with respect to the recovery and payment of water rate, but I need not further refer to them.

One other section of the plaintiff company's system of Acts, however, I think I ought to mention ; that is section 30 of the Sunderland and South Shields Water Act, 1868, which provides : " All water rates or sums due to the company, and all damages, costs, and expenses by this or the company's former Acts, or any Act incorporated therewith, directed to be paid, and the amount whereof shall not be disputed, may be levied by distress, and any justice on application may issue his warrant accordingly after the defaulter has been duly summoned." That is a right of distress ; but there is a further right which is very material to this case, and which is set out in section 74 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847. That entitles the plaintiff company, on neglect or failure of the persons supplied to pay the water rate, to stop the water from flowing into the premises in respect of which such rate is payable, by cutting off the pipe to such premises and, in addition, gives them the right of recovering the expenses of so doing. That is a right, obviously, of very great importance in addition to the right of distress, because it enables the plaintiff company to withhold a supply of water from occupiers who have failed to pay the water rate, and in such a case, when the water has been cut off by disconnecting the pipe, the plaintiff company are not bound to restore the communication and restore the flow of water except on being paid the arrears and the other expenses which are due to them.

That being the general position apart from section 36 of the Act of 1921, I have now to consider whether the plaintiff company are justified in the contention which they are setting up, and which in effect is a contention that the premises in question constitute more than one house, in fact, two separate houses within the meaning of section 36, and that they are not bound to supply any water to these premises except on the basis that they are separate houses and with a separate communication pipe to each house. I have been referred to certain cases and to certain statutes which it has been suggested throw some light upon the decision of this question; but in my judgment the guidance which these cases give, or these other statutes give, is somewhat remote. The word "house," it is said, is an ambiguous word. It is perfectly true that in different contexts it admits of several different meanings; that, however, does not make the term ambiguous. A term is not ambiguous merely because it requires careful consideration and some investigation to know what is its true meaning in any particular connection. In this particular case what I have to determine is the meaning of the word "house" in this section, having regard to the purposes of the section and the other phrases and expressions in which the term is used in other parts of the Acts of the plaintiff company.

I adopt, as the method by which I have to approach this question, the language of Lord Halsbury in the case of Grant v. Langston (16 The Times L.R., 415; [1900] A.C., 383, at p. 390), where he says, with reference to the word "house": "The word is no longer the expression of a simple idea; but to ascertain its meaning one must understand the subject-matter with respect to which it is used in order to arrive at the sense in which it is employed in a statute." To the same effect, Sir George Jessel, M.R., in the case of Attorney-General v. Mutual Tontine Westminster Chambers Association, Limited (1 Ex. D., 469, at p. 476), said this, also with reference to the meaning of the word "house": "Now the line of argument adopted on the part of the appellants was this: It was said that the Court in construing other legal instruments, other Acts of Parliament, directed to a different subject-matter and with another context, had come to the conclusion that a portion of what in ordinary language is a house—a set of apartments in a house, or a room or two in a house—might properly come within the description 'house' as used in those other legal instruments or Acts of Parliament. That argument seems to me inadmissible, because it is attempting to construe the instrument in question, not, as we ought to do, by reference to its own meaning and contents as a whole, but by reference to other instruments and other Acts of Parliament to which it has no relation." Bearing these statements of principle in mind, I have to ask myself, What is the meaning to be attached to the word "house" in the Acts of this water company? Now the subject-matter of these Acts is the supply of water, and I have to ask myself whether, taking the premises as they are, and as they have been described, they constitute for the purposes of water supply one single unitary system which can only be fed by one single communication pipe, or whether they can be split up and divided into two separate and distinct premises each of which can be called a house and each of which can be the subject of a separate and distinct water supply by means of a separate pipe. It was contended for the plaintiffs that I ought to hold that each flat was a separate house, on the ground that each flat was divided from the other flat completely, though horizontally, and was entered and left by separate modes of entrance and egress, and was as much a self-contained whole as if the two flats instead of being superimposed were built side by side; and that each had its own water supply—namely, in the scullery—and that each such water supply was capable of being made the subject of a separate communication pipe and ought so to be made under section 36 of the Act. If these were all the relevant considerations I would be well disposed to accept these contentions; but these arguments ignore what is an essential and integral part of the problem—namely, the fact that the premises enjoyed by each tenant were not limited to the two separate flats, each of which is enjoyed by one of the tenants, but that the premises also included the common yard with its common mode of egress into the back street; the washhouse, which required a separate supply of water and had a separate supply of water provided for it from the adjacent common pipe; the w.c., which was enjoyed in common and, again, had a separate water supply; and, in addition, the whole area of the yard, which is a necessary appurtenance of the premises. Having regard to these considerations I find it impossible to divide the tenements (if I may so call them) into separate, distinct, and self-contained portions, each the subject of a separate water supply. The yard, the washhouse, the common tap, the w.c. are all essential parts of the tenements enjoyed. They are held in common, but they are necessary, according to the ordinary requirements of life in such a dwelling, for domestic purposes and for the reasonable and necessary enjoyment of the premises which are the subject of the occupation. It would be impossible to cut off the water supply of one tenement without cutting off the water supply of the other; and that would be so, even though there was a separate communication pipe from the main to each flat, because each occupier would still be entitled under the plaintiff company's Acts to the use of water for the ordinary domestic purposes which are involved in the use of the washhouse and the w.c. In those circumstances I am quite unable to find that there are here two separate and distinct houses for the purpose of the plaintiff company's Acts.

I have been referred to part of a section in the Public Health Act, 1875, as supporting the contention that the presence of the common w.c. was not material and did not affect the decision of the question whether the two flats were separate and distinct houses; that is the proviso to section 36 of the Public Health Act, 1875, which is in these terms: "Provided that where a water-closet, earth-closet, or privy has been and is used in common by the inmates of two or more houses, or if in the opinion of the local authority a water-closet, earth-closet, or privy may be so used, they need not require the same to be provided for each house." That, no doubt, recognizes the fact that the existence of a common water-closet may not turn two separate houses into one house, and that is perfectly true under the Public Health Act, 1875. But the Public Health Act, 1875, is merely concerned with sanitation and questions relating to sanitation, and throws no light, in my judgment, on the problem which has to be construed with reference to the supply of water under the Acts of this company.

I ought, perhaps, to refer to some of the cases which have been cited to me. I shall only refer to four. I have already referred to the case of Grant v. Langston (supra), where it was held under the Inhabited House Duty Acts, that a building of two storeys under one roof, the ground floor of which was occupied as a licensed publichouse and the upper storey of which was occupied by the licensee as his dwelling-house, constituted for the purposes of those Acts two houses and not one, the two premises being entirely separated and horizontally divided; but, quite apart from the fact that the Acts there were different in character, it is noticeable that Lord Halsbury expressly points out, as regards these premises, that as between the two flats there was nothing which was held in common; the one structure was superimposed upon the other, and that was all. As I have pointed out, there is much more, there is a most essential part of the accommodation held in common in the present case.

The case which I have already referred to, Attorney-General v. Mutual Tontine Westminster Chambers Association, Limited (supra), was also a case under the Inhabited House Duty Acts, and it was there held that a block of flats with a common staircase and certain other common conveniences was only one house for the purposes of those Acts, and that case would, so far as it is relevant at all, appear rather to support the conclusion at which I have arrived on the construction of the Acts before me.

There are two other cases which have been cited, both of which refer to the construction of restrictive covenants on the sale of land for building purposes. The earlier one is the case of Kimber v. Admans (16 The Times L.R., 207; [1900] 1 Ch., 412). That was a decision of the Court of Appeal. It was there held that "a building containing several residential flats constitutes only one house within the meaning of the word 'house' in a covenant not to erect more than a certain number of houses, unless there is some context which cuts down or alters the popular interpretation of the word." Lord Lindley, M.R., in that case said this: "The house is the whole amalgamation. We know, of course, that a portion of a house may for some purposes, such, for example, as rating and franchise, be a house; but when the word is used in connection with a covenant of this description, I cannot agree that that is the meaning. It applies, not to the interior portions of the building, but to the whole building." That illustrates how the same word in a different context may receive, and necessarily receive, a different meaning. There was one other case referred to; that is the case of Ilford Park Estates, Limited v. Jacobs (19 The Times L.R., 574; [1903] 2 Ch., 522), which also is a case of a covenant relating to building. It was there held, under somewhat different language and in different circumstances, that where there was a building structurally divided into two tenements on different floors, with no internal communication, common staircase, or common front door, each was a house within the meaning of a covenant not to erect more than one house on the site. The facts were that the tenements were quite distinct and complete in themselves and had no communication with each other. That was held to be a case of two houses; but, there again, the difference in the facts as compared with the facts which I have before me, must, I think, be the ratio decidendi, and that would go to support, to some extent, the conclusion at which I have arrived. But I do not attach any great importance to any of these authorities, and still less to certain other Acts to which I have been referred, because, as I have already said, my problem is to construe the word "house" in this Act and in this context.

The conclusion at which I have arrived is that the premises, Nos. 254 and 256, Palmerston-street, constitute one house for the purposes of the plaintiff company's Acts, and that the tenants are not occupiers of two separate houses but are, within the meaning of the Acts before me, the occupiers of parts of a dwelling-house. That being so, it follows that the plaintiff company's contentions are, in my judgment, ill-founded. I therefore refuse each one of the four declarations which are asked for. I need say no more about declarations 1, 2, and 3; as to declaration No. 4, I will only say this, that if I am right in concluding that each of the tenants is the occupier of part of a dwelling-house, then each tenant has his own separate right, under the sections of the Acts to which I have referred, to a separate supply of water, so long as he fulfils the conditions imposed upon him by the Acts, and that right cannot be affected, in my judgment, by the fact that the tenant of the other part of the dwelling-house has made default. I therefore refuse all four declarations, and I give judgment for the defendants with costs.

ASHBY-DE-LA-ZOUCH GUARDIANS v. SUMMERS AND ANOTHER.*

Poor Law—Relief granted by way of loan—Time for recovery—"Complaint"—Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834 (4 and 5 Will. IV., c. 76), s. 59—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848 (11 and 12 Vict., c. 43), s. 11.

An application for an order under s. 59 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, that an employer should pay to the poor law guardians wages due to a man to whom the guardians have granted relief by way of loan is a "complaint" within the meaning of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848. Such a loan does not become due and payable until application for repayment is made to the person relieved, and therefore the period of six months limited by s. 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, does not begin to run till the date of such application. Quaere whether it begins to run till there is actually an employer against whom an order can be made.

This was a case stated by justices of Leicestershire.

An application and information was preferred, under section 59 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, by Willie Samuel Bacon, relieving officer, on behalf of the appellants, the Ashby-de-la-Zouch Guardians, against the respondents, Harry Summers, a miner, and the Measham Collieries, Limited, to show cause why any wages then due or which might from time to time become due from the Measham Collieries, Limited, to Harry Summers, a poor person chargeable to the Ashby-de-la-Zouch Union, should not be paid over, in whole or in part, to the guardians in payment and discharge of £5 0s. 6d., being the cost price of the relief given by way of loan to

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Harry Summers in the form of orders on tradesmen for food and necessaries.

The relief was given to Harry Summers during the coal strike of 1926. On various dates between June 5 and October 16, 1926, Harry Summers obtained relief on loan from the guardians to a total amount of £5 3s. 6d., and on each occasion he signed a document acknowledging that the relief was by way of loan. He had repaid 3s. by three instalments of 1s., on May 30, July 5, and July 9, 1927, leaving a balance of £5 0s. 6d. due.

The appellants, on February 10, 1927, made application in writing for repayment, and thereafter their collector made frequent calls on Harry Summers, but was not successful in obtaining any further sum. On June 4, 1927, the appellants passed a resolution instructing their relieving officer to begin proceedings in respect of the repayment. On August 6, 1927, applications for summonses against the respondents and 14 others were granted, and summonses were issued on the same day. On the hearing of the summonses on August 20, 1927, the justices dismissed them, on the ground that they had no jurisdiction to deal with the cases inasmuch as the proceedings were not begun within six months from the date on which the last instalment of the loan was advanced.

Section 58 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, provides for the giving of relief by way of loan, and section 59 states :—

"In all cases where any relief shall have been given by way of loan, or where any relief, or the cost price thereof, shall be treated as a loan . . . it shall be lawful for any justice, upon the application of the overseers or guardians of the parish or union providing such relief, and upon proof of the same having been given to or on account of any such person . . . and of the same, or any part thereof, still remaining due, to issue a summons, requiring such person, as well as the master or employer of such person, or some person on his behalf, to appear before any two justices, at a time and place to be named in such summons, to show cause why any wages due, or which may from time to time become due, from such master or employer, should not be paid over, in whole or in part, to such overseers or guardians. . . ." [The section then provides for the making of orders on the employer to pay over the whole or part of the employee's wages to the overseers or guardians, and also for proceedings for the recovery of any amount ordered to be paid from an employer neglecting or refusing to pay it.]

By section 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848 :—

"In all cases where no time is already or shall hereafter be specially limited for making any such complaint or laying any such information in the Act or Acts of Parliament relating to each particular case, such complaint shall be made and such information shall be laid within six calendar months from the time when the matter of such complaint or information respectively arose."

The following cases were referred to before the justices :—Labalmondiere v. Addison (22 J.P., 767), Grece v. Hunt (2 Q.B.D., 389), and Harpin v. Sykes (1 The Times L.R., 307).

Mr. Maurice Healy appeared for the appellants ; Mr. D. F. Brundrit for the respondents Measham Collieries, Limited. The respondent Summers was not represented.

The Lord Chief Justice.—At a Court of summary jurisdiction what was called, and deliberately called, an "application and information" was laid by the present appellants. His Lordship read it, and continued :—It was dismissed, evidently on the ground that the justices were of opinion that they had no jurisdiction to entertain it by reason of section 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, and the question for the Court is whether the justices were right in that view. That question really involves two questions :—(1) Is it true to say that this application was a "complaint" within the Summary Jurisdiction Acts ? (2) If it was a "complaint," were these proceedings begun within the statutory period ? After reading the facts set out in the case, his Lordship said : The appellants made application for repayment earlier than the earliest of the three repayments. It is clear, therefore, that if the period of six months applies, and if the time runs, as the form of the application suggests, from the day on which the last advance was made, then the time had expired, but if the time runs from the demand in writing, then the application was in time.

As to the question whether the application was truly to be described as a "complaint," in my opinion it was for the reasons given in In re Dillon (11 Ir. C.L.R., 232). A person seeking to recover money under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts is a person making a "complaint," just as a person seeking to recover money in the civil Courts is a "plaintiff," and in the County Court begins his proceedings with a document called a "plaint."

It is necessary, then, that proceedings should be begun within six months after the matter of complaint arose. When did the matter of this complaint arise ? Section 58 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, provided that such relief as the Poor Law Commissioners might direct should be given by way of loan ; and the current rules and regulations are to be found in Article 13 of the Relief Regulation Order, 1911 (S.R. and O., 1911, No. 1295). This particular relief was so given, and for each instalment Summers gave a receipt.

When was the loan to be repaid ? Ex hypothesi, these are loans given to impoverished persons for the very reason that they are impoverished, because in the opinion of the guardians they are unable to provide themselves and their dependants with the necessaries of life. Nothing is said in the statute as to the time of repayment. Section 59 provides for the recovery from the master by the guardians of sums "still remaining due." That section, in various parts of it, assumes that when the machinery is turned to account there is money due and unpaid, but it throws no light on the question when it becomes due and begins to remain unpaid.

It seems repugnant to reason to hold that because the statute is silent the money is instantly repayable ; and that the poor person receiving "in meal or in malt" the necessaries of life is instantly liable to repay each instalment. I am quite unable to follow the argument that it becomes repayable on the date of the last instalment. The true contest is whether the money is payable immediately or after the full amount is ascertained and application for payment made.

Some light is to be derived from the case of Labalmondiere v. Addison (22 J.P., 767), though it was a decision under a very different statute. When one compares and contrasts the circumstances of that statute with the statute in question in the present case, the language of that case is applicable a fortiori to the present case. If that be so, the proceedings were in time. For those reasons, I think that the justices have misdirected themselves and the appeal should be allowed.

MR. JUSTICE SALTER.—I agree, and desire to add one word only on the second point—when the subject-matter of the complaint arose. I think it arose as soon as the complainant had a cause of action—i.e., as soon as he could, by proving the necessary facts, establish his legal right to the relief claimed. In another case it may be necessary to determine whether the right arises when the demand is made, or not until there is an employer against whom an order can be made.

MR. JUSTICE ROCHE.—I agree, and have two observations to add. First, I think the application is, or involves, a complaint. Secondly, it is an application for a summons for two persons to appear and show cause why the employer should not pay the wages direct to the guardians. For myself, I think that the right does not arise until there is a master or employer in existence. But for the purpose of this case it is enough to say that by necessary implication it does not arise until a demand for repayment is made.

THE ROYAL STAR.*

Ship—Shipping casualty—Court of Inquiry in British Possession—Shipmaster censured—Appeal—Allowance of appeal—Costs—Shipping Casualties and Appeals and Re-hearings Rules, 1923, r. 20 (i).

In allowing an appeal by a shipmaster from the finding of a Court of Inquiry at Singapore that he had been guilty of negligence causing the stranding of his ship the Divisional Court refused to make an order against the Board of Trade for the costs of the appeal but granted to the appellant an order against the Board for the costs of a previous argument of the question whether he had a right of appeal.

This was an appeal by Mr. John MacLeod, master of the Blue Star liner Royal Star, from the finding of a Court of Formal Investigation held at Singapore on January 25 and 26, 1927, to inquire into the stranding of the Royal Star in the Straits of Singapore on January 13, 1927. That Court had found the appellant guilty of negligence causing the disaster, and, while not deeming it necessary to deal with the master's certificate, had severely censured him.

Mr. C. R. DUNLOP, K.C. (with him, Mr. R. F. HAYWARD), appeared for the appellant, and said that the Singapore Court had found that the casualty, which resulted in very serious damage to the Royal Star, was caused by the negligence of the master in omitting to satisfy himself personally that his charts were up to date, in neglecting to read the instructions of the Malacca Strait Pilot, 1924, and in neglecting to have any bearings taken or the position of the vessel fixed between 6.14 a.m. and 9.5 a.m. He submitted that the casualty was not caused by those alleged acts or defaults, that the master was not guilty of negligence or professional misconduct in not doing what the tribunal had found that he did not do, and that, in any event, the alleged omissions did not justify the severe censure passed on the appellant.

It was clear from the annex to the report of the Court that they accepted the evidence from the ship as to her position at the material times, and also as to the course steered and bearings taken. It was, therefore, inaccurate to state that no bearings were taken between 6.14 a.m. and 9.5 a.m., because the third officer took a bearing at 7 a.m. As stated in their finding, the Court were unable to determine whether the obstruction encountered by the Royal Star was a rock known as the "two fathoms mark" (which was discovered in 1923, and was shown on the latest Admiralty charts, but was not marked on the chart carried by the Royal Star), or was some other still uncharted rock or reef in the vicinity. It was clear, however, from the fact that the damage was all on the starboard side of the ship's bottom, and at a part where she had a draft of more than 27ft. 6in., that she could not have stranded at the two fathoms mark.

That was also clear from the evidence of the position of the ship, because on the courses and bearings accepted by the Court below she must have passed to the northward of Batu Beranti Light, and well clear of either the two fathoms or five fathoms shoals marked on the latest charts.

As to the findings of the Court below with regard to charts and sailing directions, the master, before the ship began her voyage from Liverpool, had taken all proper steps to have his charts corrected up to date. He had also read the sailing directions in the Malacca Strait Pilot. The alleged omissions on which the Court below had based its findings were, however, quite immaterial, because, as the master had plainly stated, even if he had been aware of the submerged rock at the two fathoms mark, or even if he had read and re-read the sailing directions, he would still have steered the course he did steer, which was a course that would take him clear of all danger from the rock, and one with which the Court below did not find fault.

The advice given in the sailing directions to keep to the north of the Straits on account of tidal streams, eddies, and overfalls was intended for sailing vessels, and not for steamships of the size and power of the Royal Star.

Mr. ALFRED T. BUCKNILL, for the Board of Trade, pointed out that the inquiry into the stranding of the Royal Star was ordered by the Governor of the Straits Settlements, and not by the Board of Trade. The Board were, therefore, quite impartial. It was no business of the Board to inquire whether the censure on this master was justified or not. The broad question on the appeal was whether the master of the Royal Star was negligent in so navigating his ship as to pass so near to Batu Beranti Light. The latest Admiralty chart showed that at the position given by the master soundings gave a depth of 34 to 60 fathoms. If in the midst of such very deep soundings there existed an uncharted rock it was surprising that the Admiralty had not yet located it.

The PRESIDENT, in giving judgment, said that the question for decision lay in a narrow compass. It was whether, accepting, as the Court below had done, the evidence from the ship as to the things which were done, it was negligent navigation or bad seamanship on the part of the appellant to take and maintain the course which he had taken and maintained. Having discussed the matter with the Elder Brethren, he ventured to suggest to masters and officers navigating in those Straits that they would find more safety in taking a course more to the northward of the channel, but that was not the question now before the Court. The findings of the tribunal below amounted to a finding that the course set and maintained by the appellant was not negligent and improper, and that finding could not be disturbed. As to the three grounds on which the appellant had been held negligent, they could not be upheld, and, therefore, the appeal must be allowed.

MR. JUSTICE HILL, in concurring, said that however desirable it might be for navigators in the future, in the light of the present case, to steer a more northerly course, that was a very different thing from censuring the appellant in the light of knowledge gained after the event.

Mr. DUNLOP asked that the motion should be allowed with costs. He contended that the Court had power to allow costs against the Board of Trade under rule 20 (i) of the Shipping Casualties and Appeals and Re-hearings Rules, 1923. He also relied on The Famenoth (7 P.D., 207) ; and The Chelston (36 The Times L.R., 688 ; [1920] P., 400).

Mr. BUCKNILL said that the question of costs was discussed at length in 1902 in the unreported case of The Grecian, where a master who successfully appealed against the suspension of his certificate had been refused costs.

The PRESIDENT.—I am glad that this matter has been discussed. I think that on principle the appellant is entitled to the costs of the previous argument on December 9 last to determine his right to appeal (44 The Times L.R., 163), but I do not think that it would be proper in this case to make any order against the Board of Trade for payment of the costs of this motion. The Board of Trade did not order the inquiry at Singapore. There is no litigation between the Board and the appellant, and the Board merely appears now in discharge of a public duty. There will, therefore, be no costs of this motion.

IN RE APPLICATION OF CRANBUX, LIMITED.

IN RE APPLICATION OF LINGNER-WERKE AKTIENGESELLSCHAFT.*

Trade Marks — Assignment — Registration — Goodwill — Territorial limits — Refusal to register — Trade Marks Act, 1905 (5 Edw. VII., c. 15), ss. 22, 33, 35.

If the Registrar of Trade Marks can satisfy himself that on the true construction of a document it appears to be, within the meaning of s. 22 of the Trade Marks Act, 1905, an assignment of trade marks in connexion with the goodwill, within the territorial limits to which the Act extends, of the business concerned in the goods for which the trade marks have been registered, he will adequately discharge his function under s. 33 of the Act and must register the assignees as proprietors.

These were motions by the applicants, Cranbux, Limited, and Lingner-Werke Aktiengesellschaft, appealing from a decision of the Deputy Registrar of Trade Marks, who refused to register Cranbux, Limited, as the proprietors of the "Odol" trade marks under an assignment from Lingner-Werke Aktiengesellschaft (hereinafter referred to as "the German company").

In May, 1927, the managing director of the German company came to this country and concluded an agreement between his company and Coleman and Co., which provided that Coleman and Co. should form a subsidiary company with a capital of £50,000. When formed that company were to take over and adopt the agreement with Coleman and Co., and the agreement provided that on the shares in the new company being subscribed to the amount of 2s. per share the German company should give them the secrets and receipts of manufacture. All these things were done. The new company, known as Cranbux, Limited, were incorporated on October 11, 1927, and on October 15, 1927, they entered into an agreement adopting the original agreement with Coleman and Co., and on October 17, 1927, the German company executed an assignment of their trade marks in England to Cranbux, Limited.

The assignment of the trade marks was lodged with the Registrar of Trade Marks for registration. The Deputy-Registrar in a reserved judgment refused the application by the assignees for the registration of the trade marks in their name on the ground that the public would be prevented in future from buying "Odol" made abroad and imported into this country, which it could not at that moment be prevented from doing.

The German company had many subsidiary companies operating in different European countries.

Sir Duncan Kerly, K.C., and Mr. J. H. Evans-Jackson appeared for the applicants, Cranbux, Limited ; Mr. James Whitehead, K.C., and Mr. Donald Cohen for the applicants, Lingner-Werke Aktiengesellschaft ; and Mr. Stafford Crossman for the Registrar of Trade Marks.

MR. JUSTICE CLAUSON.—The first of these matters is a motion by Cranbux, Limited, by way of appeal under section 33 of the Trade Marks Act, 1905, as amended by section 11 of the Trade Marks Act, 1919, from a decision of the Deputy Registrar refusing to register the applicants as proprietors of certain trade marks. The present registered owner of the trade marks may for the moment be treated as being Lingner-Werke Aktiengesellschaft. The second matter is a motion by Lingner-Werke Aktiengesellschaft under section 35 of the Act of 1905 asking in effect that Cranbux, Limited, be substituted for the applicants as proprietors of the trade marks. In my view a question whether an assignment from the existing proprietor is one which gives a good title to an applicant for registration ought normally to be raised by way of appeal from the Registrar's decision under section 33, and ought not to be raised by an application by the assignor under section 35. However, in the present case, I need not go into this point further. The applicants will in each case have to bear the Registrar's costs, and the order for payment of those costs will be the only order on the second motion.

On the first motion the question for determination arises on an indenture of October 17, 1927, by which the existing proprietors of the trade marks, whom I will call the assignors, assigned to the applicants, whom I will call the assignees, the goodwill of the assignors in, among other countries, Great Britain, in connexion with the assignors' business as proprietors and manufacturers of and dealers in a dentifrice known as "Odol," and other articles and preparations of a proprietary nature, together with the trade marks now in question, which are registered in respect of the appropriate classes of goods. The question is whether, within the meaning of section 22 of the Trade Marks Act, 1905, the document in fact, as well as in terms, assigns the trade marks in connexion with the goodwill of the business concerned in the goods for which the trade marks have been registered.

On the face of it there can, as it seems to me, be no question that the assignment is good and effective within the Act. It must be borne in mind that the Act operates within certain territorial limits, being the limits to which it is expressly or impliedly confined by the Legislature. It operates so as to give the registered proprietor under section 41 of the Trade Marks Act, 1905, the exclusive right to use the trade mark within those territorial limits, as to which it is material only to say that Great Britain is, of course, included. The Act makes it essential, by section 22, that the trade marks should be assigned only in connexion with the goodwill of the business concerned in the goods for which it has been registered, but goodwill in this section must mean goodwill within the territorial limits to which the Act extends; the Act is in no way concerned with goodwill outside those limits. It is such goodwill which is assigned by the document now in question. The existence of a goodwill within Great Britain is, of course, perfectly consistent with the possibility of the owner of the business having no place of business within Great Britain.

The difficulty which the Deputy Registrar felt in the matter was this. He ascertained that the goods in question have hitherto, or at all events recently, been manufactured abroad, and he felt doubts as to whether the assignment might not involve some alteration in the business as heretofore carried on, which would jeopardize the identity between the goodwill heretofore enjoyed in England by the assignors and the goodwill to which the assignees have become entitled by the assignment. The facts raising these doubts seem to have been ascertained by the Deputy Registrar partly from information volunteered by the assignees and partly from information which had been communicated to the Registrar or his predecessor in connexion with an earlier application by a third party for registration of a trade mark somewhat similar to the main trade mark now in question, an application which had failed. I do not propose to consider whether these doubts were or were not well founded. Neither the Registrar nor this Court seems to me, for the purpose of the matter now in hand, to have any concern with these suggested facts nor indeed to have any evidence of them upon which they can rely. The Registrar is bound, under section 33, in investigating the title of the assignee, to satisfy himself that as between the assignor and the assignee (who are, of course, bound by the document of assignment) there is on the true construction of the document an assignment of the trade marks in question in connexion with the goodwill, within the territorial limits to which the Act extends, of the business concerned in the goods for which the trade marks are registered; but the Registrar will, in my opinion, adequately discharge his function under section 33 if he satisfies himself that this appears to be so on the true construction of the document which binds the assignor and the assignee. It may be (as was found ultimately to be the position in regard to the trade mark which was the subject-matter of the proceedings in Lacteosote, Limited v. Alberman, 43 The Times L.R., 336; [1927] 2 Ch., 117) that an assignment which is on its true construction effective as between assignor and assignee will turn out when the true facts are ascertained (and they are not likely to be fully ascertained except in proceedings brought by some third party) to have the indirect or even the direct result of destroying the trade mark by causing it to become deceptive. It does not appear to me that in the present case the Deputy Registrar had before him, or that this Court has before it, any evidence which either binds or enables him or this Court to go behind the terms of the assignment. If there are any facts which will enable the case to be made out that the result of the assignment has been or will be to destroy the trade mark, the registration of the assignees as proprietors under section 33 will not prevent these facts from being brought out in the proper manner in proceedings by an aggrieved party.

I am thus of opinion that the Deputy Registrar ought to have accepted the assignment as sufficient in respect of the trade marks of which the Lingner-Werke Aktiengesellschaft are proprietors. One of the trade marks is apparently registered in some other name, and it remains for the Deputy Registrar to be satisfied in regard to the title to that trade mark.

It seems to me that a convenient order to make will be an order reciting that the Court is of opinion that as between Cranbux, Limited, and the Lingner-Werke Aktiengesellschaft the document of October 17, 1927, is a valid and effective assignment, within section 22 of the Act, of the trade marks expressed to be thereby assigned, and directing that the matter be referred back to the Deputy Registrar for further hearing, and ordering Cranbux, Limited, to pay the Registrar's costs of their motion. On the second motion there will be no order except that the applicants pay the Registrar's costs.

INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. COUNTESS OF LONGFORD.

INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. PAKENHAM AND OTHERS.*

Revenue — Supertax — Infant — Liability of trustees and guardian to make supertax returns — Representative assessments — Income Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict., c. 35), s. 41—Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910 (10 Edw. VII., c. 8), ss. 66, 72—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), s. 7; All Schedules Rules, rule 4.

Representative assessments to supertax cannot be made upon the trustees or the guardian of an infant beneficiary, either in respect of the actual total income of the infant, or in respect of a total income limited, as regards the particular trustees or guardian, to that income with which the trust or guardianship is concerned.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (43 The Times L.R., 835; [1928] 1 K.B., 118) affirmed.

These were appeals from orders of the Court of Appeal (43 The Times L.R., 835; [1928] 1 K.B.,

* Reported by H. B. Hemming, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

118) affirming orders of Mr. Justice Rowlatt (43 The Times L.R., 157 ; [1927] 1 K.B., 594) upon cases stated by the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts.

The question for determination was whether an infant whose income was admittedly liable to supertax could be assessed to that tax (a) in the name of his guardian or (b) in the names of his trustees. This question depended primarily upon whether upon the true construction of section 72 of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, the provisions of section 41 of the Income Tax Act, 1842, were thereby made applicable to the collection and assessment of supertax so as to enable persons under disability (including infants and lunatics) to be assessed in the names of persons representing them, such as guardians, trustees, or committees.

The Earl of Longford was born on December 29, 1902. During the minority of the Earl the Commissioners made assessments for supertax in respect of his total income in three different forms for different years : (a) on the Countess of Longford, the guardian of the Earl, which assessment was the subject of the first appeal, (b) on the trustees of one of the settlements producing income to the Earl, which assessment was the subject of the second appeal, and (c) on the Earl directly, as to which there was no appeal. On the death of the Earl's father in August, 1915, the Earl became legal tenant in tail of the property comprised in a settlement dated August 22, 1899. The respondents in the second appeal were the trustees of this settlement.

The settled property consisted in part of realty in Ireland and in part of personalty held as capital moneys.

After the Earl had become entitled to the settled property the trustees of the settlement (the respondents in the second appeal) paid yearly during the minority of the Earl a sum of £2,500 for his maintenance and education, such payment being made to his mother, the Countess of Longford, the respondent in the first appeal, as his guardian.

Following on her failure to comply with a request to make a return of the total income of the Earl for the year ending April 5, 1917, the Special Commissioners assessed her as the guardian of the Earl to supertax for that year in the sum of £12,000.

On an appeal against that assessment, the Special Commissioners held that the Countess was not liable to be assessed to supertax in respect of any income of the Earl which did not pass through her hands and, it being agreed that the income so passing was below the limit of total income upon which supertax was then payable, the Special Commissioners discharged the assessment.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt affirmed the decision of the Special Commissioners and his decision was unanimously affirmed by the Court of Appeal (the Master of the Rolls, Lord Justice Scrutton, and Lord Justice Sargant).

On the death on January 22, 1918, of Selina Dowager Countess of Longford, the Earl also became legal tenant in tail of the property comprised in a settlement dated November 8, 1862. This property consisted of land in Bedfordshire. The trustees of this settlement were not parties to these proceedings.

After the Earl became entitled to the settled property comprised in this settlement the trustees paid yearly to his guardian during the minority of the Earl a sum of £500 for his maintenance. This was in addition to the yearly payment of £2,500 made by the trustees of the settlement of 1899, the respondents in the second appeal, for the same purpose. The balance of the income under both settlements was accumulated.

Following on notices to make returns of the income of the Earl from all sources for supertax purposes for the years ending April 5, 1918, April 5, 1919, and April 5, 1920, the trustees of the settlement of 1899 (the respondents in the second appeal) made returns of the income on the footing that there was to be included therein only the sums paid by the respective trustees of the two settlements for maintenance in the respective previous years. Assessments were made on these respondents on the basis that they were liable to be assessed in respect of the total income of the Earl of Longford for each such previous year, including in respect of the years ending April 5, 1919, and April 5, 1920, the income arising under both settlements, and in the case of all three years the income arising from the settled property whether applied for maintenance or accumulated.

On an appeal against such assessments lodged by these respondents they were content to be assessed to supertax in respect of the amounts included by them in their returns, but otherwise disputed their liability in respect of the supertax upon the Earl's income and contended that they were not liable to assessment. The Special Commissioners decided in favour of the respondents and reduced the assessments accordingly.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt affirmed the decision of the Special Commissioners and his decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal by a majority (the Master of the Rolls and Lord Justice Scrutton, Lord Justice Sargant dissenting).

The Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.), Mr. J. H. Stamp, and Mr. Reginald Hills appeared for the appellants ; Mr. Latter, K.C., and Mr. Andrewes-Uthwatt for the respondents.

Lord Buckmaster.—My Lords : I am of opinion that these appeals must fail, and I had prepared and reduced to writing the reasons that have led me to that conclusion, but since doing so I have had the advantage of reading the judgments of my noble and learned friends Lord Sumner and Lord Warrington, with which I entirely agree ; and there is no need that those judgments should be repeated. The question involved is of no great principle of law ; it is nothing but the construction of clumsy and ill-fitting clauses in Acts of Parliament. When, therefore, the result that has been reached is one in which there is common agreement, there is no need to expatiate upon the process of reasoning which has been used in order that it should be determined. I am therefore of opinion that these appeals should fail and I shall move the House that they be dismissed.

Viscount Sumner.—My Lords : The respondents have all been charged with supertax under General Rule 4 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, or under the words of section 41 of the Income Tax Act, 1842, which enacts that "the trustee, guardian, tutor, curator, or committee of any person, being an infant, or married woman, lunatic, idiot, or insane, and having the direction, control, or management of the property or concern of such infant, married woman, lunatic, idiot, or insane person, . . . shall be chargeable . . . in like manner and to the same amount, as would be charged if such infant were of full age," &c. If this provision of the Income Tax Acts is not applicable to supertax within section 7 of the Act of 1918 or section 72 (6) of Part IV of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, they cannot be charged and the appeals fail.

There are, however, two further respects, in which, as I think, some of the assessments were bad and were rightly discharged. (1) The Countess of Longford, as guardian of the infant Earl, had not the control or management of his property at all. She simply laid out for his benefit such sums as his trustees thought fit to assign for his maintenance and placed in her hands, to be disbursed for them in that behalf, but the money remained vested in them in trust and was subject to their control or management. (2) After an interest in the Bedfordshire estates vested in the Earl in 1918, he was beneficially entitled to the income of two trust properties, the Irish estates, in which his interest had taken effect in 1915, and the Bedfordshire estates, the trustees in each case being different persons, separately assessed. "The management of the property of the infant" means grammatically the management of all the property of the infant, in respect of which the trustees are charged, and these words are part of the description of the persons chargeable. Such really is the position with regard to income-tax. As applied to supertax, charged on a trustee of a part of the whole income, to which the beneficiary is entitled, the matter is otherwise. If persons having the management of some of the property of the infant were intended to be included in this description, the definite article "the" must have been omitted. In connexion with supertax such an intention would have been entirely out of place. The imposition of personal liability for an additional duty of income-tax, levied on the total income of the beneficiary as ascertained by a complete enumeration of all sources subject only to certain authorized deductions, upon a trustee, who held a part only of the beneficiary's entire property and that part possibly only a small one, or a part yielding no income, would be a travesty of rational taxation.

These considerations, however, do not apply to the trustees of the Irish estates before the Earl's interest in the Bedfordshire properties took effect and their case in the earliest years of these assessments must be specially considered. While section 66 of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, defines what supertax is and imposes the charge, it is section 72 that provides by a series of subsections for the mode of assessment and the machinery of collection. Subsections 1 to 5 inclusive deal only with assessment. It is not till subsection 6 is reached that provision is made for charge, collection, and recovery of duty and this is accentuated by the fact that subsection 2 authorizes the requirement of returns from persons (including those who represent incapacitated, non-resident or deceased persons) whether or not they are chargeable with supertax, so that in some of such cases that provision is only for the purpose of obtaining information.

Subsection 6 is framed as an omnibus incorporation of pre-existing provisions upon an indefinitely selective plan: "All provisions of the Income Tax Acts relating to persons who are to be chargeable with duty, assessments, and appeals against those assessments, and to the collection and recovery of duty . . . shall, so far as they are applicable, apply to the charge, assessment, collection, and recovery of duty under this section. . . ."

In deliberately adopting this terse and compressed form of enactment the Legislature was, no doubt, fully alive to the fact that its merits and convenience are attended by some disadvantages. The risk of this had, however, to be run. By using the words "so far as they are applicable," Parliament handed over to others what it might have prescribed itself, and those others were persons who were not legislators but Judges. The income-tax provisions were not made applicable, so that they could be enforced, but were to be enforced only so far as they were applicable. Nothing corresponding to mutatis mutandis or any other labour-saving but indefinite phrase is to be found here. The distinction is material. An administrator might hold a provision to be applicable, which avoids a loss of revenue, even though the taxpayer loses the benefit of the form of the statute, but Judges have to determine the applicability of a regulation by asking how far it is consistent with justice to the subject and with proper construction of the enactment. Accordingly we must not feel constrained to pronounce this section applicable, merely because the contrary construction may involve the use of cumbrous and defective machinery for collecting the tax or even may lead to the escape of some who have quite money enough to pay with.

My Lords, viewed in this way I do not think section 41 is "applicable" to supertax. The application would, I think, make the section read much to the following effect. "The trustee of any infant, whether resident here or abroad, who has the control or management of the chargeable property of that infant, shall himself be chargeable, as the infant would be charged if of age, both as to the extent of his chargeability and as to the manner of enforcing it." Let us see what the effect would be and whether it does or does not pass the bounds of application.

In the case of income-tax the extent of the liability, depending as it does on the various schedules and cases under which the particular part of the property is being assessed, is limited to the income of the property, which is under the trustees' control and is assessable within the particular assessment area. If the trustee returns and pays on that, he is not further chargeable, although the infant may be beneficially interested in other taxable property, over which that trustee has no control at all. The manner in which he is made liable is by the method of local and separate assessments provided for income-tax. Exemptions and deductions are the subject of a separate manner of reclaiming tax already paid, with which the trustee is not, as such, in any way concerned.

In the case of supertax it is far otherwise. The person who is chargeable, whether in a representative capacity for another person or on his own account, has to return the whole of the income, which is subject to supertax, and he has to make the deductions which the Act allows, if there are any, before his return, on which the tax is to be computed, is complete and ready for enforcement of the tax. In the case of a return by a person representing someone else, the supertax, duly computed, is wholly and as a whole chargeable on him. For supertax purposes there is no provision for making piecemeal assessments or for levying the tax in part on one person and in part on another. The person, who is made liable to charge at all, has to bear the entire burden of it.

My Lords, I think this comparison at once shows that, in the case of supertax, charging a trustee "in like manner" as the beneficiary would be charged, if of age, is a totally different scheme of charge from that enacted for income-tax. The case is not one of selecting such parts of the income-tax scheme as are applicable to the scheme of the supertax, and making use of them, but of introducing provisions, which are applicable to supertax and correspond to the income-tax provisions but are not already enacted anywhere. That is not a problem for courts of justice. It involves substituting the words "with suitable modifications" for the words "so far as applicable," and that is not for us to do.

Further, it could be done only to the grave and unjust prejudice of the trustee to be charged. Whatever he may happen to know or be able to ascertain in a particular case, he is not as trustee seized of any information outside the limits of his trust. He does not know that there may not be other trustees of other trust property, or that the infant is not making something here or abroad. Instances of such precocious industry are not uncommon and are sometimes on a considerable scale. The Act has to be read as applicable to all cases falling generally within its words, whether or not in particular, and perhaps numerous, cases the trustee is so circumstanced as to meet with no such difficulties. He cannot know whether he is chargeable or not, or whether he should contest his liability or not, for, so far as he is aware, he may be in control of all the chargeable property of the infant, and, having made the return, he may have to pay on an excessive amount, because in his ignorance he did not make deductions, which ought to have been made, before arriving at the net sum chargeable to supertax. If he refuses to make the return, on the ground that there may be other chargeable property of the infant over which he has no control, he does so at his peril. If he pays, he may be unable to indemnify himself, or may be only able to enforce his rights at the cost of litigation, which at best will leave him with costs to bear himself.

For these reasons, my Lords, I think these assessments were rightly dealt with by the Special Commissioners and the appeals fail. It is not necessary to point out how the infant or other incapacitated person is to be made amenable, though section 72 (2) furnishes the Inland Revenue with means of obtaining extensive information, more than many trustees could get. All that I can say is that I agree with the Court of Appeal in thinking that the argument for the Revenue makes a greater call on the words "so far as applicable" than those words can bear.

I think that it is irrelevant to refer to the cases in which it has been said that sections merely providing a machinery for collection of a charge, imposed in general terms elsewhere, cannot restrict the attachment of the charge, being "in aid and not in derogation of it," Tischler v. Apthorpe (1 The Times L.R., 344 ; 2 Tax Cas., 89) and Werle and Co. v. Colquhoun (4 The Times L.R., 396 ; 20 Q.B.D., 753), because here the express words, "so far as they are applicable," of themselves limit the application of the collection sections for all purposes, and direct an enquiry and a discrimination between those which apply and those which do not. The latter cannot aid the charge of supertax, since they do not apply to it.

My Lords, I am desired to add that in the opinion I have just read to your Lordships my noble and learned friends Lord Wrenbury and Lord Carson concur.

Lord Warrington of Clyffe (read by Lord Buckmaster).—My Lords : These are two appeals raising the question whether an infant can be assessed to supertax in the one case in the name of his guardian and in the other in the name of trustees who have the control and management of certain property to the income of which he is entitled.

The infant (the 6th Earl of Longford) was born on December 29, 1902, and attained the age of 21 years on December 29, 1923. The respondent the Countess of Longford became on the death on August 21, 1915, of the 5th Earl the guardian of his son the infant. The infant on his father's death became entitled as tenant in tail male to certain lands and hereditaments in Ireland and to certain personalty which represented the proceeds of sale of realty under a settlement dated August 22, 1899, of which the respondents in the second appeal are the trustees. The trustees were by the settlement appointed trustees for the purposes of section 42 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881.

Upon the death on January 22, 1918, of his grandmother Selina Dowager Countess of Longford the infant became entitled as tenant in tail male to certain estates in Bedfordshire under a settlement dated November 8, 1862, the trustees whereof are not the same persons as the trustees of the settlement of 1899.

Apparently—though the fact is not expressly stated in either of the two cases hereafter mentioned—the infant was not, until January 22, 1918, entitled to the income of any property other than that comprised in the settlement of 1899.

After the death of the 5th Earl the trustees of the last-mentioned settlement paid yearly during the minority of the infant the sum of £2,500 for his maintenance, the residue of the income under that settlement being accumulated.

For the year ending April 5, 1917, the Special Commissioners of Income Tax made an assessment upon the respondent the Countess as guardian of the infant in a sum of £12,000, being the estimated amount of the total income of the Earl under the settlement of 1899.

On appeal this assessment was discharged, it appearing that the only income passing through the hands of the guardian was the above-mentioned allowance for maintenance, and that this was below the supertax limit.

A case stated by the Special Commissioners for the opinion of the High Court was heard by Mr. Justice Rowlatt on December 20, 1926. The learned Judge dismissed the appeal of the present appellants and confirmed the discharge of the assessment. His judgment was on July 27, 1927, affirmed by the Court of Appeal (Lord Hanworth, M.R., and Lords Justices Scrutton and Sargant).

As regards the appeal in the case of the Countess, it is enough to say that I agree with the judgments in the Court of Appeal and particularly with that of Lord Justice Sargant, and that this appeal should be dismissed with costs. I now turn to the other appeal—that against the trustees of the settlement of 1899.

The years in question in this case are the years of charge ending respectively on April 5, 1918, April 5, 1919, and April 5, 1920. It will be observed that the first of these years was that in which, viz. on January 22, 1918, the infant became entitled to the property comprised in the settlement of 1862, but none of the income of this property accrued to him during the year preceding the year of charge.

Assessments having been made upon the trustees of the settlement of 1899 in respect of the total income of the infant for each of the said three years of charge, the trustees appealed to the Special Commissioners, who, being of opinion that the trustees were not liable to be assessed to supertax, reduced the assessments to certain agreed sums in each of the three years.

A case was stated for the opinion of the High Court and was heard by Mr. Justice Rowlatt, who, on December 20, 1926, made an order confirming that of the Special Commissioners and dismissed the appeal. An appeal to the Court of Appeal was on July 27, 1927, dismissed by a majority (Lord Hanworth, M.R., and Lord Justice Scrutton, Lord Justice Sargant dissenting).

In subsequent years of charge the infant himself, while still a minor, was assessed to supertax, and there was no appeal as to this assessment.

The question turns on the true construction and effect of the provisions as to supertax contained in Part IV. of the Finance (1909-1910) Act, 1910. It is true that in the last year the Act in force was the Income Tax Act, 1918, but the provisions of this Act are practically identical with those previously in force, and it will be convenient to pursue the course adopted in the argument and deal with the old Acts alone. It is, however, necessary to bear in mind that the original limit for supertax has been lowered in amount and the tax itself is charged according to a graduated scale.

By section 66 (1) of the Act of 1910 there is to be charged in respect of the income of any individual the total of which exceeds a fixed sum an additional duty of income-tax (in the Act referred to as a supertax) at the rate of 6d. for every pound of the amount by which the total income exceeds so much.

By subsection (2) "For the purposes of the supertax, the total income of any individual from all sources shall be taken to be the total income of that individual from all sources for the previous year, estimated in the same manner as the total income from all sources is estimated for the purposes of exemptions or abatements under the Income Tax Acts; but," and then there follow directions as to particular deductions applicable only to supertax. Section 72 (2), omitting immaterial words, is as follows: "Every person upon whom notice is served . . . requiring him to make a return of his income from all sources or, in the case of a notice served upon any person who is chargeable with or liable to be assessed to income-tax under section forty-one of the Income Tax Act, 1842, . . . as representing an incapacitated, non-resident, or deceased person, . . . shall, whether he is or is not chargeable with the supertax, make such a return in the form and within the time required by the notice."

In subsection (5) provision is made for an assessment by the Special Commissioners if no return or an unsatisfactory one is made; subsection (6), again omitting what is immaterial for the present purpose, is as follows: "All provisions of the Income Tax Acts relating to persons who are to be chargeable with duty, assessments, &c. . . . shall, so far as they are applicable, apply to the charge, assessment, &c. . . . of duty under this section. . . ."

Before proceeding to consider the provisions of the Income Tax Acts referred to in subsection (6) it is well to call attention to certain fundamental differences between income-tax and supertax. Income-tax is chargeable under certain categories as to some of which no assessment on the tax-payer is made, e.g., the case of income from securities the tax on which is deducted at the source. No assessment of total income is made, nor is any return of such income required except where a claim is made for exemption or abatement. For this purpose certain payments out of income may be deducted before the total is ascertained.

In the case of supertax the assessment itself is in respect of the total income from all sources, a form of assessment for which there is no provision in the Income Tax Acts.

Section 41 of the Income Tax Act, 1842, reading it shortly and omitting what is immaterial is as follows: "The trustee, guardian, tutor, curator, or committee of any person, being an infant, or married woman, lunatic, idiot, or insane, and having the direction, control, or management of the property or concern of such infant, married woman, lunatic, idiot, or insane person . . . shall be chargeable to the said duties in like manner and to the same amount as would be charged if such infant were of full age, or such married woman were sole, or such lunatic, idiot, or insane person were capable of acting for himself." Provision is made for the charging of a non-resident person in the name of such trustee, &c., as above, or of any factor, agent, or receiver, having the receipt of any profits or gains arising as mentioned in the Act and belonging to any such person "and every such trustee," &c., "shall be answerable for the doing of all such acts, matters, and things, as shall be required to be done by virtue of this Act in order to the assessing of any such person to the duties granted by this Act, and paying the same."

Provision is made (section 44) for the indemnity of the persons described in section 41 in respect of any duty which they may pay.

The provisions relating to claims for exemption and abatement and statements of total income from all sources for that purpose are contained in section 164. It is unnecessary to state them.

As to section 41 it is to be observed that the chargeability of the trustee depends upon his having the control or management of "the property" of the incapacitated person. "The property" there seems to me to be not the entire property of the incapacitated person, but that property as to which the trustee, &c., has the control and management.

The application of the section is further limited to that part of the property as to which the incapacitated person would be chargeable if not under incapacity. It would not, for example, include property the income of which was taxed at the source. In short the section does not make the trustee chargeable in respect of the total income of the incapacitated person or even in respect of the income of the whole property under his control or management but only in respect of that income as to which the incapacitated person would be directly chargeable.

Under the provisions relating to supertax the position is fundamentally different. This tax is charged on the total income from all sources of the subject, and that income is a technical term; it is not merely the sum total of the several amounts of income charged with income-tax under the different categories specified in the Income Tax Act, but it is that income after certain deductions and adjustments which are not permissible under that Act.

Is then the provision in section 41 of the Act of 1842 as to the chargeability of a trustee "applicable" to supertax so as, under section 72 (6) of the Act of 1910, to render him chargeable to the latter tax? I agree with Mr. Justice Rowlatt and the majority of the Court of Appeal that in the absence of special directions to that effect it is impossible to apply the provisions in question to circumstances so different from those in respect of which they were enacted.

Taking the facts of the present case, the effect of the application of the provisions of section 41 in the last two of the years in question would be to render the trustees chargeable not only in respect of the income they themselves receive but in respect also of that received by the trustees of the settlement of 1862, and they have in fact been so charged in the assessments now in question. It may be that as between themselves and the latter trustees the burden might be apportioned, but there are no provisions in the statutes for any such arrangement.

As regards the first year it is true that the only income included in the assessment was that received by the trustees of the settlement of 1899, but even so there is the same difficulty that the "total income" is not the same as the income in respect of which the trustees would be chargeable under section 41, and I cannot think that the mere accident that there is not included in the total income any item of receipt not derived from the trusts of the settlement can make such a difference as to bring into application a provision which, if there were even the most trifling additional item of receipts, would be inapplicable.

Great reliance was placed by the appellants on the provisions of section 72 (2) of the Act of 1910 as to returns. I do not think this subsection affects the question; it contains, it is true, a substantive provision that a person chargeable to income-tax under section 41 as representing an incapacitated person may be required to make a return of the total income from all sources of the incapacitated person. But it does not follow that, because the statute requires in express terms information from such representative person, he is therefore to be chargeable, by words of reference such as are contained in subsection 6, to an extent to which he could not be charged under section 41 and in respect of a tax so different in its nature as supertax is from the tax mentioned in that section.

On the whole, for the reasons I have given, which are I think substantially those given by the majority in the Court of Appeal and by Mr. Justice Rowlatt, I think this appeal fails and ought to be dismissed with costs.

GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY v. J. DURNFORD AND SON, LIMITED.*

Contract—Indemnity—Undertaking to indemnify against all claims—Whether inclusive of claims by the persons giving the undertaking.

The plaintiffs took a lease of premises from the defendant railway company, and, by an agreement supplemental to the lease, the defendants gave the plaintiffs permission, on certain terms, to use for the transport of materials a portable gangway which could be moved over certain of the defendants' railway lines. One of the terms was that the plaintiffs "agree and undertake to indemnify the said [railway] company against all claims and demands or liability whatsoever whether in respect of damage to person or property arising out of or in connexion with the existence or user of the said gangway." When the plaintiffs were using the gangway some trucks were shunted down the line, and a lorry standing on the gangway was damaged. In an action for damages for negligence and/or breach of duty the defendants denied liability and pleaded the aforesaid term of the supplemental agreement. On a preliminary point as to the construction of the agreement,

Held, that the undertaking was only one to hold the defendants harmless against claims by third parties, and the preliminary point must be decided in favour of the plaintiffs.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (43 The Times L.R., 679) affirmed.

This was an appeal by the Great Western Railway Company from a decision of the Court of Appeal (43 The Times L.R., 679) affirming a decision of Mr. Justice MacKinnon (43 The Times L.R., 527).

The action was brought by the respondents, J. Durnford and Son, Limited, against the appellants, the Great Western Railway Company, for damages for negligence whereby a lorry belonging to the respondents was damaged.

By a lease of May 9, 1914, the appellants demised to the respondents premises adjoining certain sidings of the appellants' railway for a term of 14 years, and, by a subsequent memorandum endorsed on the lease, the appellants granted permission to the respondents to use a portable gangway with brackets recently erected by the respondents on the demised premises and projecting over the appellants' premises for the purpose of loading traffic into trucks on the sidings adjacent to the demised premises. In consideration thereof the respondents agreed "to indemnify the said company against all claims and demands or liability whatsoever, whether in respect of damage to person or property, arising out of or in connexion with the existence or user of the said gangway and brackets."

The respondents by their statement of claim alleged that, while the lorry was standing on the gangway for the purpose of discharging a load of lime into a railway truck on the appellants' siding below the gangway, the appellants' servants negligently put in motion some other trucks on the siding and thereby caused a box van to strike the gangway and lorry, with the result that the lorry was thrown to the ground and damaged.

The appellants, while denying negligence, counterclaimed for a declaration that they were entitled to be indemnified by the respondents against all liability on the respondents' claim.

The case came before Mr. Justice MacKinnon on a preliminary point of law as to the construction of the memorandum. The learned Judge was of opinion that the language of the memorandum was wide enough to include claims arising out of negligence of the defendants' servants. He also held that the damage to the lorry arose out of and in connexion with the user of the gangway, but that the memorandum did not require the respondents to indemnify the appellants against a claim made by the respondents themselves, and that it should be construed contra proferentem. He accordingly decided the point of law in favour of the respondents.

The Court of Appeal, by a majority (the Master of the Rolls and Lord Justice Scrutton, Lord Justice Sargant dissenting), affirmed the decision of the learned Judge.

Mr. W. A. Greene, K.C., Mr. Wilfrid Lewis, and Mr. J. A. Stainton appeared for the appellants; Mr. Rayner Goddard, K.C., Mr. E. H. C. Wethered, and Mr. Erskine Harper for the respondents.

VISCOUNT SUMNER.—My Lords: In 1914 the appellants leased to the respondents, who are contractors' merchants, some land abutting on their railway sidings at Bristol. In 1921 the respondents, wishing to load heavy materials on to wagons standing on the sidings alongside, proposed to instal a moveable gangway, that could be made to project over the line above the level of ordinary open trucks, so that, by running a lorry on to it and tipping it up, they could fill the wagon with as little labour and delay as possible. As this involved some overhang of the lorry over the line, the appellants' licence was required and was obtained under the agreement endorsed on the lease which is in question.

In August, 1926, while a lorry was tipped up to shoot a load of lime into railway trucks on the siding, one of the appellant company's engine-drivers shunted some trucks further along the line in such a manner that they struck and set in motion other trucks and a box van, which were on the siding and nearer to the gangway, so forcibly that, when the box van, which was higher than the level of the open trucks, reached the gangway it caught the lorry and knocked it off. The respondents sued for damages for this negligence and the railway company pleaded, first in defence and then by way of counterclaim, the following words contained in the agreement for the licence :—

"In consideration of the within-named company permitting the within-named lessees to use the portable gangway with brackets recently erected by the said lessees upon the premises within described and projecting over the company's premises for the purpose of loading traffic into trucks on the sidings adjacent to the within-described premises, the said lessees hereby agree and undertake to indemnify the said company against all claims and demands or liability whatsoever whether in respect of damage to person or property arising out of or in connexion with the existence or user of the said gangway and brackets and to remove the said gangway when not in actual use to such a position that the same shall not project from the premises within described."

Master Baker made an order that the points of law arising thereupon should be heard and disposed of before the trial of the issues of fact in the action. They were heard accordingly by Mr. Justice MacKinnon on the assumption that the facts alleged against the railway company could be proved, and his judgment in favour of the present respondents was affirmed by the Court of Appeal, Lord Justice Sargant dissenting. Hence this appeal. It raises a pure question of construction.

Wide as many of the terms of the clause certainly are, they are, in two respects at any rate, brought within much narrower limits. Though the "indemnity" is to be against "all claims and demands or liability whatsoever," the claims are only (a) claims "in respect of damage to person or property" and (b) such as "arise out of or in connexion with the existence or user of the said gangway and brackets." There would, therefore, be no indemnity against fines or penalties, nor, I suppose, against a contractor's claim for payment, if the railway company found it necessary to employ one to strengthen their road-bed so as to bear the thrust of the loaded wagon, when tipped. Wide as the words look at the outset, their context and purpose evidently subject them to several restrictions.

With regard to the circumstances to which the agreement refers, I note, firstly, that the use of the gangway or brackets, which is not specifically confined to the tip lorry but would be available for other modes of loading, is itself part of a joint operation, in which the respondents furnish the materials to be carried and the vehicle which delivers them, and the appellants furnish the trucks and the motive power by which they are removed, while there is benefit out of it on both sides, the respondents getting their goods carried and the appellants their railway rates paid. I note, secondly, that the clause does not deal with any claims to be made against the plaintiffs by the defendants for damage done to their property, in connexion with the gangway or otherwise, these being left to the common law, and it only deals, at most, with such claims for damages to be brought by the plaintiffs against the defendants as arise out of or in connexion with the gangway. If the plaintiffs stacked their builders' materials along the edge of the leased premises, so that they fell over on to the line, or if the defendants had a collision on the siding, which sent things flying on to the leased premises, so as to damage the stacks of builders' materials there, the clause would not apply in either case. It would accordingly seem to be a departure from the scheme to bring under the clause any questions arising on the simultaneous user of the gangway and of the sidings, and still more so if the effect of the clause be to throw on one party all the liability so arising instead of leaving them, as the other questions are left, to be settled by the ordinary law. There is no doubt that an abundant content for the clause can be found in third-party liabilities without having recourse to liabilities between the contracting parties themselves. It is, therefore, on the wording of the clause and not on its scheme, that the appellants must rely.

At your Lordships' bar it was recognized that the indemnity here is not matter of defence but of counterclaim, for it assumes liability which as such will fall on the railway company, that is, a claim to which no defence is available, for otherwise no occasion would arise for calling on the plaintiffs to hold the company harmless under the indemnity. This distinction figures largely in the dissentient judgment of Lord Justice Sargant, but hardly receives mention in any of the others, whether because it was not pressed or because its technical character seemed to make it of little weight in construing a working arrangement, I do not know.

My Lords, I think that the business object of the clause, if such a cause of action as the present was intended to come within it, must have been simply to ensure that the railway company should not be troubled with claims. This could have been accomplished, in more ways than one ; by granting the licence at the licensees' risk exclusively ; by inserting an undertaking not to sue, as a part of the consideration for the licence ; or by making the grant of the licence an accord and satisfaction for any torts thereafter to be committed by the railway company ; but in all forms the object is to stop the action on the claim, and to provide for a complete defence in limine. To resort to the circuitous course of including provision for a counterclaim against the licensees in words primarily directed to enabling the railway company to bring them by third-party notice into an action brought against them by third parties is not a thing to be reasonably regarded as part of the subject-matter of such a clause.

The results of such a provision for a counterclaim for indemnity are odd. The indemnity would be one to which the insurer's right of subrogation could not be applied since the plaintiffs could not stand in the shoes of the railway company to sue them as the real tortfeasors, for they would have to do so in the railway company's own name. If the plaintiffs were insured elsewhere against their own liability to their servants, and the insurers, having paid, sued the railway company as the negligent cause of the injury, the word "indemnity," now relied on, would defeat them, if they had not previously used it as a ground for defending the original claim on the policy. If the railway company were sued by a third party, injured in an accident by the negligence of both the present parties, it could by third-party notice bring in the plaintiffs and throw on them the whole burden of the claim, although if it had sought for contribution it would have failed, there being no contribution between joint tortfeasors. Even if the mere word "indemnity" would suffice for the appellants' purpose, the whole subject-matter appears to negative such an application of the word.

Again, the liability may arise out of or it may arise in connexion with—but it must still arise and for legal purposes that must mean arise causally, and, since the matter dealt with is a legal liability, that must mean in such causal connexion as is required to make somebody liable, who has to be answerable for the apparatus. It is contemplated that the railway company is liable and that its liability has been caused by the presence or the use of the gangway. In the present case the action of the engine-driver was what caused the railway company to be liable. It is said that if the lorry had not been there—a fortiori if it had not existed—it would not have been knocked off the gangway, but for legal purposes the lorry was not a contributing cause of the injury to it, but only a causa sine qua non. Moreover it was there pursuant to the terms of the licence for use in a joint operation with the railway company and, as the clause in question is not a clause of defeasance or of exception but only a foundation for an independent cross-claim, I think that there was an implied contractual obligation on the railway company to be reasonably careful not to injure it. Hence the negligence in itself formed a cause of action, and the damage to the lorry was merely the measure of the amount recoverable. The liability was, as a matter of causation, wholly due to the acts and defaults of the railway company and did not arise at all out of or in connexion with the presence or the user of the gangway.

My Lords, if the appellants' construction be adopted I think it must follow that, however reckless the negligence of the engine-driver might be, all the liability thus arising would be covered by the plaintiffs' indemnity. If shunting was carried on in such a manner that the lorry was frequently put out of action or that the plaintiff company could not prudently use the gangway, except when shunting was not going on at all, the business object of the licence would be greatly prejudiced, if not wholly defeated. The licence to place the lorry and use it in an overhanging position rests, as a practical matter, on the assumption that it will not be prevented from doing so by the mode in which the railway company does its work. When such prevention is caused by carelessness of workmen injunctions are of no use, and the only way to get it stopped is by suing for and recovering damages. The doctrine of The Moorcock (5 The Times L.R., 316; 14 P.D., 64) is, I am aware, apt to be overworked, but in this case I do not think I am straining it when I say that, even if the words of the clause, as words, would enable the counterclaim to succeed, such a construction in this case would defeat the manifest intention and object of the parties in entering into this arrangement and that accordingly the construction should be rejected.

For these reasons, and without relying on rules of construction applicable to contracts to carry subject to exceptions or to contracts to carry safely at all events, I am of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed and I move your Lordships accordingly.

Lord Warrington of Clyffe (read by Lord Atkin).—My Lords: Under a lease dated May 9, 1914, the respondents are the lessees under the appellants of a piece of land adjoining other land of the appellants alongside of certain sidings of theirs at Bristol.

The respondents are merchants and dealers in builders' materials and they send considerable quantities of such goods for conveyance by the appellants' line.

In the year 1921, being desirous of obtaining an easier access to the appellants' sidings for the purpose of transferring materials for carriage from their own lorries into the appellants' trucks, they obtained from the appellants permission to erect a portable gangway with brackets over a piece of the appellants' land lying between their sidings and the land in the occupation of the respondents, and to use the gangway so erected by running their lorries along it and then tipping the contents directly into a truck upon the siding. When the gangway was thus in use the end of the lorry projected over the siding.

In consideration of the privilege so conceded the respondents signed a memorandum dated September 24, 1921, endorsed on their lease. So far as it is material the memorandum is in the following terms:—

"In consideration of the within named company permitting the within named lessees to use the portable gangway with brackets recently erected by the said lessees upon the premises within described and projecting over the company's premises for the purpose of loading traffic into trucks on the sidings adjacent to the within described premises the said lessees hereby agree and undertake to indemnify the said company against all claims and demands or liability whatsoever whether in respect of damage to person or property arising out of or in connexion with the existence or user of the said gangway and brackets and to remove the said gangway when not in actual use to such a position that the same shall not project from the premises within described."

On August 26, 1926, in the course of certain shunting operations, the appellants' servants negligently—as is assumed for the purpose of argument—caused a box truck to be moved along the siding over which the end of the respondents' lorry was projecting. The box truck struck the lorry, which was thrown to the ground and seriously damaged.

The present action was brought by the respondents to recover damages for the injury to their lorry.

The appellants in their defence, amongst other grounds, set up the above-mentioned memorandum as negativing any liability to the respondents.

They also pleaded it by way of counter-claim and thereby claimed a declaration that they were entitled to be indemnified by the respondents against all liability on their claim including liability in respect of damages, if any, awarded to the respondents, costs, if any, awarded to them, and their own costs as between solicitor and client incurred in defending the claim.

The points of law raised by the defence and counter-claim were ordered to be set down and disposed of before the trial of the issue of fact, and the matter came before Mr. Justice MacKinnon on May 17, 1927.

Three points were argued:—

1. Whether the memorandum covered claims against the appellants by the respondents themselves.

2. Whether—if this were answered in the affirmative—it covered a claim founded on the negligence of the appellants.

3. Whether under the circumstances of the case the damage to the lorry is to be treated as damage "arising out of or in connexion with the existence or user of the said gangway."

The learned Judge decided the second and third points in favour of the appellants and the first point in favour of the respondents.

The Court of Appeal by a majority (Lord Hanworth, M.R., and Lord Justice Scrutton, Lord Justice Sargant dissenting) affirmed the judgment of Mr. Justice MacKinnon on the first point. They did not express an opinion on the second and third points inasmuch as in view of their opinion on the first point the others did not arise.

In the argument in this House counsel for the appellants based their case wholly on the counterclaim, viz., granting that the terms of the memorandum did not afford an answer to the action, they rendered a judgment in favour of the respondents of no practical effect inasmuch as they would be bound to repay to the appellants the amount of any damages and costs and further to pay the costs of the defence as between solicitor and client.

As to the point No. 2 above mentioned I agree with Mr. Justice MacKinnon that if the memorandum covers claims by the respondents themselves it is wide enough to include claims founded on negligence.

As to point No. 3, whether on the facts alleged the damage arose out of or in connexion with the existence or user of the gangway and brackets, I have come to the opposite conclusion.

The damage certainly did not arise out of or in connexion with the existence of the gangway and brackets. If the gangway had not been in use, even if it had been in position ready for use, the box truck would have passed clear and no damage would have been done.

Did then the damage arise out of or in connexion with the user of the gangway or brackets? Inasmuch as the respondents alone and persons authorized by them can lawfully use the gangway, the words seem to me to assume that it is an act of the respondents themselves in the course of or in connexion with the user of the gangway from which the damage arises. In the present case the damage arose not from any act of the respondents in the course of or in connexion with the user, but from that of the appellants' servants in driving the box truck against the overhanging lorry. It is true that if the lorry had not been there the damage would not have arisen, but on the other hand but for the act of the appellants' servants the lorry, though in its actual position, would not have been injured, and it seems to me that in determining the present question it is the causa causans alone which has to be regarded.

If my view on this last point is correct it is sufficient to entail the dismissal of the appeal, and on the more general question I will only add that I agree with the views expressed by my noble and learned friend Lord Sumner whose judgment I have read.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal fails and should be dismissed with costs.

LORD ATKIN.—My Lords, for myself I have read the judgment of my noble and learned friend Lord Sumner and I agree with it.

GREEN v. J. GLIKSTEN AND SON, LIMITED.*

Revenue — Income-tax — Insurance of timber against fire—Money received by insured—Whether an ordinary trading receipt.

Where a timber merchant insures his timber against fire and the timber is destroyed by fire, the amount received by him from the insurance companies, in respect of the timber so destroyed, is to be taken, for the purpose of income-tax, as an ordinary trading receipt, and it is not sufficient to value the timber destroyed at cost or market value, whichever may be the lower, and to enter that amount in the profit and loss account and to put to reserve the balance of the money received from the insurance companies.

Decision of Rowlatt, J. (44 The Times L.R., 153; [1928] 1 K.B., 475), affirmed.

This was an appeal by J. Gliksten and Son, Limited, from a decision of Mr. Justice Rowlatt (44 The Times L.R., 153; [1928] 1 K.B., 475) in a case which raised the question how money received by a trader from his insurers in respect of damage done to his stock by fire should be entered in his trading account.

The appellant company was assessed to income-tax for the year ending April 5, 1924, in the estimated sum of £100,000.

The company was incorporated in 1905, and carried on business as timber merchants at Stratford, E. On August 8, 1921, a large quantity of timber, which was stored in the company's timber yard, was destroyed by fire. In respect of the timber so destroyed the company received in February, 1922, £477,838 from various insurance companies.

The timber destroyed consisted mainly of the best class of hardwood, which was bought by the company seasoned, unseasoned, or partly seasoned. A large quantity of seasoned wood, which had been taken into stock before the War, was destroyed.

The company's accounts were made up to June 30 in each year, stocks being valued (following the usual practice) at cost or market value, whichever was the lower. For that valuation large sums were in the last two years of account before the fire written off the original cost prices of the stock in respect of depreciation to arrive at the closing stock values, and the reduced sums so arrived at were adopted each year to ascertain the company's profits for income-tax purposes. In respect of the stock on hand at June 30, 1921, which was the subject matter of the appeal, the sums from time to time written off the stock values amounted in the aggregate to £107,000 or thereabouts, and the total stock on hand at that date was valued in the company's accounts at £266,831, after writing off £107,000.

For many years the company had kept its stock-in-trade insured against loss or damage by fire, and had, in computing its profits for income-tax purposes, been allowed to deduct the premiums paid by it in respect of the policies of insurance as an expense of its business. For the purposes of fire insurance the stock-in-trade of the company was valued at replacement value. At the date of the fire the value of timber of the kind which constituted the greater part of the company's stock was very high, and the company accordingly claimed from the insurance companies concerned, and was paid by them, in respect of the replacement value of the stock so destroyed, £477,838. Out of that sum £160,824 (being part of the sum of £266,831, the value of stock in hand at June 30, 1921), estimated by the company to be the written-down value of the timber so destroyed, had been brought into the company's accounts for the year ending June 30, 1922, as a trading receipt.

After deducting £2,845 for law charges, £1,000 for expenses of clearing the yard, and £160,824, the balance of the moneys received from the insurance companies in respect of the destroyed timber, amounting to £313,168, was carried into the balance-sheet for the year ending June 30, 1922, as a reserve, but was not brought into the profit and loss account.

During the War the greater part of the company's trade consisted in supplying seasoned and specially selected timber of various kinds to Government Departments and various aircraft contractors. The timber required for these purposes was of a special character, and had to be, and was, picked out from the company's stocks. The whole of the company's stocks of the required types of timber, such as silver spruce, mahogany, walnut, and English ash, had (before the fire) been gone over in this way, and the company was, at the date of the fire, left in possession only of such portions of these stocks as had not been found suitable for the purposes mentioned. Since the Armistice the company had done an increasing business with the motor body-building and like industries, and that class of business had led to demand for, and the company had stocked, timber of types and qualities different from those stocked by the company during and before the War. For that reason only a small portion of the timber destroyed by the fire had been replaced—namely, to an amount of £18,400 or thereabouts.

At the date of the fire there was a "boom," which was being prolonged by the adoption on the part of the larger timber merchants of a policy of "holding up" stocks. The high prices obtaining at that time, on the basis of which the insurance companies paid the company's claim, were due to that "boom." The timber destroyed was of such a character that it would have been practically impossible to have put it on the market without causing a glut and destroying the market for the time being.

On an appeal by the company to the Special Commissioners of Income Tax against the assessment, it was contended on behalf of the company (a) that no part of the sum received by the company from the insurance companies in respect of the destroyed timber constituted a trading receipt; and (b) that no part of the difference between the £160,824 and the £477,838 constituted a trading profit.

It was contended on behalf of the Crown (a) that the whole sum received from the insurance companies in respect of the destroyed timber—namely, £477,838—constituted a trading receipt, and should have been brought into the company's profit and loss account for the year in question; and (b) that the amount of the assessment should be £84,227, less £373 for wear and tear.

The Special Commissioners decided that the £477,838 recovered from the insurance companies did not represent a trade receipt, and that no part of it was assessable as trade profits under Case I. of Schedule D, and they expressed the opinion that the burned timber which had been replaced should be brought into stock at the original cost price of the timber. That replacement need not be a purchase of timber precisely similar to that burned. It was sufficient if it were timber suitable for similar purposes. The Special Commissioners fixed the amount of replacements at £18,400, and reduced the assessment under appeal to nil.

On appeal by the Crown, Mr. Justice Rowlatt reversed that decision. He held that the amount received from the insurance companies in respect of the timber so destroyed was to be taken, for the purpose of income-tax, as an ordinary trading receipt, and that it was not sufficient to value the timber destroyed at cost or market value, whichever might be the lower, and to enter that amount in the profit and loss account, and to put to reserve the balance of the money received from the insurance companies.

The company appealed.

Mr. Maugham, K.C., Mr. Latter, K.C., and Mr. Cyril King appeared for the appellant company.

The Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills, for the Crown, were not called upon to argue.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS (Lord Hanworth), in giving judgment, said that the case was an interesting one, but the Court could only come to the conclusion that Mr. Justice Rowlatt's judgment was right. It was said by the timber company: "We are dealers in timber, but we do not carry on a trade in fires; this misfortune is no part of our business; we do not contemplate fires. Therefore this sum received from the insurance company is an indemnity in respect of the amount standing against the timber destroyed in our books; the surplus is a windfall, a nugget of gold dug up on our premises, and it does not fall into our trading accounts for the purposes of income-tax."

He had looked at the trading account and it showed, as in other businesses, that to effect insurance against any risk whatsoever was a part of the ordinary duty. It might be true to say that the company did not trade in fires, but it was still mindful of the fact that untoward events did occur, and it was in the ordinary course of business that it took steps to guard against perils by land or sea.

The company had relied on Rule 3 of the Rules applicable to Cases I. and II. of Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918, which said that:—

"In computing the amount of the profits or gains to be charged, no sum shall be deducted in respect of . . . (k) any sum recoverable under an insurance or contract of indemnity."

The company contended that these words seemed to contemplate that there had been a loss in respect of which there was an indemnity recoverable; in other words, it forbade the taxpayer to treat as a loss a sum which in fact was recoverable under a contract of indemnity. He was, however, unable to find in that rule any definite guide for the determination of the present appeal.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt had treated the case from the right point of view. The appellant company, as a trader in timber, had, as part of its business, to insure against certain perils. It had a fixed capital, and also a circulating capital used for the purchase of stock, and part of that circulating capital was invested in timber. The timber might have been sold; instead of that, it was burnt. Under the contract of indemnity a sum had been received in respect of it, and that was, in fact, a restoration to the circulating capital of a sum to replace the sum which had been invested in timber. The sum received seemed to him to be an ordinary item of the receipts, which ought to be brought into the accounts at its true value.

LORD JUSTICE SARGANT said that it was really a very plain case. The receipt in question was quite an ordinary receipt, not in the sense that it occurred every year, but in the sense that it would ordinarily be received if the peril insured against were to take place. Rule 3 (k) of Cases I. and II. of Schedule D had been relied upon, but, in his view, that rule did not affect the matter; indeed, if anything, these words seemed to be rather against the appellants, because they seemed to indicate that the amount recoverable in such a case was to take the place of the asset lost. He (Lord Justice Sargant) failed to follow the argument that the Court should only reckon the book value of the timber. In his view, the value of the timber was the amount received for the timber.

LORD JUSTICE LAWRENCE said that, in his view, the true effect of Rule 3 (k) of Cases I. and II., Schedule D, was that in arriving at the balance of profits there was to be no deduction for an insured loss to the extent to which it was covered, but that did not support the idea that, if the true value of the goods burnt were received from an insurance company, that was not a receipt of the business. Fire was certainly not an ordinary event of business; but if a fire did occur then the receipt of the insurance money was an ordinary transaction, stipulated for in the ordinary prudent course of business.

COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE v. PARSONS.*

Revenue — Supertax—Principal shareholder in company — Scheme for transfer of shares to employees—Dividends to belong to principal shareholder till transfer — No transfer till total dividends amounted to par value — Liability to assessment — Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), s. 27.

The appellant, who was the principal shareholder and held the controlling interest in a company, set aside a certain number of his shares for transfer to certain employees of the company on the terms that, until the actual transfer, he was to receive the dividends, and that when the total of the dividends on the shares set aside for an employee amounted to the par value of a share the share so paid for should be transferred to the employee. The appellant was assessed to supertax on the dividends received by him on the shares so set aside.

Held, that since the dividends, as they accrued, were dividends of the appellant, although he might be under obligations with regard to them in the future, they formed part of his income for the purpose of assessment to supertax.

* Reported by H. LANGFORD LEWIS and G. T. WHITFIELD-HAYES, Esqs., Barristers-at-Law.

Decision of Rowlatt, J. (41 The Times L.R., 572), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Rowlatt (41 The Times L.R., 572), allowing an appeal by the Crown from a decision of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts on a question relating to supertax. The appellant, the Hon. Sir Charles Algernon Parsons, K.C.B., appealed against an additional assessment to supertax in the sum of £1,623 for the year ending April 5, 1920. The appellant was the principal shareholder in a private company, C. A. Parsons and Co., Limited (the company), and at all material times held a controlling interest in the company, and, up to the date of an arrangement made in 1918, over 90 per cent. of the shares. The shares were of the nominal value of £100 each.

In 1918 the appellant decided, in order to afford certain employees of the company holding important positions a direct personal interest in the company, to transfer to those employees a definite number of shares in the company, subject to certain conditions set out below. Therefore, in 1918, he set aside 649 shares in the company for certain selected employees, and, in 1919, 240 additional shares for the same employees, which shares were to be eventually transferred to them on the terms of a document entitled "Statement of Terms," and a letter addressed to each of the employees to whom shares were to be transferred. The terms were, shortly, that the company was to open and keep accounts in which the shares of each employee were to be credited with all dividends which, during his employment by the company, should be received by Sir Charles Parsons in respect of those shares. The employees might also pay for the shares by any instalments of not less than £10 at one time. As soon as the account, either out of dividends credited or out of payments made by the employee, reached the par value of any one or more shares, such share or shares were to be transferred to the employee. There were further provisions applicable to the case of the death of the employee, or the termination of his employment by the company. Clause 8 of the terms was as follows:—

"Until actual transfer to the employee, the shares will continue in the name and under the control of Sir Charles, and he may vote and act in respect of them as absolute owner, and without any restriction by reason of this arrangement."

The letter accompanying the terms explained them as follows:—

"Stated generally, the arrangement is that the shares shall be credited with the dividends received in respect of them, and that for each £100 of accumulated dividends a share shall become yours, and so on, until the whole of the shares set aside for you have been accounted for. . . . It will be open to you to accelerate your ownership by payments of your own moneys. . . ."

The dividends for the year ending April 5, 1919, so set aside amounted to £1,622 10s. The Special Commissioners held that those moneys were subject to a binding trust in favour of the employees, and did not form part of the appellant's income. Mr. Justice Rowlatt, on appeal by the Crown, reversed that decision.

Sir Charles Parsons appealed.

Mr. Latter, K.C., and Mr. Cyril King appeared for the appellant; the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills for the Crown.

Counsel contended for the appellant that this was an effectual trust of certain dividends, forming a trust fund to purchase shares for the employees. Even if that were not so, the dividends so earmarked were an "annual payment" within the meaning of section 27 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, whereby the appellant's income was diminished.

Counsel for the Crown were not called upon to argue.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS, in giving judgment, said that he felt the force of the argument for the appellant, and he was sorry to put what might seem like an embargo on such a generous scheme, but the Court must construe the legal effect of the arrangement, and two facts stood out very clearly. First, the dividends on these blocks of shares, or on the shares not already transferred to employees, were being paid directly to the appellant in his own right; and, secondly, at no time could any of those employees have turned round to Sir Charles Parsons and said: "You are receiving a portion of a dividend which is my dividend, and I direct you to deal with that portion in a particular way." In other words, while the appellant received dividends on those blocks of shares he received them absolutely as his own without any employee having the right to interfere with him.

It had been suggested that there was really a trust; that the shares were being paid for out of trust money. He (his Lordship) could not agree. The transaction really amounted to this. Sir Charles Parsons had undertaken to make a gift to his employees from a block of shares. The gift would be completed when the nominal value of each share transferred had been received in dividends, but meanwhile, though the amount of the dividends was entered in a book in favour of the employees, the dividends were the dividends of Sir Charles and his right in respect of them was untrammelled. It seemed impossible to argue that he received those dividends as a trustee.

Then it was said that the appellant should have relief granted to him under section 27 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, because those dividends, being for the purchase of shares for employees, were really an interest or annual payment charged on the income of the appellant and reducing that income. He (the Master of the Rolls) doubted whether the point was really a question which could be raised on this appeal; but, even if it were, the Court would still have to answer the question: Was this a trust of certain dividends so as to take them out of the appellant's income? It seemed that it was not. There was a duty upon Sir Charles Parsons to transfer shares from time to time, but meanwhile the income was his income, free and unappropriated. The appellant's case had attractive features, and the Court would have been only too glad to take the view put forward on his behalf if it had been possible to do so, but it was not, and the appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE SARGANT said that, in view of the generous character of the scheme, he was sorry to have to come to the same conclusion. The question really was whether there was here a valid trust, and it seemed to him that the fundamental conception of a valid trust was lacking. The appellant could receive the dividends from time to time and do what he liked with them. All that he had to do in respect of them was to make a book entry for each employee, showing the credit to that employee. The fact that each employee was entitled to have a share transferred to him when his credit reached a certain figure was not to say that any particular dividend belonged to that employee. It seemed to him (Lord Justice Sargant) that all suggestion of a trust had disappeared. As to the suggestion that these dividends were an "annual payment," the appellant would not lose any sum by the crediting of them as book entries. What would happen would be that at the end of a certain time he would lose his share. There seemed no ground for the suggestion that these sums could escape being brought into account for supertax.

LORD JUSTICE LAWRENCE said that the insurmountable difficulty in the way of the appellant was that the scheme did not contemplate the dividends being the subject-matter of any trust until the full amount of a share was credited. Meanwhile, the income was the income of the appellant for his own use. Neither did the fact that the amounts of the dividends were credited, as a book entry, from time to time, to certain employees make them an "annual payment" within the meaning of section 27 of the Income Tax Act, 1918.

RAEBURN v. RAEBURN.*

It was announced that the parties had come to an agreement in regard to this petition in which Lady Raeburn, formerly Mrs. Olga Lucia Hatton, widow, of Overdale, St. John's, Woking, Surrey, sought a decree of judicial separation against Sir William Hannay Raeburn, Bt., a shipowner. The hearing had been preceded by the trial of an issue as to jurisdiction (44 The Times L.R., 384).

Mr. Bayford, K.C., and the Hon. Victor Russell appeared for the petitioner; Mr. Cotes-Preedy, K.C., and Mr. Bush James for the respondent.

Mr. BAYFORD now said that he proposed to offer no evidence as to the first set of charges in the petition, and the petitioner accepted the explanations given on behalf of the respondent as to the second set of charges.

Mr. COTES-PREEDY said that the charges were totally denied by Sir William Raeburn, who would not have agreed to the deed of separation, which had been signed, if the charges had been persisted in. The respondent felt that if the charges had been properly investigated they would never have been brought. By the deed of separation Sir William was allowing his wife precisely the amount which she would have had if this misguided action had never been brought. He said that he made this statement in fairness to his client, who had many friends in England and Scotland, as a certain amount of publicity had been given, during the trial of the issue of residence, to charges which Sir William had had no opportunity of denying.

The PRESIDENT, in dismissing the petition, said that the respondent had consented to pay the taxed costs as between party and party. As regarded what had been said by counsel about charges which were made on one side or the other, every intelligent person must be well aware that charges proved nothing. There were two sets of charges. One set was no longer made, and as to the other set it had been said that explanations had been offered and accepted.

Mr. COTES-PREEDY said that the charges were denied in toto, and his client had offered no explanations at all.

His LORDSHIP said that the least said the soonest mended, and made the agreed order as to costs.

CATTON v. ASHWELL AND NESBIT, LIMITED.*

Master and Servant—Compensation for injury by accident — Weekly payment — Alleged recovery of workman—Stoppage—Application by employers for review — Denial of liability—Payment into Court of amount up to date fixed for hearing—Alleged breach of statutory duty—Tribunal to determine question of incapacity—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 84), ss. 12, 21.

The plaintiff, a workman in the employment of the defendants, was injured by an accident, and the defendants admitted liability and made a weekly payment of compensation. Ultimately a doctor reported that the plaintiff had recovered, and the defendants stopped the weekly payment and applied to the county court for a review thereof, and, when a date had been fixed for the hearing, they paid into Court, with a denial of liability, the amount of all the weekly payments up to that date. While the county court proceedings were still pending, the plaintiff brought an action, alleging that he had not recovered from his injury, and claiming (1) a declaration that under section 12 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, the defendants had committed a breach of their duty by stopping the weekly payment otherwise than in pursuance of an agreement or arbitration, and (2) an injunction restraining a continuance of the breach.

Held, (1) that there was no enforceable obligation on the employers to continue the weekly payment when the issue raised by them was that the workman was no longer incapacitated, and (2) that as under section 21 of the Act the only tribunal to determine the question of incapacity was the county court, and as that question had not yet been determined by that tribunal, the plaintiff could not show that his incapacity was continuing since the date when the defendants stopped the weekly payments, and therefore the action failed.

Decision of Clauson, J. (44 The Times L.R., 130) affirmed.

* Reported by G. T. WHITFIELD-HAYES and H. LANGFORD LEWIS, Esqs., Barristers-at-Law.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Clauson (44 The Times L.R., 130).

The plaintiff, Mr. Joseph Catton, a pipe fitter, was injured on August 1, 1925, while in the employment of the defendants, Ashwell and Nesbit, Limited, engineers, carrying on business at Leicester. He was paid £1 10s. a week as compensation. In the action he claimed a declaration that the defendants, by stopping the weekly payments of compensation on June 24, 1927, otherwise than in pursuance of an agreement or arbitration, had committed a breach of their statutory duty under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925. He also claimed an injunction restraining the defendants from continuing the breach, and damages.

The plaintiff had injured his heel by falling from a platform 3ft. high. The defendants admitted liability. In May, 1927, the plaintiff was examined by a doctor, who reported that he had recovered from the injury.

On June 24 the defendants filed an application in the Greenwich County Court, in pursuance of section 11 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, for a review of the weekly payments which they were making to the plaintiff, asking that they should be terminated or diminished. On June 27 the Registrar gave notice that the application would be heard on October 14, 1927. The defendants thereupon paid into Court £24, the amount of the weekly payments up to October 14, 1927. That payment was made with a denial of liability on the ground that the plaintiff, having entirely recovered, could no longer claim to be paid compensation up to the time when an award should be made in the county court, having regard to the recent decision of the House of Lords in Ocean Coal Company, Limited v. Davies (43 The Times L.R., 108; [1927] A.C., 271).

The plaintiff pleaded that he had not recovered from his injury. He said that in Ocean Coal Company, Limited v. Davies (supra) the workman admitted that he had entirely recovered from his injury, but claimed, nevertheless, that under section 14 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1923, now section 12 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, the payment of compensation could not be ended until the county court Judge had made an award on the application to review.

Section 21 of the Act of 1925 provided that any question arising in any proceedings under that Act should be settled by an arbitrator or by a county court Judge. Section 12 provided that an employer should not be entitled otherwise than in pursuance of an agreement or arbitration to end or diminish a weekly payment under the principal Act except in certain cases, which did not apply here.

Mr. Justice Clauson thought that, on the authority of the decision of the House of Lords in Niddrie and Benhar Coal Company, Limited v. Dee ([1927] A.C., 299), the plaintiff could only succeed by showing that the defendants had failed in their statutory duty, and to do that he must prove that incapacity still existed. The proper tribunal to determine that question was the county court. The plaintiff's continuing incapacity had not been established, and, therefore, the action must be dismissed.

The plaintiff appealed.

Sir Henry Slesser, K.C., and Mr. C. S. Rewcastle appeared for the appellant; Mr. Edgar Dale and Mr. J. Alun Pugh for the respondents.

The MASTER of the ROLLS (Lord Hanworth), in the course of a considered judgment, stated the facts, and said that the action was really brought to determine whether certain dicta of Lord Wrenbury and Lord Carson in Ocean Coal Company, Limited v.

Davies (43 The Times L.R., 108 ; [1927] A.C., 271) afforded a good foundation for the claim now made by the workman to have the weekly payments to him continued notwithstanding that the employers contended that he had recovered from his incapacity and, consequently, that his right to weekly payments of compensation had ceased.

If the question were examined in historical sequence, the solution, in his (his Lordship's) judgment, was plain. Under the Act of 1906 a workman might become entitled to compensation in accordance with Schedule I. of the Act, and, when an employer had been ordered to make such weekly payments by an award or had agreed to do so, the employer was not entitled to end the payments unless and until there had been a review under clause 16 of Schedule I. It was decided in Gibson and Co. v. Wishart (30 The Times L.R., 540 ; [1915] A.C., 18) that a review and termination or diminution of a weekly payment related back retrospectively to the date when the incapacity ceased.

Then the Act of 1923 was passed, and section 14, which was now section 12 of the Act of 1925, took away the right of an employer to end payments which he was making to a workman, whether voluntarily, or under an award or recorded agreement, except in the manner provided by the section. It was contended that its effect was to make the employer liable to continue them down to the time when his liberty to end them was given him, either by agreement, or award, or the decision of the "Judge" in the procedure available under section 14 (3). But that view, which was adopted by the Court of Appeal in Davies v. Glyncorrwg Colliery Company ([1925] 2 K.B., 339) and in Ocean Coal Company, Limited v. Davies (135 L.T., 498), proved erroneous, the majority of the House of Lords in the latter case reaffirming the principle adopted in Gibson and Co. v. Wishart (supra) that the liability of the employer was limited to the period of incapacity.

His Lordship then referred to certain passages in the judgments given in that case and proceeded. In Hosegood and Sons v. Wilson (27 The Times L.R., 88 ; [1911] 1 K.B., 30), and again in Niddrie and Benhar Coal Company, Limited v. Dee ([1927] A.C., 299), decided by the House of Lords immediately after Ocean Coal Company, Limited v. Davies (supra), the opinion was expressed that employers could recover in a separate proceeding sums overpaid to workmen when the amount of the weekly payments was reduced as from an antecedent date, though they could not set off such overpayments as against payments due subsequently. Lord Wrenbury in the latter case (Niddrie and Benhar Coal Company, Limited v. Dee, supra) also dealt with the position where money had been paid into Court, and where the ultimate decision of the dispute was worked out by an arbitration and not by the decision of a medical referee. He said (at p. 311) :—

"The Act is obviously ill-drawn, but in my opinion it does not leave the employer exposed to the danger and injustice against which the Act protects him if there were a medical reference instead of an arbitration by order of the Court. The Court has power . . . to deal with the money in Court in such manner as is right when the arbitration is concluded."

The present action was based on the expressions used by Lord Wrenbury as to section 12 being a statutory provision that the employer should de facto continue to pay, though his liability to pay was not necessarily thereby enlarged, and on some observations by Lord Carson in the same case. In his (his Lordship's) judgment, both those opinions must be interpreted in close relation to the matter which was then before the House. They could not be taken as indicating that the statute imposed an obligation on the employer enforceable by action at law to make the weekly payments to the workman when the issue raised by the employer was that the workman was no longer incapacitated and no longer entitled to receive any compensation. The speeches were delivered for the purpose of emphasizing the view that the weekly payments depended on the continuance of incapacity.

If there were a statutory obligation on the employer to make those payments, and they were made pursuant to process on the law being set in motion, as suggested, they could not be recovered back. Money paid under compulsion of law, and afterwards discovered not to have been due, could not be recovered back in an action for money had and received —Marriott v. Hampton (2 Smith's Leading Cases, 403). That proposition had the authority of Sir James Shaw Willes and Sir H. S. Keating in the third edition. There were further difficulties for the plaintiff besides those which he (his Lordship) had dealt with. By section 21 (1) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925 :—

"If any question arises in any proceedings under this Act . . . as to the amount or duration of compensation under this Act . . . the question shall . . . be settled by the arbitration . . . of an arbitrator or of a Judge of County Courts . . ."

For the reasons given he agreed that no statutory right of action for those intermediate payments was given to the workman under section 12 of the Act, and he agreed with Mr. Justice Clauson that the action failed. The appeal must be dismissed.

Lord Justice Sargant agreed. The action was, in his view, a desperate attempt to nullify the decisions in Ocean Coal Company, Limited v. Davies (43 The Times L.R., 108 ; [1927] A.C., 271) and Niddrie and Benhar Coal Company, Limited v. Dee ([1927] A.C., 299) and was bound to fail. Similar relief had been claimed by the plaintiff in the County Court and had failed for the reasons given by the County Court Judge in a written judgment with which he entirely concurred, with the one trifling amendment (which told in favour of the defendants) that the payment of the money into Court was made in accordance with Rule 19 of the Workmen's Compensation Rules of 1926. He desired to adopt the following from that judgment—"It is clear from the decision in Ocean Coal Company, Limited v. Davies (supra) that section 12 does not give the workman an absolute right to continue to receive the weekly payments without regard to whether he has recovered or not. His right to a continuance of those payments is dependent upon the continuance of the incapacity." Had the plaintiff desired to challenge the correctness of the decision of the County Court Judge he could have appealed in the usual way, but instead of doing so he had started proceedings de novo in the High Court for relief similar to that which had been refused him in the County Court, with the additional objection that the question whether the plaintiff had in fact recovered and the date of such recovery were ultimately determinable in the arbitration proceedings already commenced, and entirely outside the jurisdiction of the High Court. He was content to adopt the judgment of Mr. Justice Clauson.

Lord Justice Lawrence, having stated the questions, proceeded. Mr. Dale on behalf of the employers had admitted that as the case was not one falling under any of the exceptions specified in section 12, the employers were not entitled to end the weekly payments, otherwise than in pursuance of arbitration, and recognizing that position the employers in discontinuing the weekly payments promptly filed an application for a review and termination of the payments on June 24, 1927 ; and they paid into Court a sum sufficient to cover the weekly payments up to the date fixed for the hearing of the arbitration. No argument had been presented to suggest that the employers were not acting strictly in accordance with the rules in making that payment into Court, or that the money so paid in would not be available for the workman if the arbitrator should find that the employers had failed to prove that the workman's incapacity had in fact ended on the day alleged. He (his Lordship) was clearly of opinion that the employers had not committed a breach of any statutory obligation under section 12. They had never claimed that they could end the weekly payments otherwise than in pursuance of an arbitration, and they had taken all the necessary and proper steps to obtain an award, and had availed themselves of the power given to them by the Rules of paying money into Court pending the decision of the arbitrator. The workman, however, was dissatisfied. His Lordship then referred to the proceedings in the present action. A more futile proceeding on the part of the workman than the action it was difficult to conceive. As the workman had failed to prove that the employers had committed any breach of the provisions of the statute, it was not really necessary to consider the question whether such an action as the present would lie, but he desired to express his entire concurrence with the opinions expressed on that point by Mr. Justice Clauson and the Master of the Rolls. He agreed that the appeal failed and should be dismissed with costs.

BELL AND ANOTHER v. BENNETT.*

Mines — Coal-mine — Checkweighers—Minority and majority checkweighers—Co-existence—Whether possible — Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict., c. 58), s. 14 (1)—Coal Mines (Weighing of Minerals) Act, 1905 (5 Edw. VII., c. 9), ss. 1, 3.

Under the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, and the Coal Mines (Weighing of Minerals) Act, 1905, the co-existence of a minority checkweigher and of a majority checkweigher, even if possible under the Acts, is no defence to a claim by a duly appointed majority checkweigher against a weight-paid worker for a proportion of the majority checkweigher's wages. But, Semble, the statutes do not contemplate such co-existence, and the appointment of a minority checkweigher is terminated by the subsequent due appointment of a majority checkweigher.

This was an appeal from a decision of his Honour Judge Greenwell, sitting at Newcastle-upon-Tyne County Court.

The plaintiffs, Mr. George Bell and Mr. Wheatley Jacobson, contended that they were the checkweighers duly appointed on January 7, 1927, by a majority, ascertained by ballot, of the persons who were employed in the Greenside Colliery, Durham, and who were paid according to the weight of mineral extracted ; and that as such they were entitled to claim 10s. 2d. as a proportion of their wages from the defendant, Mr. Peter Bennett, who was a person employed at that colliery as a hewer and paid by weight. The defendant denied that he was liable, on the ground that he had already paid contributions to Mr. Matthew Richardson Clark, who, he contended, had been duly appointed checkweigher on December 18, 1926.

Section 14 (1) of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, provides :—

"Where a checkweigher has been appointed by the majority, ascertained by ballot, of the persons employed in a mine who are paid according to the weight of the mineral gotten by them, and has acted as such, he may recover from any person for the time being employed at such mine and so paid, his proportion of the checkweigher's wages or recompense, notwithstanding that any of the persons by whom the checkweigher was appointed may have left the mine or others have entered the same since the checkweigher's appointment. . . ."

The mine in question had been closed during the coal strike, and work was resumed at the beginning of December, 1926. Before the strike all the men employed at the mine had belonged to the Durham Miners' Union, but after the strike differences of opinion existed on the questions when and subject to what terms work should be resumed, and a new and non-political union was formed called the Greenside All Grades Union, of which a Mr. Forster was secretary. On December 10, 1926, the following notice was exhibited at the pithead :—

"GREENSIDE ALL GRADES UNION.

"Mr. Matthew Golightly and Mr. M. R. Clark are the two nominations for checkweighmen. The ballot will take place in the shelter on Saturday, December 18, 1926, between the hours of 11 a.m. and 12.30 p.m.

"C. FORSTER, Secretary."

On December 18 the ballot took place. There were 217 weight-paid workers in the mine, and 84 balloted for Mr. Clark. On December 30 a statutory declaration, recording the appointment by ballot of a checkweigher who was not a majority checkweigher, was made, according to the provisions of section 1 of the Coal Mines (Weighing of Minerals) Act, 1905, and Mr. Clark began work.

On January 3, 1927, a notice headed "Weigh Fund Meeting" was posted, calling a meeting for January 5 to obtain nominations for the position of checkweighers. The "Weigh Fund" was not connected with any political union, but included all those employed at the mine. On January 5 the two plaintiffs were nominated, and, on a ballot being held on January 7, 176 men voted for the plaintiffs out of 264 entitled to vote. From that time onwards both Mr. Clark and one or other of the plaintiffs were together in the cabin where the weighing took place.

On February 2 notice was given of a meeting with regard to the appointment of Mr. Clark, and on February 5 a ballot took place on the question : "Are you in favour of Clark representing you as a checkweighman ?" The result of that ballot was that out of 350 entitled to vote 63 voted for Mr. Clark's remaining on as a checkweigher and 186 for his removal.

The County Court Judge held that the appointment of Mr. Clark as checkweigher was invalid on the ground that the notice of December 10, 1926, was inadequate because it was not addressed to all the workers paid by weight, and that it was not made clear to them that they were all entitled to vote. He further held that if, contrary to his opinion, the appointment of Mr. Clark was valid, he had been properly removed from office and the plaintiffs had been duly appointed in his place, and were entitled to succeed in the action.

The defendant appealed.

Mr. Fairfax Luxmoore, K.C., and Mr. A. Wilson appeared for the appellant; Sir Henry Slesser, K.C., and Mr. C. B. Fenwick for the respondents.

MR. JUSTICE SALTER.—This is an appeal from the judgment of the learned Judge of the Newcastle-on-Tyne County Court, in an action which was brought by the plaintiffs claiming to be the duly appointed checkweighers for a mine known as the Greenside Mine, in Durham, and claiming under two statutes, to which I will refer, to be paid by the defendant, a hewer employed in that mine, a proportion of their wages as checkweighers. The learned Judge gave judgment for the plaintiffs; the defendant appeals.

The question is whether upon the proper construction of the relevant parts of two statutes the plaintiffs are entitled to recover against the defendant. The matters raised are in regard to the due appointment and the rights to remuneration of checkweighers in coalmines. The statutes are: The Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, and the Coal Mines (Weighing of Minerals) Act, 1905. The relevant sections are: Section 13 (1) and section 14 (1) of the Act of 1887; and section 1 (2), (3), and (5) and section 3 of the Act of 1905.

Checkweighers had in fact been employed for generations. They had received some statutory designation in the Coal Mines Act of 1872. The Act of 1887 was passed to consolidate and amend that and other Acts. It is unnecessary to go behind the Act of 1887. Section 13 (1) of the Act of 1887 provides: "The persons who are employed in a mine, and are paid according to the weight of the mineral gotten by them, may, at their own cost, station a person (in this Act referred to as 'a checkweigher') at each place appointed for the weighing of the mineral, and at each place appointed for determining the deductions in order that he may on behalf of the persons by whom he is so stationed take a correct account of the weight of the mineral or determine correctly the deductions as the case may be." We were referred to the words "on behalf of the persons by whom he is so stationed." In my view that merely means on behalf of the employees of the mine who are paid by weight and are, therefore, concerned to have the weight and allowances correctly determined. I think the words mean no more than that. The power given is to station a person. Nothing is said so far in regard to the method of appointment, but the object of the section clearly is to give a statutory right to the men's representative, which the employer must respect. Section 14 (1), entitled "remuneration of checkweigher," provides: "Where a checkweigher has been appointed by the majority, ascertained by ballot, of the persons employed in a mine who are paid according to the weight of the mineral gotten by them, and has acted as such, he may recover from any person for the time being employed at such mine and so paid, his proportion of the checkweigher's wages or recompense, notwithstanding that any of the persons by whom the checkweigher was appointed may have left the mine or others have entered the same since the checkweigher's appointment, any rule of law or equity to the contrary notwithstanding." That is plainly a provision which gives a special right to a checkweigher who has been appointed by a majority, determined by ballot, of weight-paid workmen in the mine. It gives him a general right as against the weight-paid employees in the mine from time to time. The Act of 1905, by section 1, gives power to appoint deputy checkweighers and then makes provision for the proper ascertainment and notice to the employers of the appointment of checkweighers by the men. Subsection 2 of section 1 provides: "A statutory declaration, made by the person who presided at a meeting for the purpose of appointing a checkweigher or deputy checkweigher, to the effect that he presided at that meeting, and that the person named in the declaration was duly appointed checkweigher or deputy checkweigher, as the case may be, by that meeting, shall be forthwith delivered to the owner, agent, or manager of the mine, and shall be prima facie evidence of that appointment." Then subsection 3 provides: "Where the checkweigher or deputy checkweigher was appointed by a majority, ascertained by ballot, of the persons employed in the mine, and paid according to the mineral gotten, the declaration shall so state, and, if he was not so appointed, then it shall state the names of the persons by whom or on whose behalf the checkweigher or deputy checkweigher was appointed. Where a checkweigher or deputy checkweigher is appointed by such a majority as aforesaid, he shall be deemed to be appointed on behalf of all the persons employed in the mine who are entitled to appoint him." It is clear, therefore, that the statutory declaration which must be made by the chairman of the meeting which makes the appointment must state whether or not the person purported to have been appointed was appointed by a majority, ascertained by ballot, of all the weight-paid employees in the mine. It must say whether that was so or not. If it was so, then it is not necessary to enumerate the persons on whose behalf the checkweigher has been appointed, because he is deemed to have been appointed on behalf of all the weight-paid workmen. If he is not appointed by that majority thus ascertained, then the declaration must give the name of every person by whom or on whose behalf he has been appointed. It would seem to follow from those words that the persons by whom he is appointed are not necessarily the same as the persons on whose behalf he is appointed, but happily we are not called upon in this case to go any further into that point. Therefore, there are clearly, if not two classes of checkweighers, two methods of appointing a checkweigher, and according to the class to which they belong, or, perhaps, to the method of appointment, their rights are widely different. Subsection 5 provides: "When a checkweigher or deputy checkweigher is appointed by a majority, ascertained by ballot, of the persons employed in the mine, and paid according to the mineral gotten, he shall not be removed by the persons employed in the mine except by a majority, ascertained by ballot, of the persons employed and paid as aforesaid at the time of the removal." There are other methods of removing a checkweigher, not by the persons employed in the mine, but where it is a question of removing him by the persons employed in the mine, if he is a checkweigher appointed by a majority ascertained by ballot, he is not to be removed except by a majority ascertained by ballot, and that is a majority of all the people thus employed and paid at the time of the removal. Just as he is entitled to be paid by persons who were not in the mine when he was appointed, so he can be removed by persons who were not in the mine at that time. Section 3 provides : "All persons who are entitled, by the principal Act or this Act, to appoint a checkweigher or deputy checkweigher shall have due notice given to them of the intention to appoint a checkweigher or deputy checkweigher, by a notice, posted at the pithead or otherwise, specifying the time and place of the meeting, and have the same facilities given to each of them for the purpose of recording their votes, either by ballot or otherwise, in such appointment."

Those are the sections and subsections which we have to consider. They were considered in a Scottish case of Robert Addie and Sons' Collieries, Limited v. Sullivan (53 Sc. L.R., 600). It is only necessary to refer to a few words in the judgment of the Lord President. That case was concerned with the appointment of timekeepers in mines. At page 602 the Lord President says : "The procedure to be followed in the appointment of a timechecker is by statute declared to be the same as the procedure to be followed in the appointment of a checkweigher. No express statutory procedure is enjoined. It is very easy to infer from the provisions of section 1, subsections 2 and 3, of the Coal Mines (Weighing of Minerals) Act, 1905, what the essential steps must be. There must be a meeting of those entitled to appoint, at which the appointment is made. Of that meeting due notice must be given to all those who are entitled to make the appointment. The appointment may be made by the persons present at the meeting, whose names must subsequently be given, or it may be made by a majority of those in the mine entitled to appoint, that majority to be ascertained by ballot. When the appointment at a meeting has been made, the person who presided at the meeting must forthwith deliver to the mineowners a statutory declaration to the effect that he presided at the meeting at which the person named was appointed timechecker. If the appointment was made by majority, the statutory declaration must so say. If it was made by the persons present, the names of those persons must be given. And I ought to add that when a ballot is taken, equal facilities for recording their votes must be given to all those entitled to vote." Speaking with great respect, it may perhaps be that certain qualifications and additions have to be made to that passage if it is to be quite complete, but it is, I think, a very valuable outline of the practice with regard to the appointment of checkweighers in mines. It is plain that there must be a meeting. At that meeting the appointment may take place, or it may not. There may afterwards be a ballot. If a checkweigher is appointed at the meeting in the absence of ballot it is plain that he cannot be what I will call a majority checkweigher, because, quite apart from the numbers voting for him, the majority has not been ascertained by ballot, and therefore he cannot be a majority checkweigher. If a ballot follows the meeting the result of the ballot may be to appoint a majority checkweigher, or the result may be to appoint what I will call, for convenience, a minority checkweigher, as in this case Mr. Clark was. Mr. Clark was not a majority checkweigher, but he was appointed as the result of a ballot. In order, therefore, to appoint a majority checkweigher there must be first of all a meeting of which due notice must be given, and at which nomination for the ballot must be made. Then there must be after that a ballot, and that ballot must show a sufficient majority of the persons entitled to appoint. A majority checkweigher and a minority checkweigher have both a status under the statutes. They have a right, while their office lasts, to go into the cabin and check the weighing. In each case their appointment must be notified to the employers, who must recognize it. The majority checkweigher has certain important rights which are not enjoyed by a minority checkweigher. He is deemed to represent all the weight-paid workers in the mine. He has a right to payment from them, and by agreement the employers may deduct his wages from the wages of the weight-paid men. That, I think, is a summary of the effect of these sections.

Now I come to the facts of this case. This mine had, of course, been idle during the coal strike. That strike ended on December 1, 1926, and work was gradually recommenced at the mine. On December 10 there was exhibited at the pithead a notice of the intention to appoint a checkweigher. That notice was in the following terms :—

"GREENSIDE ALL GRADES UNION.

"Mr. Matthew Golightly and Mr. M. R. Clark are the two nominations for checkweighmen. The ballot will take place in the shelter on Saturday next, December 18, 1926, between the hours of 11 a.m. and 12.30 p.m.

"C. FORSTER, Secretary."

The men working at the mine, or most of them, had belonged, before the strike, to the Durham Miners' Union (I think that is the correct title of it) and after the strike, when the men began to go back to work, there was some difference of opinion between them as to whether work should be resumed or not, and on what terms, and so forth. A new union was, accordingly, formed called the Greenside All Grades Union, of which Mr. Forster was secretary. This notice is headed as I have said, and is signed by the Secretary, as I have said, and it was exhibited at the pithead. On December 18 accordingly a ballot took place. Eighty-four persons balloted for Clark. At that time there were 217 weight-paid workers in the mine, and, therefore, Clark's appointment was not an appointment by a majority. That is common ground. On December 30 a statutory declaration was made by Mr. John Robson, who had presided. He said : "A meeting of the persons who are entitled to appoint a checkweigher and employed at the Greenside Colliery in the County of Durham owned by the Stella Coal Company, Limited, was called by a notice posted at the pithead," and then follows the notice. Then : "I was present at and presiding at a meeting held on the said 18th December, 1926, at 12.30 after noon, in the Pit Shelter, when Matthew Richardson Clark, of 9, Meldon-terrace, Greenside, aforesaid, was appointed checkweigher on behalf of the workmen who were members of the Greenside Colliery All Grades Union." Then : "The names and addresses of the persons by whom or on whose behalf the said Matthew Richardson Clark was appointed checkweigher are set out in the list hereunto annexed and marked 'A.'" Then follows a list of, I think, 84 names, of which the defendant's is one. Therefore there was a statutory declaration in accordance with the statute regarding the appointment, and, in that case, the appointment by ballot, of a checkweighman who was not a majority checkweighman. Clark went into the cabin and began work on January 3, 1927. The cabin was occupied at that time by the two plaintiffs as a matter of convenience. They had been the checkweighers of the mine, I think, for years before the strike. When the strike ended they went back into the cabin by a kind of force of habit, but it is common ground that they had no legal right there. The strike had determined their appointment, and they had not been reappointed. On January 3 a notice was posted headed : "Weigh Fund Meeting," calling a meeting to get nominations for the post of checkweighman for January 5. The Weigh Fund is a fund which is not connected with any particular union, but is a fund through which the checkweigher is paid his wages. On January 5, accordingly, the meeting took place, and the two plaintiffs were nominated. On the 7th the ballot was held. Out of 264 at that time entitled to appoint, 176 voted for the plaintiffs, and therefore the plaintiffs were appointed by a majority of those entitled to appoint. On January 10 the statutory declaration was made. The plaintiffs, therefore, if that appointment was correct in form, were appointed on January 7 what I have called majority checkweighers. They were, no doubt, appointed as checkweigher and deputy checkweigher. After that, one or other of the plaintiffs, whichever one was on duty, was in the cabin, and Clark also was in the cabin. They were both there checking the weighing by the employers' agents on behalf of the men or some of the men. On February 2 notice was given of a meeting in reference to the election of Clark, and a ballot took place on February 5. The ballot paper is headed : "All hewers and fillers are entitled to vote. Are you in favour of M. R. Clark representing you as a checkweighman ? Yes. No. Put your cross in space beside the word you wish to vote for." The result of that ballot was that 63 voted for Clark remaining and 186 voted for his not remaining. There were at that time 350 weight-paid men in the mine. On February 7 there was another ballot. It is, I think, admitted that on this occasion at any rate all the due forms were observed. The plaintiffs were, as far as form is concerned, validly appointed majority checkweighers for that mine. In due course a statutory declaration was made accordingly. The plaintiffs' claim against the defendant begins on that day, February 7. They claim to be paid the sum—there is no question about the sum—which would be payable to them from the defendant if they are entitled to recover from him. Those are the facts of the case. The essential facts, I think, are that there was a purported appointment of Clark, with which I must deal, on December 18, and subsequently on January 5 and 7 there was a purported appointment of the plaintiffs. In the view I take of this case it is not necessary to consider what was the legal effect, if any, of the ballot which was held concerning the position of Clark on February 5. The statute contains no provision for the determination of the appointment of a minority checkweigher. My present view is that that ballot had no legal effect at all. It was no doubt held, in view of the provision that a majority checkweigher cannot be got rid of except by ballot. Clark never was a majority checkweigher. My present impression is that that ballot had no legal effect. Further, I need not consider the appointment of the plaintiffs on February 7. In the view I take that was an unnecessary form, inasmuch as, in my view, they had been duly appointed before. Therefore, the position is a purported appointment of Clark and after that a purported appointment of the plaintiffs.

Now the plaintiffs claim under section 14 (1) of the Act of 1887, which I have already read. The defendant was a person for the time being employed, and therefore, prima facie, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover, if they are duly appointed majority checkweighers. If so appointed they are entitled to be paid by all (section 14 (1) of the Act of 1887) and deemed to represent all (section 1 (3) of the Act of 1905). Now it is said that the plaintiffs were not duly appointed, or rather that they were not entitled to payment. It is said that they are not entitled to payment because the existence of Clark, with a following of 84 miners, who had desired that he should represent them and had appointed him for that purpose, deprives the plaintiffs of their right to a contribution from any of the persons who had appointed Clark ; and it is said further, apart from that point, that it is necessary, to entitle the checkweigher to recover under this section, that he should have acted as such. That is clearly so. It is said that they did not act as such, because, it is alleged, they refused to recognize or to check the weights, where tubs came up to be weighed, which had been got by members of the new union, the Greenside All Grades Union. That allegation was made by Mr. Forster in his evidence. It was not put to Mr. Bell, the plaintiff, when he was in the box, so that he had no opportunity of denying it. We were told that he would have denied it if he had been asked. The learned Judge does not deal with it in any way. It appears, I think, that if that was done by Bell it was done by him at the early period before he had any proper legal status in the cabin. I do not think we can deal with this appeal on the footing that the defendant has succeeded in showing any misconduct or non-performance of duty on the part of either of the plaintiffs, which would enable him to resist this claim as against either of them. I wish to say this most emphatically, that the majority checkweigher, in order to entitle him to these contributions, must, of course, act fairly for all the miners whose interests he is charged to represent, quite apart from the union to which they may belong. He is deemed by law to be appointed on behalf of all of them, and all their rights are in his hands. If it could be shown that he had failed to act fairly, or had refused to act at all, in the case of any weight-paid servant, he would certainly not be entitled to contribution from that man, and in my judgment he would not be entitled to any payment at all, because that would be a fundamental breach of his duty.

I pass from that point. The next point is this. The defendant says : I am not liable to pay the plaintiffs because I paid Clark ; Clark was duly appointed to represent me, and therefore I am not liable to pay the plaintiffs. I am not able to agree with either proposition. I have come to the conclusion that Clark's due appointment was not proved, first, because I think the notice does not comply with section 3 of the Act of 1905, which I have already read. First, I think that that was not a notice which gave proper notice of the intention to appoint a checkweigher to all the persons entitled to appoint. It was addressed to the Greenside All Grades Union. It was signed by the secretary of the All Grades Union. The evidence was that the ballot was attended only by members of the All Grades Union. The chairman's statutory declaration says that Clark had been appointed on behalf of the 84 men named, who are members of the All Grades Union. I have come to the conclusion that the appointment was not a proper one on that ground, and also on the further ground that the right to nominate is essential to an election by ballot. The election of a checkweigher is not necessarily by ballot. There must clearly be, first of all, a meeting at which election may take place, but, if not, then nomination will take place, and after that a ballot. In this case there is no evidence that any opportunity was given to anyone to take part in the nomination of Mr. Golightly and Mr. Clark. The notice states that they had already been nominated, and that all that remains to do is to choose which of those two shall be checkweigher. I have already referred to the Scottish case, and I think, therefore, that the election of Mr. Clark was not valid on this ground also—that due notice was not given to all entitled to record their vote either by ballot or otherwise. They had no opportunity to record any vote except by ballot.

Then it is said that if Mr. Clark was duly appointed he was validly removed. It is not necessary to determine that question. As I have said, my present impression is that if duly elected he was not validly removed.

It is further said that if he was duly elected his appointment is avoided by the subsequent appointment of the plaintiffs. That raises the question whether it is possible under this machinery to have two checkweighers or more in the cabin at the same time representing different groups of workmen; and in this case whether it is possible to have what I have called a majority checkweigher, who is deemed to represent them all, and one or more other checkweighers representing particular groups of workmen. It is not necessary to decide that question in view of the last point which I have to mention, but, as this may be a point of some importance, I will express my own present opinion about it. By the third subsection of the first section of the Act of 1905, which I have read, the duly appointed majority checkweigher is deemed to have been appointed on behalf of all the men, that is to say, on behalf of all the weight-paid men in the mine at that time, and he is there on behalf of all the weight paid men from time to time in the mine. It is, therefore, quite clear that he is to be deemed by all persons for all purposes to represent every weight-paid man, and these plaintiffs are deemed to represent the defendant and bound to protect his interests. I ask myself whether the statute does provide for such a thing as two checkweighers, representing the men, in the cabin at the same time. The checkweighers are concerned with the weight and with the allowance for stones, and so forth. Supposing one of the plaintiffs and Clark to be in the cabin at the same time and a truck comes forward which has been brought by one of the 84 men who have appointed Clark, I am perfectly clear that the plaintiff must do his duty with regard to that truck; he represents that miner, whatever his name may be; he must deal with it. It is said that Clark must deal with it, too. Supposing when the allowance for stones comes to be considered, the owners' representative says what allowance he thinks fair, and the plaintiff majority checkweigher agrees, but Clark does not agree, what is to happen then? What are the owners to do? The man who by law is deemed to represent the particular hewer agrees. Another man, whom he has specially appointed, does not agree. It appears to me that a practical question of great difficulty would arise. My general impression is that this Act does not contemplate the existence of a minority checkweigher alongside a majority checkweigher. My present view is that the due appointment of the plaintiffs cancelled and put an end to the appointment of Clark, even if that appointment had been originally valid.

It is not, however, necessary to decide this point, because I am quite clear on the last point which remains, that even if Clark were duly appointed and if he had remained the duly appointed representative of the 84 miners, that would not have afforded any defence to the defendant against this claim. The words of section 14, subsection 1, of the Act of 1887 are, to my mind, perfectly clear. It is impossible to read into it some such words as these: He shall be entitled to a contribution from every workman unless such workman shall be specially represented by some other checkweigher, or words of that sort. The words of the statute are perfectly clear. I think that the existence of a minority checkweigher, even if it were possible, would be no sort of defence to this claim.

For these reasons I think the learned Judge arrived at the right conclusion, and this appeal must be dismissed.

MR. JUSTICE CHARLES.—I agree, and I desire to add very few words. In my view the appointment of Clark was invalid inasmuch as the notice was a bad notice, and inasmuch as no opportunity was given for nomination. I further think that had his appointment been valid his manner of removal was invalid. If it be assumed that Clark's appointment was valid and also that Clark's removal was invalid, still there would be, in my judgment, no defence to the claim which is made here by these plaintiffs. When it is admitted and proved that the plaintiffs were properly appointed by a majority on a ballot they are deemed by law to represent all the wage earners in the mine and they are, as such representatives, entitled by section 14 (1) of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, to have their wages paid by contributions from each and every wage earner in the mine.

I agree in doubting whether the co-existence of minority and majority checkweighers is possible, but it appears to me that the checkweigher appointed by a majority on ballot has a claim, and a definite claim, under section 14 (1), independently of the existence or non-existence of a checkweigher appointed by a minority.

Leave to appeal was granted.

Mar. 19.

RECKITT v. BARNETT, PEMBROKE, AND SLATER, LIMITED.*

Action (Cause of)—Attorney—Cheque drawn on principal's account—Fraud on principal—Claim of principal to recover proceeds from payees.

The plaintiff gave a power of attorney to one T. and authorized him, in relation to the plaintiff's affairs, to draw cheques on the plaintiff's account at the bank without restriction. T. in fraud of the plaintiff drew a cheque on the plaintiff's account, in favour of the defendants, in part payment for a motor-car which T. had obtained from them for his own purposes on the hire-purchase system. The defendants knew that the cheque was drawn by T. as agent for the plaintiff. In an action by the plaintiff to recover from the defendants the proceeds of the cheque,

Held (Russell, J., dissenting), that the person to suffer for the plaintiff's misplaced confidence in T. was the plaintiff himself and not an innocent third party, and therefore the action failed.

* Reported by E. J. M. CHAPLIN and T. W. MORGAN, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Decision of Rowlatt, J. (44 The Times L.R., 63), reversed.

This was an appeal by the defendants from a decision of Mr. Justice Rowlatt (44 The Times L.R., 63) in an action tried by him without a jury.

The plaintiff in the action, Sir Harold James Reckitt, Bt., of 30, Rutland Court, Knightsbridge, S.W., claimed against the defendants, Barnett, Pembroke, and Slater, Limited, automobile agents, of Alexandra Garage, Old Barrack-yard, Knightsbridge, a declaration that he was entitled to recover from them the proceeds of a cheque for £200 drawn by Lord Terrington, as the plaintiff's attorney, to the order of the defendants upon the plaintiff's banking account with Barclays Bank Limited, at Hull, and wrongfully and fraudulently paid by Lord Terrington to the defendants in respect of a personal transaction between Lord Terrington and the defendants. The cheque in question was signed "Sir Harold J. Reckitt, Bt., by Terrington, his attorney."

The defendants, in addition to denying the conversion, denied that Lord Terrington had not the plaintiff's authority, and that the cheque was drawn without the plaintiff's knowledge. They further denied that Lord Terrington's authority to draw was confined to cheques in relation to the business or affairs of the plaintiff. And they did not admit that he was acting fraudulently or wrongfully. They further set up that the plaintiff was estopped from alleging any want of authority in Lord Terrington to draw the cheque and hand it to the defendants by reason of his own conduct and by reason of his want of reasonable care.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt held that as the defendants knew that the cheque was being used to pay the private debt of the agent the plaintiff was entitled to recover. He accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendants appealed.

Mr. Jowitt, K.C., and Mr. Austin Farleigh appeared for the appellants; Mr. Schiller, K.C., and Mr. R. J. Willis for the respondents.

Mr. Jowitt, K.C., in opening the appeal, said that the case raised the question which of two innocent persons should suffer for the fraudulent act of a third party. The plaintiff, who was absent from this country at the material time, had appointed Lord Terrington to represent him, and in 1915 had given him a power of attorney with very wide powers. That power had been subsequently amended on an objection taken by the bank, and was then extended in 1925 so as to be framed in very wide terms going beyond those set out in the earlier power, and giving him power to draw cheques on Sir Harold's account without restriction. Under the powers thus conferred Lord Terrington had power to enter into agreements, and he had acted as alter ego of the plaintiff.

In January, 1926, Lord Terrington entered into a hire-purchase agreement with the defendants to purchase a Rolls-Royce motor-car by monthly instalments of £175 until a total of £2,350 was reached. He surrendered a Daimler car and made a first payment of £350 as to which there was no question. When the first instalment of £175 became due he gave the defendants a cheque in February for £200 signed "Sir Harold J. Reckitt, Bt., by Terrington, his attorney." The name of Sir Harold Reckitt was put on faintly with a rubber stamp, but Lord Terrington's signature was in ink. Of the £200, £175 was said to represent the first instalment, the balance being for garage expenses. In June, 1926, the defendants became anxious to regain possession of the car, and obtained it upon payment of £100 to Lord Terrington.

The writ in the present action was issued in October on the return of Sir Harold Reckitt from India, who found that he had been defrauded of some £200,000. Mr. Justice Rowlatt had held that the cheque was accepted bona fide without negligence and certainly without dishonesty, but that as Lord Terrington had signed as agent the defendants were put on notice and must therefore suffer.

Counsel said that his argument might conveniently be stated under two heads, the first dealing with the question of authority and the other as to the effect of notice.

Lord Terrington had signed the cheque in question as attorney of Sir Harold Reckitt and purporting to act as his agent. The defendants had not asked to see the authority, but they were in the same position as if they had asked. What Lord Terrington did was within the precise terms of the power, and it could not be said that he was actuated by personal motives and was not acting on behalf of his principal. And here there was a finding that the precise thing done was within the limits of the authority given. Upon the question of authority he referred to Bank of Bengal v. Fagan (7 Moo. P.C., 61); Bryant, Powis, and Bryant, Limited v. La Banque du Peuple and the Quebec Bank (9 The Times L.R., 322; [1893] A.C., 170); Hambro v. Burnand and Others (20 The Times L.R., 398; [1904] 2 K.B., 10).

Counsel referred to Jones v. Gordon (2 App. Cas., 616), London Joint Stock Bank v. Simmons (8 The Times L.R., 478; [1892] A.C., 201); Thomson v. Clydesdale Bank, Limited ([1893] A.C., 282); John v. Dodwell and Co., Limited (34 The Times L.R., 261; [1918] A.C., 563); Corporation Agencies, Limited v. Home Bank of Canada ([1927] A.C., 318).

In this case, said counsel, the authority which had been given to Lord Terrington was quite general. His authority to sign cheques was not limited to cheques drawn in favour of persons with whom Sir Harold Reckitt had business relations. Lord Terrington had power to draw cheques without any restriction. The mere misuse of an authority did not take an act outside the limits of the authority.

He referred to Morison v. London County and Westminster Bank, Limited (30 The Times L.R., 481; [1914] 3 K.B., 356); and A. L. Underwood, Limited v. Bank of Liverpool and Martins (40 The Times L.R., 302; [1924] 1 K.B., 775); and Morison v. Kemp (29 The Times L.R., 70). The question was whether what Lord Terrington did was within the limits of his authority. The Judge had answered that question in the affirmative, and he (Mr. Jowitt) submitted that the Judge was right. If Lord Terrington's authority was wide enough to cover what he did, the question of notice became irrelevant.

With regard to conversion, that depended on an absence of title, which again raised the question of authority. If Lord Terrington had authority which covered what he did, he would be giving a good title to the cheque and there would be no conversion.

Mr. Schiller, for the respondent, said that Lord Terrington used his power of attorney for his own personal purposes and not for Sir Harold Reckitt's purposes. That was conversion. There was no defence to the plaintiff's claim.

Unless actual authority could be shown for Lord Terrington's act, there could be no defence to the action. The only authority which Lord Terrington could show in dealing with persons other than the bank was his power of attorney, and that only authorized him to transact business in the name and on behalf of his principal, Sir Harold Reckitt, and not on his own behalf and for his own purposes. Lord Terrington had no authority to draw the cheque in question in this case for his own purposes. From beginning to end of the transaction in question Lord Terrington was doing something which was outside his principal's business, and he could not give anybody any title to the money obtained by means of the cheque. Unless the defendants could make out some kind of estoppel they could show no title to the money.

The defendants ought to have looked at the power of attorney, and if they had done so they would have seen that it only authorized Lord Terrington to manage Sir Harold Reckitt's affairs. If the defendants chose to accept the cheque without making any inquiries they must take the consequences if the principal afterwards challenged the transaction. The proper interpretation of the power of attorney was that it excluded any act not done on behalf of Sir Harold Reckitt. The judgment appealed from was right.

Mr. R. J. WILLIS followed on the same side.

Mr. AUSTIN FARLEIGH replied.

LORD JUSTICE SCRUTTON, in his considered judgment, said :—This is an appeal from a judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt, which is said to affect a number of cases resulting from alleged misconduct of Lord Terrington. Having authority from Sir Harold Reckitt to draw cheques on the latter's banking account, Lord Terrington is alleged to have so misused this authority by drawing cheques for his own purposes that Sir Harold Reckitt has lost over £200,000. So far as Lord Terrington is concerned, allegations as to the state of his health, fortunately or unfortunately for him, detain him in France and prevent his offering any explanation of his conduct in an English Court ; but Sir Harold Reckitt is endeavouring to retrieve his losses by suing the persons to whom Lord Terrington gave the cheques which he drew on the Reckitt account. He has succeeded against the present defendants, who appeal.

The facts are comparatively simple. On February 9, 1915, Sir Harold Reckitt gave a power of attorney in favour of Lord Terrington, then Mr. Woodhouse, as his attorney, "to do all or any of the following things in my name and on my behalf" ; and then follows a long list of kinds of business which might be transacted under the power. The list did not include drawing cheques on Sir Harold Reckitt's account, and apparently some question was raised by the bank. Thereupon Sir Harold Reckitt on August 17, 1915, wrote to the bank the following letter, on the true meaning of which the case largely depends :—

"Dear Sirs,—Referring to the power of attorney which I have given in favour of Mr. Harold James Selborne Woodhouse, and which you have inspected, please note that I wish the power to cover the drawing of cheques upon you by Mr. Woodhouse without restriction.

"Yours faithfully,

"(Signed) HAROLD J. RECKITT."

Sir Harold's counsel say (1) "without restriction" only means without restriction as to amount ; and (2) no cheques should be honoured under this letter unless they were in relation to Sir Harold Reckitt's affairs. This interpretation appears to me to deprive the letter of any value to the bank. As cheques to all sorts of payees with no indication in them of the reason why they were drawn would be presented, the bank would have the necessity of inquiring into every cheque before they could safely honour it. I take the letter to be a power to Lord Terrington to draw cheques without restriction, so that the bank could safely honour them without inquiry and third parties could safely accept them without inquiry, Sir Harold Reckitt's position being : "I have full confidence in Lord Terrington, and take the risk of his abusing my confidence ; you, the bank and third parties, may safely act on his signature, without restriction, as binding me towards you. I shall have my remedy against him if he does abuse my confidence."

In the present case Lord Terrington bought a Rolls-Royce motor-car, in his own name, from the present defendants, on a hire-purchase agreement, and paid the second instalment on it by a cheque for £200 dated February 6, 1926, signed "Sir Harold Reckitt, Bt., by Terrington, his attorney." All the words except "Terrington" are impressed by a rather faint rubber stamp. The partner of the defendants who took the cheque did not notice the stamp, but the defendants are, of course, bound by the notice of procuration contained on the cheque, and their position is the same as if they had seen the power of attorney and letter amplifying it. The defendants presented the cheque and Sir Harold's bank paid it. When the frauds were discovered the defendants got back the motor-car by payment of £100, and Sir Harold sued them for the £200, which they were alleged to have converted.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt gave an oral judgment at the end of the case, as he had to leave for other work. His judgment is this : It is a fraud if the attorney uses his power to rob his principal, but if he does rob him by doing the very thing he is empowered to do, it is immaterial, for, as Lord Brougham says in Bank of Bengal v. Fagan (7 Moo. P.C., 61), "The abuse of authority does not invalidate the act."

I think this, so far, must be the meaning of the first page of the judgment, though the wording is ambiguous, for the learned Judge says in express terms : "The cheque as a cheque was good, there was power to draw it. It did not become a bad cheque because it was fraudulent ; it was good." The Judge then turns to the effect of the defendants' knowing that the cheque was paid to them in respect of an agreement on which Lord Terrington was personally liable. He said : "I am bound to say that when the matter was first opened to me I should have said at once : Certainly not ; I have been obliged to puzzle about it for a good many hours, but the precise authority upon the point has been produced this morning by Mr. Schiller, which was exactly what I expected. It is the case of John v. Dodwell and Co., Limited (34 The Times L.R., 261 ; [1918] A.C., 563)," and proceeded to hold that the defendant or a third person, taking from the agent a transfer of the property with knowledge of a breach of duty committed by him in making the transfer, holds what has been transferred to him under a transmitted fiduciary obligation to account for it to the principal. The finding is that, seeing the cheque is drawn on Sir Harold Reckitt's account for a personal liability of Lord Terrington, the defendants must know or be taken to know that there is a breach of duty on the part of Lord Terrington.

I do not follow why this should be so. From the terms of the letter Sir Harold Reckitt and Lord Terrington are obviously on terms of great personal confidence. Sir Harold Reckitt may be lending Lord

Terrington the money to buy the motor-car for himself, or presenting him with a motor-car ; or Lord Terrington may be buying the motor-car for Sir Harold as his principal, or to do Sir Harold's business by its help. I do not see how Sir Harold Reckitt, who places implicit confidence in Lord Terrington, as shown by the letter, can say to people who are taken to know of the letter, "You must be suspicious of Terrington, though you see I am not."

Looking at the matter apart from authority, I should have said that the letter was an actual authority, so far as the bank and third parties are concerned, to Lord Terrington to draw cheques without restriction, which the bank and third parties might act on as valid, and there was no sufficient knowledge or notice of abuse of the power to prevent third parties from keeping the proceeds of the cheque.

I have dealt with the matter so far without reference to authorities, though I quite appreciate that the two points—(1) the meaning of the letter, and (2) the effect of Lord Terrington's personal liability as notice—are points of first impression, on which other minds may take different views at sight. I think that the difference between the two points of view is this. One side starts with the proposition : "It cannot be within the authority given by a principal to his agent to rob him. If, therefore, you get an act done by an agent with his principal's property, for the agent's own benefit, it is outside his authority, and third parties cannot rely on it as binding the principal."

This view was supported by the language of Sir James Shaw Willes in Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank (L.R., 2 Ex., 259, at p. 265) : "The master is answerable for every such wrong of the servant or agent as is committed in the course of the service and for the master's benefit." From this it was said that if the agent was not acting for the master's benefit, but for his own, the principal was not answerable. This view was negatived by the House of Lords in Lloyd v. Grace, Smith, and Co. (28 The Times L.R., 547 ; [1912] A.C., 716) ; and I understand the other point of view to be : "The principal may be able to say to his agent : 'You have abused your authority ; account to me for the abuse.'"

But when he has put the agent in a position to do a certain class of act, and the agent has done an act of that class, apparently on behalf of his principal, but really for his own benefit, the principal cannot say to a third party who, without notice of the agent's abuse of authority, has accepted the act which the agent has been put there to do, "I am not liable, because my agent though purporting to act for me acted for his own benefit." The apparent authority is the real authority.

The difference may be tested by considering in the present case what would happen if Sir Harold Reckitt sued the bank to recover the amount which they paid on this cheque. Surely the bank could say : "You told us that Lord Terrington could sign cheques on your account without restriction. You cannot make us liable for honouring a cheque signed by him because in abuse of your confidence he was using your authority for his own benefit." But the counsel appearing before us, each of whom said that his case was too plain for argument and took a long time in arguing it, buried the Court under authorities, to a few of which I must refer.

I take the cases of Bank of Bengal v. Fagan (supra), Bryant, Powis, and Bryant, Limited v. La Banque du Peuple and the Quebec Bank (9 The Times L.R., 322 ; [1893] A.C., 170, especially the passage at p. 180), Hambro v. Burnand and Others (20 The Times L.R., 398 ; [1904] 2 K.B., 10), and Lloyd v. Grace, Smith, and Co. (supra) to decide that if the act done under a power of attorney is warranted by the terms of the power it is immaterial that the agent is in fact abusing the power by using it for his own purposes. Lord Brougham said in Bank of Bengal v. Fagan (supra) that the apparent authority was the real authority ; and though the endorsee's title must depend upon the authority of the endorser, it could not be made to depend upon the purposes for which the endorser performed his act under the power.

In the first two cases the fraudulent agent endorsed, but for his own purposes ; in the first case he used the endorsed bill as security for his personal debt, but his principal was held liable.

Lord Justice Mathew, in the argument in Hambro v. Burnand and Others (supra), used with great force this illustration : "I go into a bank and find a cashier behind the counter : I pay into the bank, through the cashier, money : must I ask the cashier : 'Are you receiving this for the bank, or going to put it into your own pocket ?'"

The fact that he is doing the act he has authority to do for his own purposes is immaterial to me, who see him doing an act he has apparent authority to do on behalf of his principal. It is different where, as I said in A. L. Underwood, Limited v. Bank of Liverpool and Martins (40 The Times L.R., 302 ; [1924] 1 K.B., 775, at p. 791), the agent, having done a neutral act which is consistent with proper action under his power, such as endorsing in blank in his principal's name a cheque payable to his principal, then does an independent act of paying the cheque into his private account instead of into the principal's account. But as I also said, if he does the act he is apparently authorized to do to create privity between the principal and third parties, the case falls within the authorities cited above.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt was saved from "a good many hours' puzzle," as he says, by the production at the last moment of the case of John v. Dodwell and Co., Limited (supra). It is unfortunate that the parallel case of Corporation Agencies, Limited v. Home Bank of Canada ([1927] A.C., 318) was not produced at the same time. In John v. Dodwell and Co., Limited (supra), the agent had authority to conduct the business of his principals and sign cheques for the purpose of the business. He signed cheques under this power and used them to pay for his private share transactions. The Privy Council held that the persons taking the cheques had notice of the terms of the power, and the nature of the business told them that the power was being abused ; so the principal recovered. In the Corporation Agencies case (supra) a director and secretary, in fraud of the company, drew cheques on the company's account as director and secretary, and they were paid into the director's private account at the defendant bank, which presented them to the company's bank, which paid the money. It was held that the company could not recover from the bank, as the director had apparent authority to sign cheques, and the fact that he paid them into his own account was not notice of irregularity, especially as the company's bank paid them. The distinction between the two cases seems to turn on the finding of notice or no notice.

On the question of conversion argued before us, in the Corporation Agencies case (supra), though conversion was raised on the pleadings, the bank was not held to have converted the proceeds. In Morison v. London County and Westminster Bank, Limited (30 The Times L.R., 481 ; [1914] 3 K.B., 356), where the bank would have been held guilty of conversion but for their defence under the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, the power was to draw for the purposes of the business. The cheques were drawn per pro and used for the private account of the agent. It appears to me that conversion would follow, but for the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, from notice of the power and the use made of the cheques. In the present case the power is unlimited, "without restriction," and has the effect, in my opinion, of enabling the bank and third parties knowing of the power safely to take the cheques, unless they have clear notice of fraud. There are, as suggested, also several honest explanations of the transaction without assuming or suspecting fraud.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the person to suffer from Sir Harold Reckitt's excessive but misplaced confidence in Lord Terrington must be Sir Harold Reckitt himself, who allowed Lord Terrington to sign cheques without restriction, and not innocent third parties who took such cheques. In my opinion the appeal should be allowed and judgment entered for the defendants with costs here and below.

LORD JUSTICE SANKEY.—The plaintiff in this case claimed (1) a declaration that he was entitled to recover from the defendants the sum of £200, being the proceeds of a cheque dated February 6, 1926, drawn by one Lord Terrington as the plaintiff's attorney to the order of the defendants upon the plaintiff's banking account at Hull and wrongfully and fraudulently paid by the said Lord Terrington to the defendants in respect of a personal transaction between the defendants and Lord Terrington; and (2) damages for conversion.

The defendants contend that Lord Terrington had authority to draw the cheque in question, that they gave value for it in good faith and became holders in due course, and that they are not guilty of any conversion. The learned Judge decided in favour of the plaintiff and the defendants appeal.

The facts are as follow: In 1915 the plaintiff, being minded to go to France, gave a power of attorney, dated February 9, 1915, to one Harold Woodhouse, now Lord Terrington. In the following August Messrs. Barclays Bank at Hull pointed out that the said power did not authorize Mr. Woodhouse to draw cheques upon Mr. Reckitt's account. This was brought to the knowledge of the plaintiff, who thereupon wrote the letter of August 17, 1915. [His Lordship read the letter which is set out above, and continued.]

On January 4, 1926, Lord Terrington entered into a hire-purchase agreement with the defendants for the purchase of a motor-car. It is admitted now that the motor-car was for his own use. He gave to the defendants a cheque for £200, which is now in question. The cheque was signed, "Sir Harold J. Reckitt, Bt. By Terrington, his attorney."

That part of the signature which referred to Sir Harold Reckitt was stamped with a rubber stamp, but the signature of Lord Terrington was written in ink and was bold and clearly visible. When the defendants took the cheque they did not in fact observe the nature of the signature.

The learned Judge finds that the defendants took the cheque of the principal, that is, the plaintiff, from the agent, that is, Lord Terrington, in liquidation of the agent's private account. In these circumstances, he held that the case was governed by that of John v. Dodwell and Co., Limited (34 The Times L.R., 261; [1918] A.C., 563), and gave judgment for the plaintiff. Many cases were referred to in argument, the result of which may be stated in general terms.

If the agent in the course of his employment on behalf of the principal had apparent authority to draw the cheque in question, the principal is liable thereon to a person who takes it for value, in good faith, and without notice that the agent has exceeded his authority. To the above must be added that a banker has certain special protection under the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882.

Apparent authority means that the agent apparently acted within the scope of his authority and is to be gathered from a consideration of the form of the cheque itself, from any relevant documentary evidence and from the surrounding circumstances. The agent's motive in drawing the cheque is immaterial, for the fact that he abuses his authority does not destroy the authority. In such cases the apparent authority is the real authority.

With regard to the question of notice, it is to be observed that the equity doctrines of constructive notice are not to be imported into commercial questions.

It would be a dangerous ambition to try to formulate a definition of what constitutes notice. It is impossible to foresee every case and every contingency, but it may be stated that, while mere negligence to observe is not sufficient to create liability, a wilful disregard of the facts may be. Therefore, in approaching the present circumstances, two questions emerge for consideration: (1) Had Lord Terrington apparent authority to draw the cheque? (2) Was there anything in the transaction which gave the defendants notice that Lord Terrington had exceeded his authority?

Where the authority relied on is contained in a written document alone, the answer to the first question will depend upon a proper construction of it.

With regard to the cases cited, the result in each of them depended on the true answer to one or both of the questions, but the judgments must be read in reference to the particular facts of each case. Hambro v. Burnand and Others (20 The Times L.R., 398; [1904] 2 K.B., 10); and Lloyd v. Grace, Smith and Co. (28 The Times L.R., 547; [1912] A.C., 716), were both cases in which it was held that the fraudulent agent acted within the scope of his authority and so bound his principal, although he acted in his own interests and not in those of the principal. In both cases the motive of the agent was held to be immaterial.

In Bryant, Powis and Bryant, Limited v. La Banque du Peuple and the Quebec Bank (9 The Times L.R., 322; [1893] A.C., 170) Lord Macnaghten says at page 180: "The law appears to their Lordships to be very well stated in the Court of Appeal of the State of New York in President, &c., of the Westfield Bank v. Cornen (37 N.Y.R. (10 Tiff.), 322), cited by Mr. Justice Andrews in his judgment in another case brought by the Quebec Bank against the company. The passage referred to is as follows: 'Whenever the very act of the agent is authorized by the terms of the power, that is, whenever by comparing the act done by the agent with the words of the power, the act is in itself warranted by the terms used, such act is binding on the constituent, as to all persons dealing in good faith with the agent; such persons are not bound to inquire into facts aliunde. The apparent authority is the real authority.'"

The case of Morison v. London County and Westminster Bank, Limited (30 The Times L.R., 481; [1914] 3 K.B., 356), illustrates the protection given to bankers in such cases by the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. There the agent had acted outside the scope of his authority and his dealings with the cheque amounted to a conversion for which his assignee, the bank, would have been liable but for their statutory protection. See per Lord Reading, at page 364, quoting Lord Ellenborough in M'Combie v. Davies (6 East, 538, at p. 540) : "A man is guilty of a conversion who takes my property by assignment from another who has no authority to dispose of it ; for what is that but assisting that other in carrying his wrongful act into effect."

A. L. Underwood, Limited v. Bank of Liverpool and Martins (40 The Times L.R., 302 ; [1924] 1 K.B., 775) was a different case ; the first line of defence was that the agent was acting within his apparent authority, and that line of defence failed (see per Lord Justice Scrutton, at pp. 791, 792), and it was held on the facts also that the act of the agent in paying his principal's cheques into his private account was so unusual as to put the defendants on inquiry, and that they lost their statutory protection.

The Common Law rules with regard to what is notice in such cases are set out in Jones v. Gordon (2 App. Cas., 616) ; and London Joint Stock Bank v. Simmons (8 The Times L.R., 478 ; [1892] A.C., 201).

In Jones v. Gordon (supra, at p. 629) Lord Blackburn said : "But if the facts and circumstances are such that the jury, or whoever has to try the question, came to the conclusion that he was not honestly blundering and careless, but that he must have had a suspicion that there was something wrong, and that he refrained from asking questions, not because he was an honest blunderer or a stupid man, but because he thought in his own secret mind—I suspect there is something wrong, and if I ask questions and make farther inquiry, it will no longer be my suspecting it, but my knowing it, and then I shall not be able to recover—I think that is dishonesty."

In London Joint Stock Bank v. Simmons (supra, at p. 221) Lord Herschell, L.C., said : "One word I would say upon the question of notice, and being put upon inquiry. I should be very sorry to see the doctrine of constructive notice introduced into the law of negotiable instruments. But regard to the facts of which the taker of such instruments had notice is most material in considering whether he took in good faith. If there be anything which excites the suspicion that there is something wrong in the transaction, the taker of the instrument is not acting in good faith if he shuts his eyes to the facts presented to him and puts the suspicions aside without further inquiry."

John v. Dodwell and Co., Limited (supra) proceeded apparently on both grounds, (1) that the agent held a power of attorney which enabled him to conduct the business of the respondents and that in doing what he did he was not acting within the scope of his authority (per Lord Haldane at p. 567), and (2) that the appellants were affected with notice (per Lord Haldane at p. 568).

In the later case of Corporation Agencies, Limited v. Home Bank of Canada ([1927] A.C., 318) Lord Wrenbury points this out at page 324, where he says : "In John v. Dodwell and Co., Limited (supra), Williams, the manager for Dodwell and Co., who was authorized by Dodwell and Co., the plaintiffs (respondents), to draw, and who drew the cheques on the plaintiffs' account, employed the defendants (appellants) as his brokers and gave them cheques on the plaintiffs' account in payment for shares, and they received them with knowledge that Williams, without apparent authority, was drawing for his own purposes on the plaintiffs' funds. The case turned, as does the present case, on knowledge. If there was no knowledge, it has no application."

Now applying these principles to the present case, how does the matter stand ?

I. Upon the question of authority. This depends on a proper construction of two documents—namely, the power of attorney and the letter of August 17, 1915. Both must, I think, be looked at in order to see what powers the plaintiff gave and what powers Lord Terrington received. In this I am confirmed by the statement of claim which pleads that the power of attorney was amplified by the letter. A power of attorney is to be construed strictly. The recitals show its objects and control its meaning, and general words only refer to the special powers. Such a power gives only such authority as it expressly or by necessary implication confers, Bryant, Powis and Bryant, Limited v. La Banque du Peuple and the Quebec Bank (supra) ; and Jonmenjoy Coondoo v. Watson (9 App. Cas., 561), which were referred to in argument and are cited in Bowstead on Agency with other cases at page 73 of the seventh edition.

It will be observed that the power of attorney itself contains very wide authority. Nor is it confined to some particular business whose necessities might in some way control the authority. This is not, for example, a case where an agent with power of attorney to manage and draw cheques for a bootmaker's business drew a cheque to pay for many tons of sugar for future delivery. Over and above that the letter is in the very widest terms. It confers the right to draw cheques "without restriction."

It is not possible, in my view, to limit the words "without restriction" by holding that they are to be restricted to the meaning "without restriction as to amount." It is perhaps a trite observation to make that they mean what they say—they indicate that Lord Terrington has power to draw cheques on plaintiff's account for any purpose whatever.

In my view, on a true construction of the two documents, it was within the scope of Lord Terrington's authority to draw the cheque in question.

On this point Mr. Justice Rowlatt was apparently of the same opinion.

II. Had the defendants notice which ought to have put them on inquiry ? This again depends mainly, if not entirely, on two documents, (1) the cheque, and (2) the hire-purchase agreement.

It is argued for the plaintiff that the cheque showed that Lord Terrington was only agent and the hire-purchase showed that the transaction was a private one. But there are many situations in which, although the hire-purchase was in Lord Terrington's name, it really might be a transaction on behalf of the plaintiff. Suppose, on seeing the cheque made out in that form, the defendants had asked for the authority. They would have seen the very wide terms of the power of attorney, and the unrestricted authority to draw cheques. In my view, the mere fact that in this case the defendants did not ask to see and did not see the documents cannot place them in a worse position than if they had done so. It is not as if there were any evidence that they said that they would rather not inquire into the documents. If they had seen them they would have been justified in coming to the conclusion that Lord

Terrington had authority to draw the cheque and there was no obligation on them to inquire further. "It would be impossible, as it seems to me, for the business of a mercantile community to be carried on, if a person dealing with an agent was bound to go behind the authority of the agent in each case, and inquire whether his motives did or did not involve the application of the authority for his own private purposes." Per Sir Richard Henn Collins, M.R., in Hambro v. Burnand and Others (supra, at p. 20).

It is on this point that I part company with the learned Judge. He says: "The question here all turns upon the effect of the circumstance that it was drawn by an agent on his principal's account and the defendants knew that it was being used to liquidate the private debt of the agent."

In my opinion, there was no circumstance which ought to have put the defendants upon any further inquiry than that of asking to see the power of attorney and the letter, and if they had seen them they would have been justified in coming to the conclusion that Lord Terrington had authority. John v. Dodwell and Co., Limited (supra) is distinguishable and has no bearing on this case. In that case, on the facts, there was an absence of authority in the agent, and notice to the person taking the cheque. In this case it is just the opposite.

In my view, the appeal should succeed and judgment should be entered for the defendants with costs.

MR. JUSTICE RUSSELL, in giving a dissenting judgment, said: In this case I take a different view from that adopted by the other members of the Court. The success or failure of this appeal depends, in my opinion, upon the effect which the letter addressed to Barclays Bank at Hull, and dated August 17, 1915, had upon the power of attorney dated February 9, 1915. The letter, be it observed, is addressed by the plaintiff to the bank alone, not (as in the case of the power of attorney) to the world at large; and, although its existence and contents were known to the attorney, the original remained in the possession of the bank. The power of attorney, on the other hand, is under seal, and necessarily under seal, in view of some of its provisions. It remained, and necessarily remained, in the custody of the attorney. The letter to the bank remained in the custody of the bank, and could not have been produced by the attorney except with the cooperation of the bank.

The primary question for determination is whether, in these circumstances, Lord Terrington had power to draw cheques on the plaintiff's banking account in favour of his (Lord Terrington's) creditors; or, indeed, in favour of whomsoever he might think fit, regardless of the question whether in drawing any cheque he was acting in the management of the plaintiff's affairs. If he had such a power, then he was entitled to draw the cheque in question here; and the plaintiff can obtain no relief against the defendants either on the footing of conversion or otherwise.

If, on the other hand, his power to draw cheques only authorized him to draw cheques for the purpose of managing the plaintiff's affairs, then, in my opinion, the plaintiff is entitled to relief on the authority of John v. Dodwell and Co., Limited (34 The Times L.R., 261; [1918] A.C., 563).

It is, I think, clear that under the power of attorney (apart from the letter) Lord Terrington's powers are carefully and in terms limited to acting in the management of the plaintiff's affairs. Of the first ten clauses all except No. 9 are in terms confined to the plaintiff's affairs. Clause 9 is expressed in more general terms, but from the context it must be limited in the same way. Clause 11 is in terms limited to "the purposes aforesaid," and is the only clause under which express authority might be said to be conferred to draw cheques on the plaintiff's banking account.

The plaintiff's bankers, apparently, were unable to accept the power of attorney as sufficient authority to draw cheques, and at their request the letter of August 17, 1915, was written and sent to them. (His Lordship read the letter and continued.) It is said that the plaintiff's statement to the bank that he wishes the power of attorney to cover the drawing of cheques upon them by Mr. Woodhouse "without restriction" operates to enlarge the power conferred by the power of attorney, and that to such a sweeping extent that Lord Terrington became authorized to do what he liked with the plaintiff's money, even to the extent of applying the plaintiff's money in payment of his own personal debts. It would need words unambiguous and irresistible to enable me to attribute such a meaning and intention to a power of attorney. The primary object of a power of attorney is to enable the attorney to act in the management of his principal's affairs. An attorney cannot, in the absence of a clear power so to do, make presents to himself or others of his principal's property. Thus it has been held by the Court of Appeal that a power to mortgage does not enable an attorney to execute a mortgage of the principal's property to secure an existing debt of the principal. Such a mortgage was held to be invalid (In re Bowles, 31 L.T., 365).

In the present case we are asked to hold that a document under seal addressed to the world at large is completely altered in its scope by virtue of a letter addressed to the plaintiff's bankers and to no one else. We are not, in my opinion, justified in treating the matter as though a clause to the same effect as the letter had been added to the power of attorney. The letter appears to me to be only a document whereby the plaintiff's bankers would be protected as against the plaintiff in honouring cheques drawn by the attorney. Even assuming that this letter is not to be treated as a communication made solely to the principal's bank for the purpose of enabling them, without any question, risk, or liability, to honour all cheques drawn by the attorney, but is to be treated as forming part of the power of attorney, I am unable to find words which would justify me in holding that it conferred a power on the attorney to apply the principal's moneys for his private purposes. The words "without restriction" can be sufficiently satisfied by interpreting them to mean without restriction as to amount.

Powers of attorney are to be construed strictly, and where authority to do an act purporting to be done under a power of attorney is challenged, it is necessary to show that on a fair construction of the whole instrument the authority in question is to be found within the four corners of the instrument, either in express terms or by necessary implication. Bryant, Powis and Bryant, Limited v. La Banque du Peuple and the Quebec Bank (9 The Times L.R., 322; [1893] A.C., 170). Construing the power of attorney and the letter on these principles, I am unable to find, either in express terms or by necessary implication, authority in the attorney to draw cheques on the plaintiff's bankers in favour of the attorney's personal creditors.

If I am right in this view, the plaintiff is entitled to succeed. The defendants took the cheque with knowledge that it was drawn in their favour by an attorney. They are accordingly fixed with the same knowledge of the attorney's lack of authority as they would have had if they had called for evidence of authority and had had produced to them, not only the power of attorney, but also the letter. Further, they knew that the cheque was handed to them in settlement of the attorney's private debt to themselves, composed partly of an instalment due in respect of Lord Terrington's motor-car and partly in respect of Lord Terrington's garage bill.

In these circumstances the case appears to me to be completely covered by the decision of the Privy Council in John v. Dodwell and Co., Limited (supra). In that case John and Co. (share and produce brokers in Colombo) had two accounts in their books : one with Dodwell and Co., Limited, who were merchants with a branch at Colombo, the other with one Williams in respect of dealings in shares. Williams was the manager at Colombo for Dodwell and Co., Limited, and held a power of attorney which enabled him to draw cheques on his principals' bankers for the purposes of his principals' business. For the purpose of paying his personal indebtedness to John and Co., Williams drew cheques on his principals' bankers payable to John and Co. and signed Dodwell and Co., Limited, R. H. Williams, Acting Manager [or Manager]. John and Co. received the amounts of the cheques and credited them against the personal indebtedness of Williams. Lord Haldane, in delivering the judgment of the Board, held that John and Co. were liable to refund the amounts to the principals on the ground that they received and held the money under a transmitted fiduciary obligation to account for it to the principals. He further held that according to English law there had been a conversion by John and Co., and he said : "On the face of these [transactions] Williams was, without showing authority to do so, drawing cheques for his own purposes on the respondents' funds at their bankers. If it turned out that the respondents had not allowed him to do so, and would not ratify his action, the notice which the appellants had got through the agency of their clerks of what was prima facie a breach of duty on his part would deprive them of all title to hold the cheques as against the respondents, if the latter should challenge the transaction. For when an agent is entrusted by his principal with property to be applied for the purposes of the latter, and to be accounted for on that footing, he is, by virtue of doctrines which apply under the law of Ceylon, as they do under the law of this and other countries, in a fiduciary position, and any third person taking from the agent a transfer of the property with knowledge of a breach of duty committed by him in making the transfer holds what has been transferred to him under a transmitted fiduciary obligation to account for it to the principal. That there is no privity of contract between him and the principal does not make any difference, for the title does not rest on contract. The property belongs to the latter in the contemplation of Courts which administer equity, whether in the form in which the Court of Chancery in this country applied it to trusts, or in the form which later developments of the Roman law have recognized. It is therefore clear that, excepting in so far as the lapse of time or some other special circumstance afforded them a defence, the appellants could not withhold the money in question from the respondents if they chose to claim it. The respondents did claim it, and commenced an action on January 10, 1913, to enforce their claim. The claim as formulated in their plaint was alternative. In the first alternative they expressed it as for money had and received ; in the second, as for a conversion ; in the third, as for cheques received with notice of Williams' fraud. In the judgments in the Courts below it was the first and second of these alternative forms of claim which received attention. Their Lordships are of opinion that the course so taken was unnecessary. It would have been, in their opinion, sufficient to have disposed of the case on the footing that the money was, in the circumstances, what may properly be called trust money, consistently with principles of jurisprudence based in part, though not wholly, on a foundation of Roman law. If the appellants received such money with notice of the trust affecting it, they would be bound to account for it to the respondents. It is on this footing that their Lordships propose to deal with the question. The case was not disposed of in this way in the judgments below, but the facts proved and the pleadings admit of its being thus dealt with. It may well be true that the principles of the English common law have been so far recognized in the jurisprudence of Ceylon as to admit of the same question being treated as one of a conversion having taken place. If so, undoubtedly there was a conversion according to these principles."

That case was distinguished in the later Privy Council decision in Corporation Agencies, Limited v. Home Bank of Canada ([1927] A.C., 318). The distinction between the two cases is clear. In the Corporation Agencies case (supra), cheques drawn by a company (and signed according to the company's regulations) in favour of a director (whose name appeared as one of the two signatories to the cheque) were endorsed by him and paid to the credit of his private account with the Home Bank, which collected the moneys in due course from the company's bankers. The company sought to recover the moneys from the Home Bank, but failed on the ground that the Home Bank had no notice that the company's cheques (though signed by the director as one of the signatories) were not properly drawn in his favour ; nor was there any duty on the Home Bank to inquire. In John v. Dodwell and Co., Limited (supra), and in the case under appeal, the person sued had notice of the limited authority of the attorney and of the fact that the authority was being exercised not in relation to the principal's affairs but for the purpose of paying a debt due by the attorney to the defendants.

Much reliance was placed by the appellants on the case of Bank of Bengal v. Fagan (7 Moo. P.C., 61), and in particular upon the remarks of Lord Brougham at page 74 : "But it is said that the power was given to do the acts in question on the donor's behalf. This is really only saying, that what the agent is to do, he is to do as representing the principal ; as doing it on behalf of, or in the place and in the right of, the principal. But it is further said that, even if the expression be read as only amounting to this, the endorsement is to be only made for the benefit of the principal, and not for the purposes of the agent. We do not see how this very materially affects the case, for it only refers to the use to be made of the funds obtained from the endorsement, not to the power ; it relates to the purpose of the execution, not to the limits of the power itself, and though the endorsee's title must depend upon the authority of the endorser, it cannot be made to depend upon the purposes for which the endorser performs his act under the power."

In that case the power was not in terms limited to transacting the business of the principal. The attorney had endorsed certain negotiable instruments and handed them to his bankers as security for a personal loan. The question for decision was whether the endorsement passed the property in the negotiable instruments, the negligence of a party taking a negotiable instrument not fixing him with notice of defective title. The question resolved itself into this : had the attorney power to endorse ? If he had, the property passed, and it was immaterial to consider the attorney's intention in endorsing. Lord Brougham's remarks must be taken in reference to the case which he was deciding. In the case under appeal the act done is signing a cheque in favour of a payee who was a creditor of the attorney and not a creditor of the principal. That act the attorney had, in my opinion, no authority to do, and Lord Brougham's remarks appear to me inapplicable to the present case.

The authorities cited to us in the argument were very numerous. I will say a few words about such of them as appear to me relevant to the present case. Bryant, Powis and Bryant, Limited v. La Banque du Peuple and the Quebec Bank (supra), involved two decisions. In the appeal against the Banque du Peuple, the principal was held not to be indebted to the bank in respect of a loan contracted in its name by its attorney for his own purposes, because upon the true construction of the power of attorney the attorney had no power at all to borrow money on behalf of the company. In the appeal against the Quebec Bank the company was held liable to that bank in respect of two bills of exchange endorsed in the name of the company by the attorney and discounted by the bank in the ordinary course of business. The power of attorney in terms authorized the attorney " to endorse bills of exchange . . . and other documents which shall in the opinion of the said attorney require the signature or endorsement of the company." The Board held that the fact that the attorney abused his authority could not affect bona fide holders for value of negotiable instruments endorsed by him in accordance with his authority. That case appears to me to be of no assistance in favour of the defendants in the present case. The authority to endorse was clear ; the motive which prompted the endorsement was immaterial.

The same is to be said of Hambro v. Burnand and Others (20 The Times L.R., 398 ; [1904] 2 K.B., 10). There the authority to do the particular act, viz., to sign a guarantee policy, was, upon the facts as found in that case, clearly within the agent's authority, and the principals were bound notwithstanding that the agent abused his authority for his own purposes.

Some of the authorities cited were cases where the party sought to be made liable was a bank which had collected the proceeds of an unauthorized cheque. Such cases are complicated by additional defences which may be raised under the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. The case of Morison v. London County and Westminster Bank, Limited (30 The Times L.R., 481 ; [1914] 3 K.B., 356) is of this class, but is of importance here. In that case the principal gave authority to Abbot to draw cheques for the purpose of the principal's business on the principal's banking account at the National Provincial Bank, and to sign them in his (Abbot's) name, per pro. Bruce, Morison and Co. He further gave directions to the National Provincial Bank to honour cheques so drawn. Abbot opened a private account with the defendant bank and paid into it various cheques drawn on the principal's banking account and signed by him, per pro. Bruce, Morison and Co., which were collected in the ordinary way by the defendant bank, and the proceeds were placed to the credit of Abbot's private account. The principal sued the defendant bank for the amount of the cheques so collected as damages for conversion of the cheques or alternatively as money had and received. The defendants were held not liable as to part of the claim by reason of section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, and as to the rest of the claim by reason of ratification by the principal. The actual decision appears to have no relevance here, but Lord Reading in his judgment makes it clear (a) that by reason of the direction and authority given by the principals to their own bankers to honour all cheques signed by Abbot, per pro. Bruce, Morison and Co., no claim could be made against those bankers (see p. 363) ; and (b) that the defendant bank had no valid title to the cheques because Abbot issued the cheques to them in fraud of Bruce, Morison and Co., and that, but for the special defences available, the defendants would have been liable for conversion of the cheques, the measure of damages being the moneys lost by Bruce, Morison and Co. and wrongfully received by the defendant bank (see pp. 364, 365). The judgment of Lord Reading appears to indicate that no valid title to the cheque would pass to the defendants in the present case. It is further of interest to observe that the direction to the principal's bankers to honour all cheques signed by Abbot, per pro. Bruce, Morison and Co., was not treated as operating to enlarge Abbot's authority, but only as operating to relieve the principal's bankers from liability. Reference may also be made to the decision of Mr. Justice Darling in Morison v. Kemp (29 The Times L.R., 70).

With regard to the case of Lloyd v. Grace, Smith and Co. (28 The Times L.R., 547 ; [1912] A.C., 716), no one can now dispute that a principal is liable for the fraud of his agent acting within the scope of his authority, whether the fraud is committed for the benefit of the principal or for the benefit of the agent. The agent must, however, be acting within the scope of his authority.

In the present case there is no question of the agent defrauding a third person. The question is a very difficult one, viz., can a personal creditor of the agent retain, as against the principal, moneys paid by the agent to the creditor in satisfaction of his debt, which moneys belong to the principal and are known by the creditor to belong to the principal. No useful purpose will, I think, be served by referring to other authorities cited. None of them appear to me inconsistent with or contrary to the decision in John v. Dodwell and Co., Limited (supra). The result of this appeal depends upon the construction and effect of the plaintiff's letter to his bankers. That letter did not, in my opinion, operate to confer a power on the attorney to draw cheques in favour of his private creditors. The case is covered by the decision in John v. Dodwell and Co., Limited (supra), whether the plaintiff's claim be put on the footing of conversion by the defendants, or on the footing of a fiduciary obligation binding upon them. In my opinion, the appeal fails and should be dismissed.

K.B. Div. (Talbot and Humphreys, JJ.) 1928. Mar. 23.

BERNARD v. WILLIAMS.*

Vendor and Purchaser—Deposit—Work to be done by vendor—Extension of time—Work not completed — Rescission — Recovery of deposit—When time of the essence of the contract.

The plaintiff contracted to purchase from the defendant a lease of a house and garage, and paid a deposit of £50, and a further sum of £50 on account of a premium of £150, on October 28 and 29, 1926, respectively. The plaintiff, as the defendant knew, intended to use the premises for the business of a garage proprietor, and the defendant agreed to clear away the hedge and trees in front of the house before the time for completion, which was originally fixed as "on or about December 6, 1926," but was subsequently extended to December 15. On December 10, it being apparent that the defendant could not do the work he had undertaken by December 15, the plaintiff rescinded the contract and claimed the return of the money.

Held, that in the circumstances time was of the essence of the contract, and the plaintiff was entitled to recover the money.

This was the plaintiff's appeal from a judgment given for the defendant in the Croydon County Court. The facts of the case are fully stated in the reserved judgment of the Court.

Mr. J. B. Matthews, K.C., and Mr. S. K. de Ferrars appeared for the appellant; Mr. F. P. M. Schiller, K.C., and Mr. T. F. Davis for the respondent.

The following judgment was read by MR. JUSTICE TALBOT.—This is the judgment of the Court.

This was an action for the recovery of two sums of £50, money received by the defendant to the plaintiff's use, as on total failure of consideration.

The money in question was paid by the plaintiff to the defendant in connexion with a proposed grant to the plaintiff by the defendant of a lease of certain premises at Thornton Heath. The first payment was on October 28, 1926, and the second the next day.

On that day, October 29, the plaintiff signed a document in these terms: "I, Sarah Ellen Bernard, of Railway View, Willington, near Derby, hereby agree to purchase a lease of 7, 14, 21 years of the house and garages now known as 'Homefield' for the sum of £350 per annum, and a premium of £150, possession of the premises to be given to Mrs. Bernard on or about the 6th day of December, 1926." It was common ground between the parties that the time for possession was subsequently extended by mutual agreement to December 15.

The first payment of £50 was made by way of deposit, and it is expressed to be so received in a receipt by the defendant's agents.

The place was, in October, 1926, used partly as a residence and partly as a garage or garages. It had, no doubt, until a few years ago, been an ordinary residence and grounds, and in October, 1926, there were still in front of the house a carriage drive, a hedge and some trees, shrubs, and flower beds. The plaintiff intended to develop the garage business there, and she required the defendant, and he agreed, to remove the hedge, trees, &c., and lay concrete on the space in front of the house, so that petrol pumps could be placed there. It was admitted that the plaintiff paid the second sum of £50 in consideration of the defendant's promise that he would proceed at once with this work.

On November 8, 1926, the defendant's solicitors wrote to the plaintiff as to the preparation of a lease. They were referred to Mr. Russell, then the plaintiff's solicitor, and the draft passed between the solicitors. Ultimately the form of it was agreed, but it was never executed, as the plaintiff refused to execute it on the ground now to be explained.

The plaintiff's case is that she always stipulated that the work above mentioned should be done before the time came for giving her possession, and that it was to make sure of this that she paid the second £50. The evidence was that the work would take at least a fortnight.

On November 22, more than three weeks after that payment, the plaintiff wrote to the defendant's agent as follows: "Dear Mr. Griffiths, I am writing you about the place at 267, London-road, Croydon. My husband has been over twice on a Saturday afternoon and expecting to see some alterations on the forecourt of the house, making ready for us to lay in pumps, &c., as soon as we get possession, which your agreement stated on the 1st or 6th December. This job was to be made and that was the understanding that Mr. Williams wanted another £50 before he commenced to make alterations. The time is now getting so short and my husband has his pumps all ready, and if it has to be done after we get there, well, there is a big loss just at a good time coming Christmas. It is no fault of yours, I am sure. I might as well say now that I shall not sign anything further unless I hear of the progression of the front and I must be able to have the place at date stated. My solicitor received the lease for approval and did lengthen the time to December 15, that was meeting it halfway. I am all prepared here for an early removal"—it is written from near Derby—"My notice expires as my place is taken. Hoping, dear Mr. Griffiths, that you are quite well and thanking you in advance I remain, yours faithfully, S. E. Bernard." To this there is a reply dated November 24: "Dear Mrs. Bernard, Mr. Griffiths is at present unable to attend business; he has had a very bad attack of bronchitis. I 'phoned to him to-day and he tells me he is quite sure if you have signed the lease Mr. Williams will immediately place the work in connexion with the frontage in hand. Yours faithfully, For and on behalf of Tiller and Co., Limited." On November 26, the plaintiff's solicitor wrote to the defendant's solicitors as follows: "Dear Sirs, I thank you for your letter of yesterday's date and herewith return draft lease approved. Your client's agent undertook that all front hedges and trees should be removed and the whole of the front concreted and gravelled, and it was upon this understanding that my client paid the second deposit on account of the premium. This work must, therefore, be completed before the lease is signed or a written undertaking given by your client that he will carry out the work before the end of this year."

There appears to be no evidence that he had any authority from the plaintiff to accept an undertaking to do the work by the end of the year instead of doing the work before the lease was signed, but this seems to be immaterial, as on November 30 the defendant's agent assured the plaintiff that the contractor had actually been instructed to proceed with the work. The question of an undertaking to do it before the end of the year accordingly never arose.

On December 8 the plaintiff's solicitor wrote to the defendant's solicitors as follows : " Dear Sirs, I shall be pleased to receive lease for execution by my client and to know that all the work which your client undertook to have done has been completed." Nothing, so far as appears, was done and on December 10, it being then impossible to finish the work by the 15th, the agreed date for giving possession, the plaintiff's solicitor wrote to the defendant's solicitors this letter : " My client has been in to-day and she informs me that the arrangement was that possession should be given and the work completed on the 1st instant, and that it was expressly upon that understanding that she paid the second £50. Your client has broken the agreement, and my client is not now prepared to proceed with the matter, and has instructed me to ask for the return of the £100 that has already been paid. I return engrossment of lease." The word " 1st " in the first sentence of that letter appears to be a slip.

The question is whether the plaintiff was entitled, on December 10, to a return of the £100 which she had paid, on the footing that the consideration for the payment had wholly failed.

The Judge has decided that, time not being of the essence of the contract, it was not a condition that the work should be done by a particular date so as to entitle the plaintiff to rescind when it had become impossible that it should be done by that date.

The plaintiff says that this is wrong because : (1) A purchaser's deposit is always recoverable if there is either no valid contract or a valid contract, performance of which has become impossible by the vendor's default; (2) There has been no valid contract, the contract being for the sale of land and there being no memorandum of it sufficient to satisfy section 40 of the Law of Property Act, 1925 ; (3) If there is a sufficient memorandum, the performance of the contract has become impossible by the defendant's default ; (4) The equitable rule about time does not apply because there is no contract of which specific performance could be ordered ; (5) If the rule does apply, time was, in the circumstances of this case, of the essence of the contract.

The defendant contends that : (1) There is a sufficient memorandum of the contract ; (2) If not, specific performance of the contract can be ordered because it has been partly performed ; and he claims an opportunity, if necessary, of proving such part performance ; (3) The agreement to do the work in front of the house was not a condition of the contract, but a collateral agreement ; (4) Time was not of the essence of the contract according to the rule of equity applied by section 41 of the Law of Property Act, 1925.

We take the last point first. The learned County Court Judge lays it down, that it is " quite clear that as between vendor and purchaser . . . the time for completion has never been treated as of the essence of the contract unless in the clearest terms it is made so." In our opinion this is too strongly stated. The true rule is stated by Lord Cairns in Tilley v. Thomas (L.R., 3 Ch., 61, at p. 67) : " A Court of Equity will indeed relieve against "—there is clearly a clerical error in the report there, as is pointed out by Lord Atkinson in the case of Stickney v. Keeble ([1915] A.C., 386, at p. 402). Probably it ought to read : " A Court of Equity will indeed relieve against a breach of contract, and enforce specific performance, notwithstanding a failure to keep the dates assigned by the contract, either for completion, or for the steps toward completion, if it can do justice between the parties, and if (as Lord Justice Turner said in Roberts v. Berry, 3 De G., M. & G., 284), there is nothing in 'the express stipulations between the parties, the nature of the property, or the surrounding circumstances' which would make it inequitable to interfere with and modify the legal right. This is what is meant, and all that is meant, when it is said that in equity time is not of the essence of the contract." As is said by Lord Justice Turner in Roberts v. Berry (supra) at page 292, a time is necessarily fixed for the completion of a sale " in order to give legal rights," and if nothing more appears, equity will enforce the contract although performance of it at the stipulated time has become impossible ; but if there is anything in the contract itself, or in the circumstances, which shows that there was real importance in the time fixed, and that the party who insists upon it stipulated for it not as a mere formality but with the intention of binding the other to it, then specific performance will be refused, at any rate where this was brought to the knowledge of the party claiming performance, since there is no equity in compelling a party to a contract to dispense with something for which he deliberately bargained and on the performance of which he relied.

This is the principle of all the authorities, and in our opinion it is plain from the facts of this case that the plaintiff did attach great importance to getting possession not later than December 15, 1926, and to the completion of the work in front of the house before she went into possession, and that the defendant was fully aware of this. This appears from the fact that the plaintiff paid in advance £50 of this premium for the lease (in addition to a deposit of £50) on October 28 and 29 in consideration of the defendant's promise to put the work in hand at once, and from her letter to the defendant's agent of November 22, in which the importance to her of getting possession on the day mentioned, and of having the work which the defendant had promised to do finished before that day, was forcibly stated, when there was still ample time for the defendant to do what was required. It is clear that even when time was not originally of the essence of the contract it may be made so by a later notice, either before or after the day named in the contract, requiring completion by a particular day, if the time allowed is reasonable. (See Benson v. Lamb, 9 Beavan, 502 ; Parkin v. Thorold, 16 Beavan, 59 ; Crawford v. Toogood, 13 Ch.D., 153.) Merely extending the time originally fixed does not waive the condition as to time when it is of the essence of the contract (Barclay v. Messenger, 43 L.J., Ch., 449) ; and indeed, here the substitution of a definite date, December 15, for the indefinite " on or about " December 6 is additional proof of the importance attached by the plaintiff to the time for completion. It is, in truth, rather a precise definition than an extension of the time.

Even, therefore, if there was a contract which the plaintiff could have been ordered to perform specifically if the defendant had been able to give possession of the premises with the agreed alterations on December 15, we are of opinion that, as this was impossible on December 10, the plaintiff was entitled on that day to treat the contract as at an end, and to recover the £100 which she had paid under it.

It was urged for the defendant that the learned Judge has found that the agreement to do this work was collateral to the contract for the lease, and not part of it, and that this being a finding of fact binds this Court on appeal. We do not think that the Judge did find that this agreement was collateral in the sense alleged by the defendant. He says : "The bargain between the parties is, taking the agreement as set out in the written agreement and the collateral agreement according to the oral evidence, that possession of the premises in their repaired condition should be delivered to the plaintiff on December 15." It is evident, we think, that he uses the word "collateral" merely to distinguish the written memorandum from the agreement proved orally. In our opinion his finding, as to what the contract was, was the only one possible on this evidence. And it follows, if, as we hold, time was of the essence of the contract, that, it being impossible to give "possession of the premises in their repaired condition" on December 15, the plaintiff was entitled, as soon as that fact was ascertained, to treat the contract as at an end and recover what she had paid.

These reasons are sufficient for the decision of the appeal, and it is not necessary to discuss the question whether there was here a memorandum sufficient to satisfy section 40 of the Law of Property Act, 1925. It is enough to say that we should have very great difficulty in saying that there was.

We doubt, however, very much whether, if we took a different view of the question whether time was of the essence of the contract, the plaintiff could found a case upon the absence of a sufficient memorandum. We cannot think that a purchaser can rescind a contract and recover his deposit, as against a vendor who is willing to complete, merely because there is no writing to satisfy section 40. (See Jones v. Jones, 6 M. & W., 84 ; Thomas v. Brown, 1 Q.B.D., 714.) It appears to us from these cases, and on principle, very difficult to accept the judgment in Casson v. Roberts (31 Beavan, 613), cited by counsel for the plaintiff, as an accurate statement of the law. (See Williams on "Vendor and Purchaser," 3rd Edition, vol. 2, page 842.) Nor are we prepared to accept the contention that the equitable rule as to time cannot apply unless there is a sufficient memorandum to satisfy the statute. No doubt the rule will only apply when a Court of Equity would, before the Judicature Acts, have applied it ; that is, to contracts such as are within the equitable jurisdiction of specific performance, and in circumstances in which a Court of Equity would have applied the rule : Stickney v. Keeble (supra). But that case is no authority for saying that, merely because by section 40 of the statute a contract cannot be proved, the equitable rule as to time will not apply to it if the contract is such, and the circumstances surrounding it are such, that, apart from the question of evidence (with which alone this statute is concerned), specific performance of it could be decreed. It seems unreasonable that a purchaser could hold a vendor to the letter of his bargain as to time on the ground, not that time is of the essence of the contract in equity, but that if the vendor were suing for specific performance the statute would be a good defence. We do not see how, in an action for recovery of a deposit, a plaintiff can rely on the Law of Property Act, 1925, section 40, at all, if the defendant is ready and willing to complete, and is, apart from the statute, entitled to specific performance.

The appeal is allowed, and judgment must be entered for the plaintiff for the amount claimed, with costs here and below.

GENERAL MEDICAL COUNCIL v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE.

ENGLISH BRANCH COUNCIL OF THE GENERAL MEDICAL COUNCIL v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE.*

Revenue — Income-tax — Charity — General Medical Council—Whether entitled to exemption—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), s. 37.

The General Medical Council is not a body established for charitable purposes only, and therefore is not entitled, under s. 37 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, to exemption from income-tax on the income from its funds.

Decision of Rowlatt, J. (44 The Times L.R., 117), affirmed.

These were appeals from a decision of Mr. Justice Rowlatt (44 The Times L.R., 117) on cases stated by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax, who had dismissed the appeals.

The General Medical Council claimed exemption from income-tax, in respect of income on funds belonging to them, for the four years ending on April 5, 1924, under section 37 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, on the ground that they were a charity within the meaning of the Income Tax Acts.

The Council, whose full name was the General Council of Medical Education and Registration of the United Kingdom, was first established under the Medical Act, 1858, and was incorporated by section 1 of the Medical Council Act, 1862. Its composition had been altered from time to time, and it now consisted of 38 members, of whom 18 were appointed by Universities in the United Kingdom, nine by the medical corporations, and five by his Majesty in Council, while six were elected by members of the medical profession. From the establishment of the Council until April 5, 1924, all the members of the Council were members of the medical profession, but after April 5, 1924, a lay member was appointed by his Majesty in Council.

The preamble of the Medical Act, 1858, was as follows :—"Whereas it is expedient that persons requiring medical aid should be enabled to distinguish qualified from unqualified practitioners : Be it therefore enacted, &c." Section 3 of the Act established the Council, and section 6 set up branch councils for England, Scotland, and Ireland, to which branch councils the Council was empowered to delegate powers and duties, and through which the Council did a great deal of its work.

The chief duties imposed by the Act on the Council were (a) to keep and publish a register of qualified practitioners ; (b) to exercise oversight of medical studies and examinations ; and (c) to publish the British Pharmacopœia.

Every person who possessed the required medical qualification was entitled on payment of certain fees to have his name entered on the Medical Register, which was published by the Council. The name of a practitioner might be struck off the register in certain circumstances.

By section 31 of the Act of 1858 and by section 6 of the Medical Act, 1886, it was provided that any person registered under the Act should be entitled, according to his qualifications, to practise medicine or surgery and to demand and recover in any Court of law reasonable charges for professional aid, advice, or visits, and for any medicines or medical or surgical appliance.

By section 34 of the Act :—"The words 'legally qualified medical practitioner' or 'duly qualified medical practitioner,' or any words importing a person recognized by law as a medical practitioner or member of the medical profession, when used in any Act of Parliament, shall be construed to mean a person registered under this Act."

An unregistered person was not prohibited from practising medicine, but he suffered certain disabilities. For example, he could not recover fees by legal process, he could not give a valid certificate, he was debarred from certain appointments, and he was unable to join in practice with a registered practitioner in such a way as to lead the public to believe that he was "covered" by the qualifications of the latter. By section 35 of the Act a registered person was, if he so desired, exempt from service on juries and at inquests.

Sections 18 to 21 of the Act gave power to the Council to require information from medical teaching and examining bodies regarding the courses of study and examinations to be gone through to obtain the qualifications granted by them and empowered a representative of the Council to be present at examinations. If it appeared to the Council that the course of study and examinations for any qualification were not such as to secure that persons obtaining the qualification possessed the requisite knowledge and skill for the efficient practice of their profession, the Council was empowered to make representations to the Privy Council and the Privy Council might order that the possession of the qualification in question should no longer confer a right on its holder to be registered under the Act. The powers given by the Act of 1858 to the Council in the matter of supervising medical examinations were expanded by sections 2, 3, and 4 of the Medical Act, 1886.

The Special Commissioners held that the Council was not established for charitable purposes only, and they refused the claim.

The Special Commissioners also refused a similar claim by the English Branch Council of the General Medical Council.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt affirmed the decisions of the Special Commissioners. The Councils appealed.

Mr. Vaisey, K.C., and Mr. Raymond Needham appeared for the appellants ; the Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.), J. H. Stamp, and Mr. R. P. Hills for the respondents.

The MASTER of the ROLLS, in giving judgment, said that the two appeals came before the Court on two different cases, but they had both been decided in the same way, and the decision in one governed the other. The first appeal sought exemption from income-tax of part of the income of the General Medical Council. It could not be too often or too plainly stated that there was no general exemption of a charity from income-tax under the Income Tax Acts, but only in respect of certain classes of income, such as tax on the annual value of land or buildings under Schedule A, and tax on dividends and interest of public funds under Schedule C. Those exemptions were granted by section 37 of the Income Tax Act, 1918.

He had pointed out in Brighton College v. Marriott (41 The Times L.R., 165 ; [1925] 1 K.B., 312 ; affirmed in 42 The Times L.R., 228 ; [1926] A.C., 192) the importance of the precise exemption. It must be shown that the income was the income of a body of persons established for charitable purposes only, and it was exempted only so far as it was applicable to such purposes.

It was argued that the powers entrusted by the Medical Act, 1858, to the General Medical Council were, shortly : (1) To keep the Medical Register ; (2) to supervise medical studies and education ; and (3) to edit and issue the British Pharmacopœia ; and that those objects were of general public benefit, and therefore that the Council was a charity and entitled to exemption. It was not very plain how the preamble was to be read, and it was doubtful how far the duties imposed by statute on the Council could be said to be for the general benefit of the public. The Court must not overlook the fact that the Special Commissioners found that the Council was not a charity, and on a question of degree, which was a question of fact, the Court was probably bound by the finding of the Special Commissioners. But he would go farther, and, giving the Council the benefit of the doubt, say that one, at any rate, of the main objects of the Council was for the benefit of the public.

The accounts for certain years had been made part of the case, and from those of 1922 it appeared that the receipts came from a small sale of the Medical Register—an expensive book—from the £990 interest on War Loan, which was the subject of the appeal, and finally, from the contributions of the branch councils of England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland imposed on the branches by the General Council and paid by the individual members. More than a quarter of the expenditure was paid away in fees to the members of the Council, and there was a considerable bill for printing the Medical Register. It appeared to him very difficult to say that the income of the Council was applicable, and had been applied, to charitable purposes only.

His Lordship then referred to the well-known classification of charities by Lord Macnaghten in Special Commissioners of Income Tax v. Pemsel (7 The Times L.R., 657 ; [1891] A.C., 531, at p. 583) and continued : It had often been pointed out that the last or fourth category was illustrative rather than exhaustive—a trust beneficial to the public was not necessarily a charity at all. Lord Justice Lindley observed in In re Macduff—Macduff v. Macduff (12 The Times L.R., 452 ; [1896] 2 Ch., 451) that Lord Macnaghten's classification was taken from Lord Romilly's argument in Morice v. Bishop of Durham (10 Ves., 522, at p. 531) but with the omission of the words—"which is the most difficult"—as introductory to the fourth category. Lord Justice Lindley said (at p. 467) : "In deciding the case we must fall back upon the Statute of Elizabeth, not upon the strict or narrow words of it, but upon what has been called the spirit of it, or the intention of it. As Lord Eldon says, this Court has taken great liberties with charities ; but the liberty is always restricted by falling back or professing to fall back upon the Statute of Elizabeth."

It was not said that the work of the General Medical Council was anywhere within the first three categories of Lord Macnaghten's judgment ; it could only be said to be beneficial to the community within the meaning of the fourth category.

What were "charitable purposes" ? He need only refer to two cases, one on each side of the line —Society of Writers to the Signet v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (2 Tax Cas., 257) and Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Forrest (6 The Times L.R., 456 ; 15 App. Cas., 334). In the first the society was held to be one for the benefit of the Scottish legal profession, and not exempt ; in the other it was found that the promotion of science in the abstract was the main object of the institution, and that it was, therefore, entitled to exemption. No doubt the duties and objects of the General Medical Council were all for the public benefit ; but could it be said that they were so in the same sense as in Forrest's case (supra) ? He found it impossible to accept that contention. The public interest was served, but the professional interest was also served. Was the body formed for the promotion of objects beneficial to the medical profession ? He was bound to answer that question in the affirmative.

He was in full agreement with the judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt, and the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

LORD JUSTICE SARGANT said that he was of the same opinion. Mr. Vaisey had insisted strongly that the main object of the Council was the benefit of the public, and that the benefit of the medical profession was only an incidental object. The Solicitor-General maintained the opposite view. The preamble to the Medical Act, 1858, was neutral, as the expediency to which it referred might be either public or professional. But it was quite clear that the objects of the Council as set out in the case were solely and simply professional objects, though they might incidentally be also beneficial to the general public. The first and main thing to be looked at was the keeping of the Medical Register, as an accurate list of qualified medical practitioners, free from all persons who had been guilty of improper or unprofessional conduct ; then came the duty of keeping up the standard of medical education ; and thirdly the duty of publishing the British Pharmacopœia—a list of drugs professionally available. The whole scheme of the Medical Acts was to regulate the profession of medical men, and if the objects of the Council were of benefit to the public that was quite a secondary result. Very much the same thing could be said of the rules which regulated the admission of other professional men to the learned professions, such as solicitors, barristers, and others. The distinction between such a body and a purely learned society such as the Institution of Civil Engineers was well expressed by Lord Watson in his judgment in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Forrest (6 The Times L.R., 456 ; 15 App. Cas., at pp. 350, 351). Here the Court clearly had an institution of the same nature as the Society of Writers to the Signet. But even if its main object was to benefit the public, it might not and probably would not be a charity.

LORD JUSTICE LAWRENCE agreed. He thought that the case, when the Acts were investigated, was fairly plain. The main object and function of the Council was to supervise and regulate the medical profession. The business of the Council was conducted by members who were elected for that purpose and all members were paid fees for attending the annual general meetings. The funds of the Council were obtained by levying fees from the medical practitioners entered on the register. No doubt it was for the benefit of the public that the medical profession should be regulated and supervised, but it was also of the greatest benefit to the profession itself. The objects of the Council, which were mainly the protection of the medical profession, were far remote from the charitable objects mentioned in and the spirit of the Statute of Elizabeth. The plain answer to the appellants' contention was that the General Medical Council was not a charity, and that the income sought to be exempted from tax was not income to be applied to charitable purposes only. The appeal failed and must be dismissed.

AUCHTERONI AND CO. v. MIDLAND BANK, LIMITED.*

Bankers—Bill of exchange—Acceptors' direction to pay—Indorsement in blank—Payment to payees' servant—Fraud of servant—Claim by payees against bank—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict., c. 61), s. 59.

The plaintiffs having sold goods drew a bill on the purchasers for the price. The purchasers accepted the bill and instructed their bank, the defendants, to pay the bill when due. When the bill became due the plaintiffs indorsed it in blank and handed it to their cashier to take to their own bank for collection. The cashier, however, took it to the defendants and asked for cash over the counter. He received the cash and absconded.

In an action for negligence, breach of trust, and conversion,

Held, (1) that, as there was no privity of contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants, there was no duty to take care and therefore no negligence ; (2) that the defendants did not hold the money in trust for the plaintiffs ; (3) that, as the demand for payment over the counter was, on the evidence, not so unusual that the defendants' suspicions ought to have been aroused, the defendants were protected by s. 59 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 ; and that therefore the action failed.

This case had been begun at Liverpool Assizes and had been adjourned for further hearing in London. It raised a question as to the duty of a bank in paying a bill of exchange.

Mr. Singleton, K.C., and Mr. N. J. Laski appeared for the plaintiffs ; and Mr. Kennedy, K.C., and Mr. A. J. Hodgson for the defendants.

The plaintiffs were Liverpool merchants. In December, 1923, they supplied certain goods to the Nigerian Products Company. They drew a bill for £876 9s. payable to themselves in three months, and by way of payment for the goods the Nigerian Products Company accepted the bill and gave their bankers, the present defendants, instructions to pay the bill at maturity. When the bill became due in March, 1924, the plaintiffs handed it to their cashier, one Woodward, to take it to their own bank and have it collected, but Woodward, instead of carrying out his duty, went to the defendant bank and presented the bill and asked for payment over the counter. The plaintiffs had indorsed the bill in blank before handing it to Woodward, and the defendants, without waiting to make inquiries, handed the money to him, and he absconded with it. The plaintiffs brought this action to recover the money from the bank. They based their claim on three grounds : (1) That the defendants had held the money in trust for them, or as money had and received, and had improperly parted with it ; (2) that the defendants in parting with the money without inquiry had been guilty of negligence ; and (3) that in parting with the money the defendants had been guilty of conversion.

By their defence the defendants pleaded a general denial, and said that as the person who presented the bill for payment was the plaintiffs' servant it was not negligence on their part to let him have the money. They also said that by indorsing the bill in blank and handing it to Woodward the plaintiffs had estopped themselves from denying that Woodward was authorized to receive the money.

Mr. SINGLETON, for the plaintiffs, submitted that as the defendants had the money in hand, and had been instructed by their customers, the Nigerian Products Company, to meet the bill, they were holders of the money to the use of, or in trust for, the plaintiffs. Further, there had been many previous bill transactions between the plaintiffs and the defendants, and in none of them had payment ever been made over the counter in this way. As the procedure in this case was so unusual, the defendants should have been suspicious. They were put on inquiry and were, in fact, negligent. And, further, if the document had not been a negotiable instrument there would clearly have been a conversion, and the fact that it was a negotiable instrument did not in the circumstances make any difference. The defendants did not negotiate the bill ; they merely paid the money over to a person who had no title to it, and they were accordingly guilty of conversion, A. L. Underwood, Limited v. Bank of Liverpool and Martins (40 The Times L.R., 302 ; [1924] 1 K.B., 775).

Mr. KENNEDY, for the defendants, submitted that the claim for money had and received would only lie where there was privity of contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants, and here there were no relations between the plaintiffs and the defendants. As to the allegation of negligence, there could only be negligence where there was a duty to exercise care, and here there was no duty on the part of the defendants towards the plaintiffs. With regard to the allegation of conversion, the payment made by the defendants was perfectly regular. The bill was indorsed in blank and was therefore, by section 8 (3) of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, payable to "bearer," who, by section 2, was defined as "the person in possession" of the bill, not, be it noted, the person in lawful possession. Section 59 said that payment in due course was payment to the holder in good faith and without notice, and by section 2 the "holder" included the bearer. The defendants here paid the bearer of the bill in good faith and without notice that he was not entitled to payment. The effect of an indorsement in blank was shown by section 34 (1) of the Act.

When a bill was presented to a banker he must make up his mind at once whether to pay it or not ; he was not entitled to wait and make inquiries (Paget on Banking, 2nd Ed., p. 99). There was nothing in the evidence to suggest any lack of good faith on the part of the defendants. Section 90 of the Act showed that good faith could co-exist with negligence ; so even if it were held that the defendants had been negligent, which was not admitted, that would be immaterial. If the plaintiffs succeeded here no bank could ever safely pay a bill in cash across the counter. If, however, the bank refused to pay, its customer could complain that it had injured his credit.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT, in giving judgment, said that in the ordinary course of business the plaintiffs sold goods to the Nigerian Products Company and drew a bill on that company for the price ; the company accepted the bill and instructed their bank, the defendants, to pay the bill when due and to debit their account with the amount. When the bill became due a cashier of the plaintiffs, one Woodward, put it before one of the partners in the plaintiff firm for indorsement in the usual way ; the partner indorsed it in blank and handed it back to Woodward to take it and pay it into the plaintiffs' bank and have it collected. Woodward, however, took it to the defendants and asked for cash over the counter and received a note for £500, two notes for £100, five for £20, and the balance in smaller amounts. He then absconded. He had perpetrated a similar fraud with regard to other bills and cheques, and subsequently he was arrested, tried, and sent to penal servitude.

The evidence showed that there was now a bankers' clearing house at Liverpool and that it was unusual for bills to be presented there except through a bank.

The plaintiffs in this action based their claim on three grounds :—(1) That the defendants had been negligent ; (2) that the defendants had been holders of the money to the use of the plaintiffs ; and (3) that the defendants had been guilty of conversion.

As to the claim on negligence, he held it to be ill-founded. There could only be negligence where there was a duty to take care, Scholfield v. Earl of Londesborough (12 The Times L.R., 604 ; [1896] A.C., 514) ; London Joint Stock Bank, Limited v. Macmillan and Arthur (34 The Times L.R., 509 ; [1918] A.C., 777, at p. 823) ; and in a case of this kind such a duty could only arise where there was privity of contract between the parties, and there was no privity of contract here between the plaintiffs and the defendants. That defence, therefore, failed.

The second claim, that the defendants held the money to the use of the plaintiffs, was equally baseless. The defendants never notified the plaintiffs that they had received funds from the acceptors of the bill to be held for the credit of the plaintiffs, and the defendants did not hold the money on the plaintiffs' behalf (Hill v. Royds, L.R., 8 Eq., 290 ; section 53 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882). The order given to the defendants by the acceptors to pay the bill at maturity was a matter which solely concerned the acceptors and the defendants, and the plaintiffs could not take advantage of it.

The third claim, that on which the plaintiffs had mainly relied, was based on conversion. The defendants had exercised dominion over the bill in a manner adverse to the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs said that that amounted to conversion as explained in Underwood's case (40 The Times L.R., 302 ; [1924] 1 K.B., 775, at pp. 790-1). To that the defendants replied that as the bill was a negotiable instrument they were protected by section 59 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. The plaintiffs answered that section 59 could not protect the defendants because the circumstances of the payment were so unusual that the defendants could not say that they had made the payment without notice of irregularity. The test of the standard of care required from a banker was shown in Commissioners of Taxation v. English, Scottish, and Australian Bank, Limited (36 The Times L.R., 305 ; [1920] A.C., 683). Was the demand for payment over the counter in this case so unusual that the defendants' suspicions ought to have been aroused ? The evidence showed that, though such a course was unusual, it was not unknown, and on this point the language in the judgments in Bank of England v. Vagliano Brothers (7 The Times L.R., 333 ; [1891] A.C., 107, at pp. 127-8 and at p. 157) was material. If the contention of the plaintiffs was right, no banker could ever safely pay a bill over the counter without first making inquiries. If there were special circumstances, as, for instance, if a bill for a large sum was presented by a tramp or by an office-boy, the bank might properly wait to make inquiries, but if it did so in other cases it risked dishonouring the bill under section 47 of the Act and committing a breach of its duty to its customer, the acceptor. In this case there were no special circumstances to justify the defendants in refusing prompt payment. The plaintiffs had entrusted the indicia of title to their servant, and he, unfortunately, had defrauded them, but for that the defendants were not responsible. There must be judgment for the defendants, with costs.

ENGLISH HOP GROWERS, LIMITED v. DERING.*

Contract—Breach—Restraint of trade—Penalty or liquidated damages—Hops pickable but not picked—Whether grown or produced.

The plaintiff company, which was formed to act as selling agents for members growing hops, made with the defendant, who was a member and a hop grower, a contract whereby the defendant agreed that he would deliver to the plaintiffs, for sale by them, all the hops "grown" by him on particular lands in certain years, including 1926, and that if he failed to deliver to the plaintiffs any hops "produced" by him, or if he disposed of such hops otherwise than through the plaintiffs, he would pay to the plaintiffs £100 per acre as liquidated damages. The defendant cultivated the 1926 crop in the usual way, and from August 10, when the hops were pickable, but not picked, he leased the lands in question for five years to a company controlled by himself. In an action for breach of contract by reason of failure to deliver the 1926 crop to the plaintiffs,

Held, (1) that although the defendant had leased the lands with the hops still growing upon them he had nevertheless "grown or produced" the hops inasmuch as they were pickable, and by disposing of them otherwise than to the plaintiffs he had broken the contract ; (2) that the contract was not an unreasonable restraint of trade ; (3) that the £100 per acre was to be deemed to be liquidated damages and not a penalty ; and that therefore the plaintiffs were entitled to recover that amount.

* Reported by E. J. M. Chaplin, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs, English Hop Growers, Limited, from a judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt in favour of the defendant, Sir Henry Edward Dering, Bt., in an action in which they claimed from the defendant damages for breach of a contract in writing, dated August 12, 1925. The facts are fully stated in the judgment of Lord Justice Scrutton.

Mr. Jowitt, K.C., and Mr. H. L. Murphy appeared for the appellants ; Mr. Pritt, K.C., and Mr. Wilfrid Lewis for the respondent.

Lord Justice Scrutton.—This is an appeal from a judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt in favour of the defendant, Sir H. E. Dering, who was sued by English Hop Growers, Limited, for breach of contract, The plaintiff company were incorporated to protect the interests of individual hop-growers, members of the company, by pooling their hops produced in the year, in order, by selling through the company "as selling agents for its members" (see Prospectus, Article 23), to keep up the price of hops and prevent undue competition. The defendant had three defences : (1) that he had not broken the contract ; (2) that the contract was unenforceable, as in restraint of trade ; and (3) that the sum claimed was a penalty. Mr. Justice Rowlatt decided that there was no breach, and did not, therefore, consider the other two defences.

The contract of August 12, 1925, contained a recital : "The society has been formed to organize the marketing of home-grown hops in Great Britain by their sale through a single agency, and it is agreed by the rules of the society that each of the members of the society who is a grower of hops should enter into a contract with it in the terms hereinafter contained for the mutual advantage of all the members." Then it contained these clauses : "(2) The grower hereby agrees with the society that so far as the hop crops of the years 1925, 1926, 1927, 1928, and 1929 are concerned he will, subject to the now existing contract (if any) set out in the second part of the second schedule hereto, deliver to the society all hops grown by him to the intent that the same may be sold by the society in the manner set out in the said first schedule." Then clause 5 is : "The grower hereby agrees with the society that he will not, as regards the crops for the said years 1925 to 1929 inclusive, produce hops upon any greater acreage than that set out in the first part of the said second schedule hereto or upon such larger acreage as the society shall from time to time previously approve and consent to in writing." Seventhly : "The grower hereby agrees that if, as regards the crops for the said years 1925 to 1929 inclusive, he shall fail to deliver to the society any hops produced by him or shall by himself or an agent or factor, or in any way other than through the society, dispose of any hops produced by him, otherwise than in pursuance of a now existing contract (if any), then and in that case he will pay to the society as and for liquidated damages the sum of £100 per acre or proportionately on any less quantity than an acre calculated on the acreage set out in the first part of the second schedule hereto." It will be seen that the phrases "hop crops," "hops grown by the grower," "hops produced by him," are used apparently as synonymous. Paragraph 5 of the prospectus uses them all indifferently.

The defendant entered into the contract in respect of 53 acres at Sheerland Farm, Pluckley, and ten acres at Rooting Farm, Pluckley. No question now arises with regard to the 1925 crop on these lands, which was marketed by the plaintiff company, though differences of opinion existed as to the results of the marketing. This action only relates to the 1926 crop. As to this, it was cultivated by the defendant in the usual way. But on July 23, 1926, the defendant leased to a company called "Surrenden Hops, Limited," Surrenden being the name of the defendant's residence, for a term of five years from August 10, 1926, certain hop gardens, being the 63 acres the subject-matter of the contract with the plaintiff company, with a covenant by the lessees: "To manage cultivate and manure the premises in a good and husbandlike manner in accordance with the most approved methods of hop-growing and husbandry in the district in accordance with the Surrenden traditions and to keep and maintain the whole of the land as hop gardens and hop land only and to keep it clean and free from weeds and not to convert any part into pasture land." Shares to the extent of £700 were issued in the Surrenden Company, of which Sir H. E. Dering held £500, his daughter £100, and a gentleman named Dybell £100. The latter's connexion with the matter is not explained, except that he was one of the two signatories to the memorandum of association for one share. Sir H. E. Dering had obviously the control of the company, and was its creator. The Judge finds as facts that on August 10, when the lease commenced, the hop vines had grown to such an extent that the hops were formed and pickable hops, though unless there was some urgency they would not be picked till a few days later, when their condition would have improved. In these circumstances the defendant said: "I have not grown any hops or produced any hops on the contract lands; no hops are grown or produced till they are picked, and these hops were picked, and therefore grown or produced, by the Surrenden Estates, Limited, who have no contract with you." This idea seems to be founded on some mistaken impression that hop clusters are part of the land till they are severed and only become "hops" or personal property when they are severed. This is a mistake. Hops while growing on the vine are fructus industriales, not part of the land while growing, but personal chattels which pass to the executor and not to the heir (per Mr. Justice Littledale in Evans v. Roberts, 5 B. and C., 829, who speaks of "growing crops being produced by the labour of the occupier"; and per Baron Parke in Rodwell v. Phillips, 9 M. and W., 501, and Latham v. Atwood, Cro. Car., 515). Mr. Justice Rowlatt very summarily took the view that if the defendant grew hops he was under no obligation to pick them; that there were no hops till they were picked; and that what the defendant had done was to lease land with hops still growing on it, which was not disposing of hops produced; in short, that in 1926 the defendant had not grown or produced any hops. I am quite unable to take this view. It appears to me that in 1926 the defendant had grown or produced a hop crop up to the point when it was pickable, though it would be better to wait a few days, and then disposed of it to persons other than the plaintiff company, so breaking his agreement with them. If the defendant had begun cultivating with hop vines more acres than his contract quantity, I cannot think he would be at liberty to say, if sued for an injunction to prevent him from breaking clause 5 of his contract, that he was not "producing" hops. This is enough to establish a breach of contract in 1926, but I wish to say (though I do not express a final opinion on it, as the crops of 1927 are not before us) that when a landlord lets land with a covenant that it shall be used and cultivated as a hop garden according to Surrenden tradition, I think he is causing to be grown and growing hops within the meaning of the present contract, and is preventing himself from keeping his contract to allow the company to dispose of his hops as selling agent, and is disposing of his hops to others than the present plaintiffs. At present I think that when A puts B under a contractual obligation to do a particular act he causes the act to be done, and breaks any contract which he may have made that he will not do that act. (See my judgment in Falcon v. Famous Players Film Company, 42 The Times L.R., 666; [1926] 2 K.B., 474.) I have myself a strong opinion as to the conduct of Sir H. E. Dering in this matter, but I think it better not to express it, and leave him to be judged by the Societies of Kentish Men and Men of Kent, and others prominent in the County of Kent, a county well known for honesty and good sportsmanship.

There being then a breach if the contract was enforceable, it was argued that it was not enforceable as in restraint of trade. It was not argued that its terms were unreasonable in the public interest, but that it was an unreasonable restraint on the individual. Oddly enough, one of the complaints was that there were not restraints enough in the conduct of the individual member, as the company ought to have taken power to compel its members to reduce their area of cultivation, and so avoid surplus production and lowered prices. It is now well established that the Courts will view restraints of trade which are imposed between equal contracting parties for the purpose of avoiding undue competition and carrying on trade without excessive fluctuations and uncertainties, with more favour than they will regard contracts between master and servant in unequal positions of bargaining. Lord Haldane states the position thus, in North Western Salt Company, Limited v. Electrolytic Alkali Company, Limited (30 The Times L.R., 313; [1914] A.C., 461, at p. 471): "When the controversy is as to the validity of an agreement, say for service, by which someone who has little opportunity of choice has precluded himself from earning his living by the exercise of his calling after the period of service is over, the law looks jealously at the bargain; but when the question is one of validity of a commercial agreement for regulating their trade relations, entered into between two firms or companies, the law adopts a somewhat different attitude—it still looks carefully to the interest of the public, but it regards the parties as the best judges of what is reasonable as between themselves." I may also refer to the well-known judgment, delivered by Lord Parker in Attorney-General for Australia v. Adelaide Steamship Co. and Others (29 The Times L.R., 743; [1913] A.C., 781), and to the judgment of Lord Justice Younger in Attwood v. Lamont (36 The Times L.R., 895 [1920] 3 K.B., 571) which deals particularly with the distinctions between contracts of service and contracts for the sale of goodwill, where much greater freedom of contract is allowed owing to the nature of the subject-matter and the equal position of the contracting parties. I have always myself regarded it as in the public interest that parties who, being in an equal position of bargaining, make contracts should be compelled to perform them, and should not escape from their liabilities by saying that they had agreed to something which was unreasonable. Here there is no allegation that the public interest is affected, and the defendant, an educated man of full age, was one of the principal promoters of the agreement which he now says is an unreasonable restraint of trade. In view of the fluctuating character of the yearly supply of hops I see nothing unreasonable in hopgrowers combining to secure a steady and profitable price, by eliminating competition amongst themselves and putting the marketing in the hands of one agent, with full power to fix prices and hold up supplies, the benefit and loss being divided amongst the members. It may be that it would have been better to put more restraints on the individual, but the members have agreed to less restraints, and I cannot say their action was unreasonable. In my opinion this defence fails.

There remains the defence that the sum claimed is a penalty and not liquidated damages. I act upon the rules stated as the result of decided cases by Lord Dunedin and explained by Lord Parker in Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Company, Limited v. New Garage and Motor Company, Limited (30 The Times L.R., 625 ; [1915] A.C., 79). If in a case where breach of a contract may occasion serious damage, but damage which is difficult to value exactly, people contracting on equal terms agree beforehand to value or ascertain beforehand a conventional figure which shall represent on an average the probable damage from breaches of the same kind, I see no reason to interfere with their "genuine covenanted pre-estimate of damage," as Lord Dunedin describes it. That the damages are difficult to estimate is all the more reason why the parties should make their agreement effective and easy to enforce by agreeing a measure of damage. That damages of the same kind, but difficult to value exactly, may be averaged to avoid the difficulty seems to me also reasonable. The object of the present agreement, which is not to operate unless 90 per cent. of the total acreage is a party to it, is to secure in an industry where supply varies with the vagaries of climate, and where excessive supply and competition lowering prices may ruin people who have been drawn into the industry by the lure of excessive profits from short supply, a steady and regular return for capital. This is to be secured by putting all the produce of the members in the hands of one selling agent, who can keep a steady price, and avoid forcing supplies on the market, the expense and profit of these measures being borne by all the members alike. If any member breaks his contract by not bringing his produce into the pool controlled by the selling agent, and by offering it for sale through other selling agents at uncontrolled prices, he may cause damage to the association and its members which, while very substantial, will be difficult to value precisely. A member reducing the 90 per cent. acreage by breaking his contract may destroy the whole basis of the association. A member, by forcing his hops on the market, may render it impossible to maintain a controlled price. When it is known that £100 per acre will be spent on preparing a hop garden and £100 per acre on annual cultivation, that on good ground you might get a ton of hops an acre, and that the price of a ton might go up to £240, or down to £120 or lower, I cannot see anything unreasonable in fixing the damages against a man who, having become a member, risked breaking up the whole system of the company by refusing to join in the pool and entering into individual competition, at £100 an acre brought into the scheme.

The strongest way of putting the argument against the contract is to say that if a grower only sells the produce of one acre independently, he pays the same damages as he would if he sold the produce of all his acreage. But I do not think it is practical politics to imagine a man who puts part of his produce in the pool, and sells part outside ; and his action in breaking away from the pool may have the same detrimental effect on the company, whether he breaks away in whole or in part. A similar objection was not considered valid by the Privy Council, when Lord Mersey gave the judgment in Webster v. Bosanquet (28 The Times L.R., 271 ; [1912] A.C., 394, at pp. 398 and 399), and I refer to his reasons.

In my judgment this objection to the claim also fails. The appeal must be allowed and judgment entered for the plaintiffs for £6,300, with costs here and below.

Lord Justice Sankey.—The plaintiffs in this case claim the sum of £6,300 as liquidated damages for breach of an agreement entered into between them and the defendant upon August 12, 1925.

For the defendant three points were taken : (1) that there has been no breach of the agreement ; (2) that the agreement was void as being in restraint of trade ; (3) that the sum fixed in the agreement for liquidated damages was a penalty only. The learned Judge decided in favour of the defendant on the first point, and from that judgment the present appeal is brought.

The facts are as follows : A number of persons in England, desiring to organize the marketing of home-grown hops in Great Britain, by their sale through a single agency, founded the plaintiff company in 1925. The defendant entered into an agreement with the plaintiffs above-mentioned which provided, among other things, in paragraph 2 : "The grower"—that is the defendant—"hereby agrees with the society that so far as the hop crops of the years 1925, 1926, 1927, 1928, and 1929 are concerned he will, subject to the now existing contract (if any) set out in the second part of the Second Schedule hereto, deliver to the society all hops grown by him to the intent that the same may be sold by the society in the manner set out in the said First Schedule." Then Clause 7 provides what is to happen if the defendant breaks his contract. It reads, as far as the material part of it is concerned : the defendant "hereby agrees that if as regards the crops for the said years 1925 to 1929 inclusive he shall fail to deliver to the society any hops produced by him or shall by himself or an agent or factor, or in any way other than through the society, dispose of any hops produced by him otherwise than in pursuance of a now existing contract (if any) then and in that case he will pay to the society as and for liquidated damages the sum of £100 per acre or proportionately on any less quantity than an acre, calculated on the acreage set out in the first part of the Second Schedule." Now the Schedule attached to the agreement contains the following clauses. Clause 5 deals with membership, and shows the power which it was hoped the plaintiff society would have had. It says : "Every effort will be made to bring within the society the existing growers of all hops produced in this country (except those grown by brewers) and the scheme will not finally be proceeded with unless the support is obtained of growers representing 90 per cent. of that total acreage." Then clause 16 provides : "All hops grown by members will be delivered to the society through the factors to be at its absolute disposal in the same way as they have been at the disposal of the controller." Clause 23 provides : "The society is a selling agency acting for its members. It will not aim at making profits, but at paying all moneys received for hops sold to members less the charges of sale and administration." For reasons which are immaterial to this case the defendant desired to get out of this agreement if he could, and a company was formed on July 22, 1926, under the name of Surrenden Hops, Limited, the majority of the shares in which are held by the defendant. On July 23, the defendant granted a lease to that company of the two farms on which he grew the hops in question, to come into force on August 10, thus (without begging the question at issue) putting it out of his power to deliver hops to the plaintiffs in 1926.

The learned Judge finds that upon August 10 the defendant had grown hops to a point at which they had reached the form of pickable hops, but were not quite ready to pick, although if the threat of disease, or something else, had made it desirable, they might have been picked, and they could have been used. With the hops in this condition, he disposed of his farms to the company just formed. As to (1) : Has there been a breach by the defendant of his agreement ? It was contended that what the defendant sold (see clause 1 of his agreement) was hops grown by him, and that that meant " grown and severed by him," and the learned Judge has taken this view. He says : " Having regard to the fact that the matter of the sale was hops, if and when picked, and possibly dried, I have come to the conclusion that he did not dispose of the hops. What he did was to dispose of his estate by a lease to the newly formed company. He was not disposing of the hops produced, he was disposing of the land which had hops still growing upon it." I am of opinion that this is incorrect. It must be remembered that hops are not fructus naturales, but are fructus industriales (see Rodwell v. Phillips, 9 M. and W., 501, per Baron Parke, at p. 503) ; and having regard to the condition in which the Judge found that the hops actually were, and the contract under which the defendant agreed to deliver to the plaintiffs all hops grown by him, I have come to the conclusion that he did break his contract when he disposed of them to the new company and not to the plaintiffs.

As to (2) : Was the agreement void as being in restraint of trade ? The task of the Courts in considering contracts in restraint of trade is always a difficult one, because not only have the interests of the contracting parties to be considered, but also the interests of the public, and decisions as to the latter are always susceptible to influences of current views of public policy. What was public policy in the time of Lord Macclesfield who, as Chief Justice Parker, decided Mitchel v. Reynolds (1 P. Williams, 181) in 1711, may have been quite different from that which existed in the time of Chief Justice Tindal, who decided Horner v. Graves (7 Bing., 735) in 1831, or from that which existed in the time of Lord Macnaghten, one of the Lords who decided Nordenfelt v. Maxim Nordenfelt Guns and Ammunition Company, Limited (10 The Times L.R., 636 ; [1894] A.C., 535), in 1894. In Mitchel's case (supra) the area was a Holborn parish, in Horner's case (supra) it was an area of 100 miles from York, in Nordenfelt's case (supra) the area was unlimited. The judgment of Lord Blanesburgh, then Lord Justice Younger, in Attwood v. Lamont (36 The Times L.R., 895 ; [1920] 3 K.B., 571), draws attention to this, and that case must be regarded as an authority that contracts between master and servant in restraint of the servant after leaving the master's employ stand on a different footing from other contracts in restraint of trade (see pp. 589 and 590).

With regard to contracts of the present character, and also contracts restraining a vendor of the goodwill of a business from canvassing former customers, where the parties enter into an agreement with their eyes open the Court should not, in my view, be astute to assist those who endeavour to break it, as Sir George Jessel, M.R., said in Printing and Numerical Registering Company v. Sampson (L.R., 19 Eq., 462).

One has this paramount public policy to consider, that one is not lightly to interfere with the freedom of contract. There is still something to be said for the sanctity of contracts, and for the man who keeps his agreement, though it is to his own hindrance ; see Attorney-General for Australia v. Adelaide Steamship Company and Others (29 The Times L.R., 743 ; [1913] A.C., 781, at p. 796), where Lord Parker said : " The onus of showing that any contract is calculated to produce a monopoly or enhance prices to an unreasonable extent will lie on the party alleging it, and . . . if once the Court is satisfied that the restraint is reasonable as between the parties this onus will be no light one." In North-Western Salt Company, Limited v. Electrolytic Alkali Company, Limited (30 The Times L.R., 313 ; [1914] A.C., 461, at p. 471) Lord Haldane says : " When the controversy is as to the validity of an agreement, say for service, by which someone who has little opportunity of choice has precluded himself from earning his living by the exercise of his calling after the period of service is over, the law looks jealously at the bargain ; but when the question is one of the validity of a commercial agreement for regulating their trade relations, entered into between two firms or companies, the law adopts a somewhat different attitude—it still looks carefully to the interest of the public—but it regards the parties as the best judges of what is reasonable as between themselves. In the present case I see no reason for doubting that in entering into the contract on which this action was brought the respondents were probably acting in their own best interest. It may well be that such a contract was, in view of the powerful position of the appellants, the respondents' best way of securing a market and adequate prices. And if this be once conceded I find nothing else in the detailed provisions of the contract excepting machinery for working out the bargain. If the general object was lawful, then these provisions were, in my opinion, free from objection on the score of illegality." Looking at the position in this case, I am unable to hold that the contract was in restraint of trade, either in reference to the interests of the contracting parties or in reference to the interests of the public. In the schedule to the contract between the parties, it was stated that after consultation of the growers in the different counties they reported that in their opinion it would be in the interests of hop growers to consider seriously the possibilities of forming a growers' central selling agency, and the object of the plaintiff company was to organize the marketing of home-grown hops in this country by their sale through a single agency. I can see no evidence that such a selling agency was injurious, either to the interests of the defendant or to the interests of the public, although it might suit the defendant to try to get out of his contract in any particular year, while all those with whom he had been associated were held to be bound by it.

The Court will always be jealous to protect the public where any question arises as to a monopoly being created by a combination of buyers or sellers, but it regards the parties as the best judges of what is reasonable among themselves. The common law of England is no crystallized code—its adaptability is one of its chief advantages—and it seeks within due bounds to facilitate, not to fetter, trade and industry.

As to (3) : Is the sum claimed a penalty and not liquidated damages ? The learned counsel for the defendant drew our attention to different contingencies under which a claim for liquidated damages arose. He pointed out the result of a breach in which the failure to deliver hops might be in respect of one pocket or a thousand pockets, and of a breach where the grower might dispose of them elsewhere.

The law on this subject is most recently discussed by Lord Dunedin in the case of Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Company, Limited v. New Garage and Motor Company, Limited (30 The Times L.R., 625 ; [1915] A.C., 79), where the learned Law Lord, on page 86, sums up various propositions from decisions which rank as authoritative.

He points out that the question whether a sum stipulated is a penalty or liquidated damages is a question of construction to be decided upon the terms and inherent circumstances of each particular contract judged of as at the time of the making of the contract, not at the time of the breach. It is quite reasonable for parties to the contract to estimate damages at a certain figure, and it is no obstacle to the sum stipulated being a genuine pre-estimate of damages that the consequences of the breach are such as to make a precise estimate an impossibility. One of the many tests as to whether a sum is liquidated damages or a penalty is whether the damages arising from the violation of the contract cannot be exactly estimated beforehand.

Now in the present case it would be almost impossible to prove the damage caused by the defendant's breach of contract. It cannot be measured by the mere fact that he did not deliver a particular parcel of hops and that the plaintiffs were consequently unable to sell them. As was pointed out by the learned Judge and accepted by a witness, the damage is really the undermining of the market and the undermining of the existence of the plaintiff company. It will not be forgotten that in the first schedule to the agreement it is stated that the scheme would not finally be proceeded with unless the support of growers representing 90 per cent. of the total average of hops in the country was obtained. The failure of the defendant to fulfil his contract may be compared to the throwing of a stone into a pond. The effect extends to a far greater area than the mere spot into which the stone is thrown. The maintenance of an artificial price is a difficult and delicate operation. It may be upset by a trivial or unexpected occurrence—for example, by one important member deserting the combine or a small untied amount being placed on the market. The damages in such a case are impossible to foresee or forecast. In the case of Webster v. Bosanquet (28 The Times L.R., 271 ; [1912] A.C., 394) on not dissimilar facts the sum in question was held to be liquidated damages. In my view the sum in question here is also liquidated damages and not a penalty. The judgment of the learned Judge should be set aside and judgment entered for the appellants for the sum of £6,300.

Mr. Justice Romer.—The first question to be determined on this appeal is whether the hops picked on the defendant's hop gardens at Surrenden in 1926 were hops produced by him within the meaning of clause 7 of the agreement of August 12, 1925. If they were, it is not disputed that he failed to deliver them to the society, and disposed of them otherwise than through the society. It is, however, contended on his behalf, and the contention was accepted by Mr. Justice Rowlatt, that the hops were not produced by him inasmuch as they were picked by his lessees, Surrenden Hops, Limited, after the commencement of and under the powers conferred upon them by the lease of July 23, 1926. The learned Judge came to the conclusion that the obligation of the defendant under clause 2 of the agreement, whereby the defendant agreed to deliver to the society all the hops grown by him, was merely an obligation to deliver hops if and when picked and possibly dried by him, and that he did not therefore dispose of or fail to deliver hops produced by him within the meaning of the agreement. With all respect to the learned Judge, I am unable to agree with him as to this. The state of affairs as existing upon August 10, 1926, the date of the commencement of the tenancy, was found by him to be this. The defendant "had grown hops to a point when they were not quite ready to pick ; they were formed, they had reached the form of pickable hops, but they were not quite ready to pick, although, if the threat of disease or something else had made it desirable, they might then have been picked and they could have been used, although it would have been a wasteful thing to do." With this finding I respectfully agree. But it makes it clear that on August 10 there were hops in a pickable form, and that these hops had been grown or produced (for I draw no distinction between the two words for the present purpose) by the defendant, and when some three weeks later these hops were picked and dried they still, in my opinion, were in fact and could properly be described as hops grown or produced by the defendant. It was, however, urged on his behalf that the parties to the contract could not have intended to place him under an obligation to deliver to the society hops grown but not picked by him, inasmuch as the hops might in certain circumstances turn out not to be worth the picking. In that case, it was said, the fulfilment of his obligation would merely serve to throw upon the defendant a useless expense without any benefit accruing to the society. But the contract is one made between business people who at the time of making it, at any rate, may be supposed to have been trusting one another to behave in a businesslike way. If the hops were not worth picking it is almost inconceivable that the society would not relieve the defendant from his obligation to deliver them as soon as their attention was called to the fact. It is, at any rate, much more probable that the parties intended to enter into an arrangement that was capable of working quite satisfactorily on these businesslike lines, than to enter into one that would have been so extraordinarily unbusinesslike as that for which the defendant is contending. If the defendant be right he could sell his hops the day before they were picked by the purchaser from him and render the agreement entirely useless from the point of view of the society. There would, indeed, on the defendant's contention, have been no reason for the society entering into the contract at all. If the defendant was to be at liberty up to the time of picking the hops to sell them to whom he pleased, the society might just as well have saved themselves the trouble of negotiating the contract, and taken the risk of being able from time to time to compete successfully with the rest of the world for the purchase of the defendant's crops. But if this was to be the position of the society in relation to the defendant it would be their position in relation to the rest of their members, and there would be no reason for the existence of the society at all.

I must now turn to the question whether the agreement is an illegal one as being in unreasonable restraint of trade. As to this point, on which Mr. Justice Rowlatt expressed no opinion, it is conceded by the defendant that the agreement is not unreasonable so far as the public interest is concerned. He contends, however, that the plaintiffs have not shown that it is reasonable as between the parties themselves. In my opinion this contention cannot be sustained. It was stated in evidence by Mr. Overy on behalf of the plaintiffs that, when the society was formed at the end of the period of the Government control of hops, there was a large stock and ruin to the hop-growers was in prospect; that in the year when there was no bigger surplus he had sold hops for less than the price of picking them; and that in such circumstances only the biggest men survive and make a profit out of those who are extinguished. The society was accordingly brought into existence for the purpose, as stated in its prospectus which is scheduled to the contract, of organizing the marketing of home-grown hops by their sale through a single agency. For this purpose members were required to enter into a binding contract with the society to deliver all hops grown by them for a period of five years for sale through the society, and the prospectus states how the money realized by the sales is to be distributed among the members. Shortly stated, the scheme was one by means of which it was hoped that in a year when there was a surplus of hops the loss occasioned to the members as a whole would be reduced to a minimum and the loss equitably distributed amongst them. All this is apparent upon the face of the agreement itself, which was entered into for the purpose and in pursuance of the scheme. Similar agreements were, so we were told, entered into by some 95 per cent. of the hop-growers in this county, excluding brewers. It is they who are the members of the society that in each case is the other party to the contract. How, in these circumstances, it can be said that the contracts are unreasonable as between the society and the member in question passes my comprehension. It may be safely assumed that this large body of hop-growers knew their own business best and what it was reasonable to do in the circumstances with which they were confronted. But in any case, given the circumstances and given the object which they had in view, I am unable to see how that object could have been attained by any better or fairer means than those provided by the agreement. In my opinion the agreement is entirely reasonable as between the parties.

The only point remaining to be dealt with is whether the £100 mentioned in clause 7 of the agreement is a penalty or liquidated damages. Here again it became unnecessary for Mr. Justice Rowlatt, in view of the conclusion at which he arrived upon the first point, to express any opinion. I may, therefore, without any want of respect to the learned Judge, content myself with saying that for the reasons already given by Lord Justice Scrutton I concur with him in thinking that the sum in question is not a penalty but is liquidated damages. I agree that the appeal must be allowed with the consequences stated.

CHARLES AND OTHERS v. CARDIFF COLLIERIES, LIMITED.*

Contract — Wages agreement — Whether submission to an award.

By a Conciliation Board Agreement provision was made for the payment of a subsistence allowance to low-paid colliery workers in South Wales, and, the parties having failed to agree as to the amount and conditions of payment, the matter came before the independent chairman of the Board and he gave a decision. The parties failed to agree as to the interpretation of the decision, and the chairman gave a supplemental decision, but he declined to give any further interpretation. Representative workmen then brought an action against representative employers for declarations, (1) that on the true construction of the decision the subsistence allowance ought to be calculated for each shift separately, and (2) as to the method of reckoning overtime for the purpose of calculating subsistence allowance. The Judge in chambers, on the grounds that the wages agreement incorporating the conciliation agreement amounted to a submission to arbitration, and that the chairman's decisions were awards, made an order that the action be adjourned and that the awards be remitted to the chairman to deal with the two questions raised by the pleadings.

Held, on appeal, that the chairman's decisions were not awards but had become parts of an agreement between employers and workmen which must be construed by the Court, and the order of the Judge must be set aside.

This was an appeal from an order dated January 13, 1928, made by Mr. Justice MacKinnon, sitting in Chambers. The question raised was as to the subsistence allowance to be paid to low-paid wage workers employed at collieries in Monmouthshire and South Wales. Payment of a subsistence allowance for the coal trade of Monmouthshire and South Wales was provided for by the South Wales Conciliation Board Agreement of December 13, 1926, of which Board Sir Francis Taylor, K.C., was appointed the independent chairman. The parties having failed to agree as to the amount and conditions of the subsistence allowance, the matter came before the chairman, who issued his decision or award on June 24, 1927. The parties having then failed to agree as to the interpretation thereof, a further meeting was held and a supplemental decision or award was issued on July 9. A further interpretation having been refused, an action was begun claiming (1) a declaration that on the true construction of the award the subsistence allowance to be received by the plaintiffs ought to be calculated in respect of each shift separately; and (2) a declaration as to the method of reckoning overtime for the purpose of calculating subsistence allowance.

Mr. Justice MacKinnon made an order that the further hearing of the action be adjourned and that the awards be remitted to Sir Francis Taylor, to deal with the two questions raised by the pleadings, on the ground that the wages agreement incorporating the conciliation agreement amounted to a submission to arbitration.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. Upjohn, K.C., and Mr. A. T. James appeared for the appellants; Mr. Stuart Bevan, K.C., and Mr. Trevor H. Hunter for the respondents.

Lord Justice Scrutton, in giving judgment, said that this action by representative South Wales workmen against representative South Wales employers was intended to raise the question of the true construction of certain "decisions" of Sir Francis Taylor, the independent chairman of the South Wales Conciliation Board. Mr. Justice MacKinnon had treated the decisions as awards and had remitted them to Sir Francis Taylor, whom he treated as an arbitrator.

The Lord Justice then dealt with the constitution and powers of the Conciliation Board, and said that the decision of the chairman on the subsistence allowance was not an award of an arbitrator, but a decision akin to that of a valuer which fixed one ingredient making up the total wage to be paid, and the parties agreed to make the amount and the conditions under which such allowance was payable, when fixed by the chairman, part of their agreement with each other. It followed that Mr. Justice MacKinnon was wrong in treating Sir Francis Taylor's decisions as awards and in remitting them to him for restatement or amplification. They had become parts of an agreement between employers and workmen which must be construed by the Court.

That view was confirmed by various authorities. Mr. Justice Blackburn said in Wadsworth v. Smith (L.R., 6 Q.B., 332): "Where by an agreement the right of one of the parties to have or do a particular thing is made to depend on the determination of a third person, that is not a submission to arbitration, nor is the determination an award."

Lord Chelmsford in Scott v. Liverpool Corporation (28 L.J., Ch., 230, at p. 238) said: "Where the contract provides for the determination of the claims and liabilities of the contractors by the judgment of some particular person, this would be incorrectly called a provision for submission to arbitration."

There was also a passage from the judgment of Lord Justice Buckley in Kennedy, Limited v. Mayor of Barrow-in-Furness (unreported), cited in the 4th edition of Hudson on Building Contracts (Vol. II., at p. 417): "He [the engineer] is the person whose determination is required by the parties. It is not a judicial act, but it is an administrative act in the interests of the corporation who is going to pay, and he is to be the judge, or a kind of arbitrator, or a person whose decision is to be final in the matter of the execution of the works. I do not think that means that he is an arbitrator or acting in a judicial capacity at all." Lord Esher's well-known passage in In re Carus-Wilson and Greene (sub nom. In re Casterton Estates, 3 The Times L.R., 22 (18 Q.B.D., 7), where the person deciding was held not to be an arbitrator, was to the same effect.

That the parties here called Sir Francis Taylor's decision an award, or himself an arbitrator, seemed to him (the Lord Justice) a matter of very small importance, and by no means introduced the whole machinery of the Arbitration Act, 1889, with its special cases and powers to review the decisions of a tribunal within the Act. The result of that view was strictly that the matter should go back to Mr. Justice MacKinnon for his opinion on the construction of the agreement and decisions, but as it would obviously return to the Court of Appeal, perhaps on its way higher, the parties did not dissent from the Court's attempting to construe the agreement and including as part of it the decisions of Sir Francis Taylor.

His Lordship then proceeded to deal with the figures on which the earnings of each workman should be based, and said that in his view the plaintiffs' construction was correct—namely, that the subsistence allowance ought to be calculated in respect of each shift separately. The basis of that was to take each shift which he was entitled to consider, ascertain the wages and special allowances which would be paid for such a shift, and add the subsistence allowance, which would bring the total up to the subsistence wage. Secondly, where a shift was paid for as more than one shift, the allowance was to be calculated on each shift paid for. The decision below must be set aside and judgment entered for the plaintiffs for the relief claimed.

Lord Justice Sankey and Mr. Justice Romer delivered judgments to the same effect.

Mr. Trevor Hunter said that this was an interlocutory appeal, although it had been treated as a final appeal. If it was an interlocutory appeal he asked for leave to appeal to the House of Lords.

Lord Justice Scrutton said that it would be more likely to lead to peace in the coalfields if parties would try to settle matters mutually rather than fight cases up to the House of Lords. Leave to appeal must be refused.

Court of Appeal.
(Lord Hanworth, M.R., Sargant and Lawrence, L.JJ.)
1928. Mar. 23.

IN RE GREENE AND OTHERS.*

Lunacy—Intestacy—Settlement of property—Directions of Court—Discretion to modify rights of Crown—Benefit of lunatic—Power to provide for expenditure—Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict., c. 5) s. 117 (1)—Law of Property Act, 1925 (15 Geo. V., c. 20), s. 171 (1).

The Court delivered reserved judgments in these four applications under section 171 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, for the settlement by the Court of the property of lunatics. The section was passed largely on account of the new laws with regard to intestacy, and to prevent the injustice of property passing to the Crown where there were relatives and others with a claim on the lunatic. The material parts of the section are as follows:—

"(1) The Court may direct a settlement to be made of the property of a lunatic or defective . . . on such trusts . . . as the Court may deem expedient, and in particular may give such directions—

"(b) where the property has been acquired under a settlement, a will or an intestacy, or represents property so acquired, or

"(c) where by reason of any change in the law of intestacy or of any change in circumstances since the execution by the lunatic or defective of a testamentary disposition . . . or for any other special reason the Court is satisfied that any person might suffer an injustice if the property were allowed to devolve as undisposed of on the death intestate of the lunatic or defective or under any testamentary disposition executed by him."

Mr. G. B. Hurst, K.C., Mr. Wilfrid Greene, K.C., Mr. McMullan, Mr. W. G. Hart, and Mr. Winterbotham appeared for the various applicants; the Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Mr. Stafford Crossman represented the Crown.

The MASTER of the ROLLS, in the course of his judgment, said that the intention of the Legislature was to give power to the Court to act under section 171 where, in its discretion, it thought it wise or necessary to do so in the interests of those whose rights had been affected by the new law of intestacy, and the rights of the Crown to have property pass to it might be modified accordingly. That was borne out by section 46 (1) (vi.) of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, by which the Crown, on taking an intestate's property, might make provision for dependants, whether kindred or not. Further, section 117 (1) of the Lunacy Act, 1890, gave the Court power to provide for "payment of any debt or expenditure incurred for the lunatic's maintenance or otherwise for his benefit."

Section 171 must, therefore, not be construed too narrowly. At the same time, as he had said in In re Freeman ([1927] 1 Ch., 479), it was not wise to attempt an exhaustive definition of section 171. Everything depended on the facts of each case.

Dealing with the first application, In re Greene, the applicant, a widow, had two children, who were both under treatment as lunatics, and who, in the ordinary course of events, would become entitled at her death to the property subject to the trusts of her marriage settlement, and also to a considerable estate under the will of her late father. There were no near relatives of those children entitled to succeed on an intestacy. She asked that a settlement might be directed under which she might, subject to provision for the children, be able to dispose of a portion of the funds for the benefit of certain charities. In this case there seemed to him to be no injustice if the property went as on an intestacy; for, if all had gone as directed, the property would in any event have passed away from the applicant and no person would be disappointed of a spes successionis. He would, therefore, make no order as regards the applicant's father's estate, but, as regarded her own marriage settlement funds, this was property "acquired under a settlement" within the meaning of section 171 (b), and, without making the case a precedent, he was prepared to agree to a settlement being drawn up whereby the funds brought into settlement should be made subject to a power of disposal by the applicant. Of course, the applicant still had her right to apply under section 117 of the Lunacy Act, 1890.

The second case, In re Whitworth, was an application for the benefit of second cousins of the patient. There seemed to be no hardship threatened, and there was no ground for acceding to the application.

In the third case, that of E. A., the patient was a successful business man with children and grandchildren. If he died, an early will would take effect, and operate harshly in regard to certain members of the family. There was a clear case of change of circumstances, which would probably have caused the patient, if compos mentis, to make a fresh will. A settlement would therefore be directed.

In the fourth case, In re Fraser, a settlement would also be just because, on the patient's death intestate, claims might arise from certain relatives of his father who had taken no interest in the patient's welfare.

In the last case, In re Wood, the Court was asked to make good the loss of a will made by the patient when sane. The Court was satisfied that the will was lost, and as to its terms, and a settlement would be ordered to carry out those terms.

ALEXANDER v. CITY AND SOUTH LONDON RAILWAY COMPANY.*

Negligence — Railway company — Escalator —Accident—No evidence of defect in design.

This was the defendants' appeal from a verdict and judgment for £25 entered in favour of the plaintiff, Miss Lilian Alexander, of Oldridge-road, Balham, S.W., in an action tried before his Honour Judge Harington and a jury at Wandsworth County Court. The plaintiff, who was a waitress, sued the City and South London Railway Company for damages arising from an accident to her in consequence of an alleged defect in an escalator at South Clapham Station.

Mr. E. W. Cave, K.C., and Mr. Rowland Thomas appeared for the appellants; Mr. Comyns Carr, K.C., and Mr. Avetoom for the respondent.

Mr. CAVE said that this was the first case in which it had been suggested that an accident had taken place through an escalator. In January last Miss Alexander caught her heel in the space between the platform and the metal comb at the bottom of the escalator, which was one of the newest pattern, with the result that she fell and sprained her ankle. She complained that there was too much space between the comb and the platform and her criticism was directed to the design of the machine and not to its condition.

Counsel handed to the Court the shoe which the plaintiff was wearing at the time of the accident, and contended that the space in front of the comb was, in fact, too small for the heel. There was no evidence that the escalator was in any way faulty, and the Judge should have withdrawn the case from the jury.

Mr. COMYNS CARR submitted that there was evidence that the escalator was a dangerous thing, inasmuch as there was a gap in which a passenger might trip. Shoes such as the plaintiff's were commonly worn, and the railway company ought to make it impossible for an accident such as this to happen.

MR. JUSTICE BRANSON, in giving judgment, said that there was no evidence to go to the jury of any negligence on the part of the railway company. On the evidence the gap between the comb and the platform was no more than half-an-inch and, according to the witness who gave evidence for the company, it was even less than that. There was no duty imposed on a railway company to keep everything at its stations in such a condition that nobody could by any possibility hurt himself. The appeal, therefor, must be allowed, and judgment entered for the defendants with costs.

MR JUSTICE MACKINNON concurred.

TERRY v. VARIETY THEATRES CONTROLLING COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Contract—Actor—Appearance—Leading actor of company—Provision for substitute in case of illness of a principal—Illness of leading actor—Impossibility of appearing—Whether basis of contract gone.

The plaintiff, who was an actor, made with the defendants an agreement by which the plaintiff was to find a company, described as consisting of himself and a full company, and in the event of the non-appearance of a principal the plaintiff was to provide a deputy to the satisfaction of the defendants. The plaintiff became too ill to appear, but he provided a substitute. The defendants thereupon alleged that as the plaintiff could not appear the basis of the contract was gone. In an action for damages for breach of the contract,

Held, that the plaintiff was a principal to whom the clause as to the provision of a deputy applied and his absence was not a frustration of the contract and he was entitled to damages.

Decision of Rowlatt, J. (44 The Times L.R., 242), reversed.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff, Mr. Fred Terry, the actor, from a judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt (44 The Times L.R., 242) in favour of the defendants, the Variety Theatres Controlling Company, Limited, in an action in which the plaintiff claimed from the defendants damages for alleged breach of a written contract dated October 16, 1925.

By the agreement the plaintiff was to provide a theatrical company, called "Fred Terry and Company," to appear at the Hippodrome, Portsmouth, for six nights and one matinée, beginning on April 12, 1926, in a costume play entitled Sweet Nell of Old Drury. The company was to be an efficient No. 1 principal company, and in the event of the non-appearance of a principal through illness the plaintiff was to provide a deputy to the satisfaction of the defendants. There was to be no change in the cast except through illness, and a certificate of a medical practitioner had to be produced before the performance took place. The plaintiff was to receive 65 per cent. of the gross receipts up to £1,000, and 70 per cent. thereafter.

The plaintiff said that he himself was seriously ill at the time, but that he had provided a satisfactory deputy. He pleaded that the defendants had refused to perform the agreement. He claimed £800, his estimated share of the gross door receipts, or, alternatively, £308 8s. 10d., being the expenses incurred, plus his estimated net profits of £300.

The defendants pleaded that, owing to the plaintiff's illness and consequent non-appearance, the basis of the agreement had disappeared and that its performance was frustrated.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt held that the inclusion of Mr. Terry in the cast was of the essence of the contract, or, in other words, that the phrase "Fred Terry and Company" could not be satisfied by a company which did not include Mr. Terry. He accordingly gave judgment for the defendants.

In case his decision should be overruled on appeal Mr. Justice Rowlatt assessed the damages at £450.

The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. Pritt, K.C., and Mr. Roskill appeared for the appellant; Mr. Doughty, K.C., and Mr. St. John Field for the respondents.

LORD JUSTICE SCRUTTON, in giving judgment, said that in construing the contract he looked to see whether the absence of Mr. Fred Terry from a week's performance through illness (which did not impose any liability for breach of contract) was a frustration of the contract or whether it was a matter which the parties had provided for in the contract. The question turned on the construction of the clause in the contract dealing with the cast. That clause did provide that in the event of the non-appearance of any principal the plaintiff was to provide a deputy to the satisfaction of the defendants. Was Mr. Fred Terry a "principal" within the meaning of that provision? It was not easy to answer that question in view of the obscurity of the wording of the agreement. But the printed form of agreement was the defendants' form, and if they relied on an agreement which was ambiguous in its terms they must not be surprised if it was construed against them. On the proper construction of the clause the parties were treating Mr. Fred Terry and full company as principals, and Mr. Fred Terry was a principal to whom the clause about non-appearance applied.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt had come to a wrong view on the question, which was not an easy one, of the construction of the contract. The appeal must be allowed, and as no question had been raised about the damages, which Mr. Justice Rowlatt had assessed at £450 in case his decision should be overruled, judgment must be entered for the plaintiff for that amount, with costs. The Lord Justice added that he hoped that Mr. Fred Terry and others interested in theatrical contracts would in future take care to make their contracts clear, and thus save for the theatrical profession money which would otherwise go to another profession.

LORD JUSTICE SANKEY and MR. JUSTICE TOMLIN delivered judgments allowing the appeal.

BOTTOMLEY v. HURST AND BLACKETT, LIMITED, AND HOUSTON.*

Practice—Single issue—Application for separate disposal—Refusal of order.

In a libel action the defendants pleaded justification and that the plaintiff had, in return for payment, undertaken in writing to indemnify them against any actions for libel. The plaintiff in his reply disputed his signature and said that he was not bound by the alleged undertaking. The plaintiff then applied for an order that the issue as to the alleged undertaking and its construction should be tried separately before the other issues.

Held, that when a plaintiff asked for an order

* Reported by T. W. MORGAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

* Reported by E. J. M. CHAPLIN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

that one issue should be disposed of before the trial of the other issues the order should be made only when there were special circumstances justifying it, and as there were none in the present case the order must be refused.

This was an appeal by the defendants, Hurst and Blackett, Limited, and Mr. Henry James Houston from an order of Mr. Justice Charles, made in Chambers, affirming an order of Master Jelf.

Mr. Comyns Carr, K.C., and Mr. Ignatius G. Kelly appeared for the appellants ; the respondent appeared in person.

Mr. COMYNS CARR, in opening the appeal, said that it was an appeal against an order of Mr. Justice Charles, affirming an order of the Master, setting down a separate issue for trial in the libel action Bottomley v. Hurst and Blackett, Limited, and Another. The action was brought in connexion with certain articles written by Mr. Houston and published by Hurst and Blackett, Limited, in book form. Mr. Bottomley said that the allegations made in the book meant that he was a blackmailer, and had been habitually guilty of the criminal offence of blackmailing. To that, there was a plea of justification, with particulars. The defendants further pleaded that the plaintiff had, in a letter, undertaken to indemnify them against any actions for libel in consideration of the payment of £250 towards the costs of his appeal against his conviction in 1922. By his reply, the plaintiff said that he was not bound by that letter, and he did not admit his signature. On the application of the plaintiff, the Master then made an order that the issue as to the letter should be tried separately, and this order was affirmed by the Judge in Chambers.

He (counsel) submitted that the expenses of trying the case in two stages would add considerably to the general expenses. There were no circumstances here which showed this to be an exceptional case, or one in which the plaintiff had a right to ask for such an order.

On the question of the trial of separate issues, he referred to : Emma Silver Mining Company v. Grant (11 Ch.D., 918) ; and Piercy v. Young (15 Ch.D., 475).

Mr. Bottomley said that the whole object of the jurisdiction in reference to the raising of separate issues was this, that, where a separate point had been raised by the defendants which disposed of the whole action, obviously a bona fide litigant would desire to have it disposed of separately. It had been said that his affairs were in bankruptcy. Quite true, but could there be a stronger argument in favour of the trial of a separate issue, which would save him from the embarrassment and expense of getting his evidence ready ? It had been said that he had signed a document which could prevent the trial from going forward. The libel consisted of charges of persistent and systematic journalistic blackmailing. When he was at Wormwood Scrubs he was permitted to sign but not to read documents. Mr. Houston had visited him at Wormwood Scrubs. He denied his signature to the letter in question, and said that he knew nothing of its contents. He submitted that it would save expense if that preliminary point were tried first. He was willing to let it be disposed of by a Judge sitting alone. Was it not convenient, if the letter put an end to the action, that he should be relieved of the action at once ?

Mr. COMYNS CARR, in reply, said that, apparently, the real reason for the desire for a preliminary issue to be tried separately was to get Mr. Houston into the witness-box for a dress rehearsal of the main issues in the action. He submitted that it was inconvenient that the issue of law as to the construction of the letter should be dealt with first in an action in which all the issues were ready for trial.

LORD JUSTICE SCRUTTON, in giving judgment, said that the appeal raised a point of general interest. An order had been made by the Master in an action in which Mr. Bottomley was the plaintiff and Messrs. Hurst and Blackett, Limited, and Mr. Houston were the defendants, ordering that a point of law raised by the defendants should be set down for hearing and disposed of before the trial of the other issues in the action. Mr. Justice Charles had affirmed that order. The defendants now appealed and asked that the whole of the issues raised in the action should be tried together. There was power in the Court, if it thought convenient to do so, to order one issue to be disposed of and the rest of the issues to be postponed until that one issue had been decided, but experience had taught the Court that that power was only to be resorted to in very special cases when it was asked for by the plaintiff.

When one issue was picked out it was not always one which could be disposed of quickly. Cases in which such an order had been made were cases in which a point of law had been raised as a preliminary issue, but when to that was to be added a question of fact, an additional difficulty was created. In his opinion, it was, as a rule, not a desirable method to adopt. In the present case Mr. Bottomley had brought an action for libel alleging that he had been charged with journalistic blackmail. The defendants pleaded that the words complained of were true and they set out particulars at great length. Besides that plea, they said that in a letter, dated June 22, 1922, the plaintiff had undertaken to indemnify them against all claims for libel in consideration of a payment of £250 towards the costs of the plaintiff's appeal against his conviction. That, he thought, raised an interesting question of construction. In connexion with that it was noteworthy that a case raising a question of the construction of an indemnity had recently been heard in the House of Lords, Great Western Railway Company v. J. Durnford and Son, Limited (44 The Times L.R., 415).

The matter did not, however, end there, because Mr. Bottomley had put in a reply in which he said, not that the letter in question did not bear that meaning, but that, inter alia, he had not been allowed to read the document and that it was not his agreement at all. All this introduced quite another question. It became a matter of evidence, and a question of credit might arise. Those being the facts, the Master had made an order which he had not considered as carefully as he ought to have done. He had omitted to include in it the relevant passages in the reply, and he had also made an order for a speedy trial. The question arose, Why should there be a speedy trial of this particular case before other plaintiffs and defendants had had their turn, and why was this libel action more urgent than other libel actions ?

He (the Lord Justice) had come to the conclusion that the order should not have been made. There were no special circumstances justifying the making of such an order. The action should, therefore, proceed in the ordinary way. The costs here and below would be costs in the cause.

LORD JUSTICE SANKEY gave judgment to the same effect.

ELVINGTON TENANTS, LIMITED v. HATTON.*

Landlord and Tenant—Restrictions—Rent—Increase—Repairs—Landlord's responsibility for the whole—Question for determination—Application to county court—Decision final—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 17), s. 2 (6).

The landlords of a cottage gave the tenant notice of an increase of 25 per cent. in the rent under s. 2 (1) (d) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, on the ground that they were responsible for the whole of the repairs. The tenant disputed the increase on the ground that he was partly responsible for repairs, and the landlords applied to the county court under s. 2 (6) to determine, (1) whether the notice of increase was valid, and (2) whether they were responsible for the whole of the repairs. The deputy county court Judge answered both questions in the affirmative. On an appeal by the tenant the landlords took a preliminary objection that by s. 2 (6) the decision of the county court was final. The tenant contended that the sole question was as to the construction of the terms of the tenancy and that this question did not arise under s. 2 (1), (2) or (3), and that therefore the decision was not made final by s. 2 (6).

Held, that the county court had jurisdiction to determine the questions on the application and its decision was final, and therefore the appeal must be dismissed.

This was an appeal by a tenant from the decision of Deputy Judge Stoker, sitting at Dover County Court, in favour of the landlords.

The respondents, Elvington Tenants, Limited, were the landlords of a number of miners' cottages at Eythorne, near Dover. The tenants of these cottages, of whom the appellant, Mr. H. E. Hatton, was one, had been paying rents in excess of the standard rents under certain notices of increase which had been served on them. In May, 1927, one of the tenants, in a test action, disputed the validity of the notices. It was held that the notices were wholly bad and incapable of being amended, and the amounts paid in excess of the standard rents were accordingly refunded to the tenants.

On July 15, 1927, new notices of increase were served on the tenants. The increases were in respect of rates, the 15 per cent. increase of rent allowed to landlords generally, and the 25 per cent. allowed where the landlord was wholly responsible for repairs. The tenants disputed the last head of increase only, on the ground that, under the terms of their tenancies, they were partly responsible for repairs. An application was accordingly made by the landlords to the county court to determine certain questions. The questions were (1) whether the notices of increase given on July 15, 1927, were valid; and (2) whether the landlords were responsible for the whole of the repairs. The deputy Judge gave an affirmative answer to both these questions.

The tenant appealed.

Mr. H. H. Maddocks appeared for the appellant; Mr. B. H. Waddy for the respondents.

Mr. WADDY took a preliminary objection that no appeal lay, on the ground that the finding of the county court was rendered conclusive by section 2 (6) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, which provided: "Any question arising under subsection (1), (2) or (3) of this section shall be determined on the application either of the landlord or the tenant by the county court, and the decision of the court shall be final and conclusive." Subsection (1) (d) dealt with permitted increases of rent on account of repairs.

Counsel referred to the decision in Strickland v. Palmer (40 The Times L.R., 314, 649; [1924] 2 K.B., 572). There the objection to the appeal failed because the appeal arose in an action; but the court had expressed the view that if the matter appealed from had been an application, no appeal would have lain. The very wide words of the section in question might be contrasted with the words of section 12 (3), which dealt with apportionment. There it was specifically laid down that the amount was the only question on which the decision of the county court was final and conclusive.

Mr. MADDOCKS contended that the question here was not one "arising under subsection (1)." The sole question before the county court was the construction of the terms of the tenancy, which was a pure question of law. The landlords had no right to ask for determination in that manner; they should have got the matter settled by bringing an action for the increased rents. Further, in deciding that the notice of increase was valid, the county court was deciding questions outside any of the subsections referred to in subsection (6).

Mr. WADDY replied.

MR. JUSTICE SALTER.—In this case we have to determine a preliminary objection to the hearing of this appeal, and for that purpose to construe section 2 (6) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920. The deputy county court Judge has, on the application of the landlords, purported to decide certain matters under that subsection, which provides: "Any question arising under subsection (1), (2) or (3) of this section shall be determined on the application either of the landlord or the tenant by the county court, and the decision of the court shall be final and conclusive." Accordingly, a preliminary objection is now taken that no appeal lies from the decision of the county court.

The facts are very simple. The respondents are the owners and the appellant is the occupier of a dwelling-house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts apply. At the material time—July, 1927—the appellant was in the relation of what is called statutory tenant to the respondents of the premises in question; that is to say, his original contract of tenancy had expired, and he was holding over under the protection of the Acts. In the circumstances the respondents gave the appellant notice of increase of rent in the form provided in the First Schedule to the Act of 1920, setting out the heads of increase of rent which they proposed to claim. These were three in number: first, on the ground of increase of rates; secondly, the fifteen per cent. profit increase; and lastly, on the ground of responsibility for repairs; so that all the heads of increase fell under section 2 (1) of the Act of 1920. The tenant, as I understand, objected not very strenuously to the first two, but strenuously to the third, though he did not entirely agree with the lawfulness of the first two until the matter actually came into court. The landlords, accordingly, issued a summons under section 2 (6) calling upon the tenant to attend the county court upon their application to the court to determine certain matters. The matters which they invited the court to determine were as follows : First, whether the notice of increase was valid ; secondly, whether the landlords were responsible for all the repairs, so as to be entitled to charge the full twenty-five per cent. increase on that head, or only for part ; and thirdly, if they were not responsible for the whole of the repairs, what percentage of the increase they were entitled to charge.

It is said that the county court had no jurisdiction on that application to decide the first question, at any rate. It may be that the question is put in rather a compendious form, but I think that the court had jurisdiction to decide it. The question is, in substance, no more than a request to decide the validity of the first two grounds of increase of rent ; and, in fact, when the matter came into court, the tenant's objections to these heads were not pressed. I think that the court had jurisdiction to deal with that question. Its decision was that the notice was valid.

The next question submitted was whether the landlords were responsible for the whole or only part of the repairs, and the deputy Judge has found that the landlords were, as they claimed, responsible for the whole, and that, therefore, it was unnecessary to deal with the third question. It is said on behalf of the appellant that the question of responsibility for repairs was not a question arising under subsections (1), (2) or (3) of section 2 and that therefore the decision of the county court upon it was not final and conclusive. The argument is, and must be, that the court had no jurisdiction on that application to deal with that matter at all ; if it was "a question arising under subsections (1), (2) or (3)," then its decision was final and conclusive ; if it was not, then it had no jurisdiction to deal with the matter at all on that application. The question for this Court, therefore, is, was the matter "a question arising under" those subsections ?

The statute provides that "any question" arising under those subsections may be the subject of a summary application to the county court and a final and summary decision there. I should have thought that "any question" must mean any question at all, whether of law or fact. The questions arising under these statutes are sometimes questions of law and sometimes questions of fact. There is considerable authority for saying that questions of law, as well as questions of fact, come within subsection 6. Take, for example, questions arising under subsection (2) of section 2. That is the subsection which deals with insanitary condition of premises, and it provides : ". . . the tenant or the sanitary authority may apply to the county court for an order suspending such increase [on account of repairs] . . . on the ground that the house is not in all respects reasonably fit for human habitation, or is otherwise not in a reasonable state of repair. The Court, on being satisfied by the production of a certificate of the sanitary authority or otherwise that any such ground as aforesaid is established, and on being further satisfied that the condition of the house is not due to the tenant's neglect or default or breach of express agreement, shall order that the increase be suspended until the Court is satisfied, on the report of the sanitary authority or otherwise, that the necessary repairs (other than the repairs, if any, for which the tenant is liable) have been executed . . ." It is obvious, therefore, that, in order to deal with questions arising under that subsection, a Judge may have to deal with the terms of the tenancy, and an express agreement may have to be construed. In the present case the construction of a written contract, as contained in the tenant's rent-book, was necessary in order to determine whether the landlords were responsible for the whole or only for a part of the repairs ; and in the case which I have suggested under subsection (2) there would have to be the construction of a contract, but that clearly would not prevent the application from being one within the meaning of subsection (6). The position is the same with regard to subsection (3), which is the subsection dealing with the transfer of the burden of liabilities from landlord to tenant ; in order to determine disputes under that subsection it would be necessary to construe the first and second contracts of tenancy as regards liability to repair, or whatever the burden alleged to be transferred was, and to compare them. It is perfectly clear that a dispute arising under that subsection would come within the meaning of subsection (6), notwithstanding that it was a dispute of law.

Further, the case of Strickland v. Palmer (40 The Times L.R., 314, 649 ; [1924] 2 K.B., 572) has been cited to us. That case arose under section 2 (1) (b) which deals with increased rates. As I read the judgments, both in the Divisional Court and in the Court of Appeal, both Courts were of opinion that, if in that case the procedure had been adopted which has been adopted here, the county court would have had jurisdiction and its decision would have been final and conclusive. In that case, however, the proceeding in question was an action for rent, and it was held that in such a proceeding the decision of the county court was not final.

One has only to consider what the position would be, if it is right to say that this procedure was not open to the landlords in this matter. If it is not available to a landlord, it is equally not available to a tenant. Suppose, then, a landlord serves a notice of this kind, which the tenant disputes, and the landlord takes no further proceeding, and some time elapses : if the notice is good, a large amount of unpaid rent is becoming due from the tenant ; if, on the other hand, the notice is bad and the tenant has paid the increased rent, he has a right to claim back the rent overpaid. If this procedure is not open to him, he is unable to have the question determined, unless he brings an action.

I think that the intention of the statute is quite clear, and that there is a strong tendency on the part of the legislature, in the case of small tenancies, to make the decision of the county court summary and final in matters of this kind. I am of opinion that this was a final decision, and that no appeal lies from it.

MR. JUSTICE TALBOT.—I am of the same opinion. The question is whether an appeal lies from the decision of the county court on certain questions submitted to it and purporting to arise under section 2 (6) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920. The principal questions referred to it were whether, under the terms incorporated in a tenancy agreement taken over by the tenant from his predecessor, the landlords were or were not responsible for the whole of the repairs ; and if not for the whole, for what portion they were responsible. The bearing of that question on the relation between the parties depends on section 2 (1) (b), the effect of which is that if the landlord is responsible for the whole of the repairs, he may add an amount of twenty-five per cent. to the standard rent, and if responsible for part only, he may add an appropriate amount. That being a question the materiality of which is created by subsection (1) of this section, it is said that because it is a question of law involving the construction of terms of tenancy, upon the determination of which depends the amount of the addition that the landlord may make to the standard rent, the matter therefore does not arise under subsection (1) of this section. It appears to me to be impossible to give effect to that argument without doing violence to the words of the statute. I leave aside all consideration of inconvenient consequences that may arise, if the argument be correct, and what those consequences may be, and look simply at the question which was asked of the county court. The question was, whether the landlords were responsible for the whole of the repairs of this house, and were therefore entitled to add twenty-five per cent. to the standard rent in respect of that liability. It is impossible to say that that question does not arise under subsection (1) of section 2. I am of opinion that the decision of the county court was conclusive and that we have not power to deal with it.

K.B. Div. (Salter and Charles, JJ.) 1928. Mar. 21.

LLOYD v. COOK.*

Landlord and Tenant—Restrictions—Dwelling-house — Decontrol — Subsequent letting of part—Tenant of that part—Whether entitled to protection—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 17), s. 12 (2)—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923 (13 and 14 Geo. V., c. 32), s. 2 (1).

The fact that a dwelling-house has become decontrolled under s. 2 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, does not prevent the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, from applying to any other new dwelling-house which may afterwards be constituted by a separate letting of a part of the decontrolled dwelling-house.

This was an appeal by a tenant from a decision of his Honour Judge Hill Kelly, given at the Bloomsbury County Court, which raised an important point under the Rent Restriction Acts—namely, whether a fresh letting of part of premises which had been decontrolled was outside the protection of the Acts.

The respondent, Mrs. Kate Cook, was the holder of a 99 years' lease of premises known as 14, Eversholt-street, Camden Town, N.W.1. Three rooms on the third floor of that house had been let to a Mr. Churchman, who vacated possession on August 12, 1926. Mrs. Cook thereupon prepared one of those rooms for the use of her son, who came in and occupied it as soon as it was ready. She had the other two whitewashed and papered with a view to another letting.

On August 28, 1926, she let those two rooms on a weekly tenancy at a rent of 14s. a week to the appellant, Mr. Frederick Charles Lloyd. Mr. Lloyd applied to the Registrar to have the standard rent of his rooms fixed by an apportionment of the rent of the whole house on the ground that his rooms constituted a "dwelling-house" protected by the Rent Restriction Acts. The Registrar granted the application, and fixed the standard rent at 5s. 8d. a week, but the County Court Judge reversed that decision on appeal, and held that Mr. Lloyd's rooms were no longer protected by the Acts, having become decontrolled by virtue of section 2 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, which provides:—

"Where the landlord of a dwelling-house to which the principal Act [the Act of 1920] applies is in possession of the whole of the dwelling-house at the passing of this Act, or comes into possession of the whole of the dwelling-house at any time after the passing of this Act, then from and after the passing of this Act, or from and after the date when the landlord subsequently comes into possession, as the case may be, the principal Act shall cease to apply to the dwelling-house. . . ."

From this decision the tenant, Mr. Lloyd, appealed to a Divisional Court.

Mr. John Duncan appeared for the appellant; Mr. J. C. Lockwood and Mr. Gordon Clark for the respondent.

Mr. DUNCAN contended that the two rooms let to the appellant constituted "a part of a house let as a separate dwelling" within the meaning of section 12 (2) of the Act of 1920, and that their position was not affected by the fact that a different "dwelling-house"—namely, the three rooms which had been previously let to Mr. Churchman—had become decontrolled. He relied on Cohen v. Gold (43 The Times L.R., 376; [1927] 1 K.B., 865) and Darlington v. Arnold ([1927] 64 Law Jo. County Courts Rep., 59).

Mr. GORDON CLARK argued that the fresh letting of the two rooms to the appellant did not make them a fresh dwelling-house. What constituted a fresh dwelling-house was a question of fact for the County Court Judge, and here the County Court Judge had decided adversely to the tenant. The dwelling-house let to the appellant was substantially the same as that formerly let to Mr. Churchman. Further, decontrol of the whole necessitated decontrol of the part on the principle that the greater must include the less.

MR. JUSTICE SALTER.—Notwithstanding the excellent argument on behalf of the respondent by Mr. Gordon Clark, I think that this appeal must be allowed. The question raised is whether it is right to say that, when a dwelling-house has been decontrolled under section 2 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, so that the principal Act [the Act of 1920] no longer applies to it, the principal Act therefore cannot apply to any other new dwelling-house which may afterwards be created by a separate letting of a part of the decontrolled dwelling-house.

The facts here are simple. Mrs. Cook, who was the owner of a long lease of a dwelling-house, No. 14, Eversholt-street, Camden Town, let three rooms on the third floor of that house to a Mr. Churchman. That letting was undoubtedly the letting of a dwelling-house, and to that tenancy and that dwelling-house the Rent Restriction Acts applied. That tenancy came to an end by Churchman vacating the dwelling-house on August 12, 1926. Mrs. Cook, the landlord, thereupon took possession of that dwelling-house; she prepared one room out of the three for the use of her son, who came in and occupied it when it was ready, and she had the other two rooms whitewashed and papered with a view to letting. She subsequently let those two rooms to the appellant, Lloyd, his tenancy commencing on August 28, 1926. It is to my mind quite plain that that was a letting by her to Lloyd of a dwelling-house. The question is, Was it a dwelling-house to which the Rent Restriction Acts applied?

Lloyd applied at Bloomsbury County Court for an apportionment of the rent of 14, Eversholt-street with a view to determining the standard rent of his dwelling-house, namely these two rooms, under section 12 (3) of the Act of 1920. That subsection provides: "Where, for the purpose of determining the standard rent . . . of any dwelling-house to which this Act applies, it is necessary to apportion the rent at the date in relation to which the standard rent is to be fixed . . . the County Court may, on application by either party, make such apportionment as seems just. . . ."

The question, therefore, is whether Lloyd's dwelling-house consisting of these two rooms, the tenancy of which related him to Mrs. Cook, is a dwelling-house to which the Act of 1920 applies. In order to see whether it is, reference must be made to sub-section 2 of section 12. That sub-section reads: "This Act shall apply to a house or a part of a house let as a separate dwelling, where either the annual amount of the standard rent or the rateable value does not exceed" certain fixed limits. The rent of these two rooms is within those limits, and the two rooms are "part of a house let as a separate dwelling"; so far, therefore, Lloyd is entitled to an apportionment. It is, however, said that he is not entitled to an apportionment because his dwelling-house has been decontrolled. Reference, therefore, must be made to section 2 (1) of the Act of 1923. [His Lordship read the sub-section.] As I think I have observed in other cases under these Acts, it is always necessary to have regard to the questions, what is the dwelling-house, who is the landlord and who is the tenant, who are related by the tenancy. There is no doubt that Churchman's dwelling-house was decontrolled; when his tenancy ended, Mrs. Cook was the landlord of that dwelling-house and the whole of it came into her possession. That dwelling-house, therefore, was decontrolled and the Acts ceased to apply to it; if the statutes themselves are not sufficiently plain, that conclusion appears quite clearly from the case of Dunbar v. Smith (42 The Times L.R., 196; [1926] 1 K.B., 360); but because that dwelling-house was decontrolled, it does not follow that the dwelling-house constituted by the two rooms let to Lloyd is also decontrolled. In my opinion, it is not.

The case of Cohen v. Gold (43 The Times L.R., 376; [1927] 1 K.B., 865) is, I think, although not a direct authority in this case, very much in point. The facts in that case were that the landlord of a house was in possession of the whole house, with immaterial exceptions, at the passing of the 1923 Act. In 1925 he let three rooms to a tenant, and the question was whether he was in possession of the dwelling-house constituted by these three rooms at the passing of the Act. The Divisional Court held that he was not in possession of the three rooms as a dwelling-house, or as landlord, within the meaning of the Act, so as to effect decontrol. So far, then, that decision is in point.

In my opinion, the fact that Churchman's dwelling-house was decontrolled is quite irrelevant in this case: the question is whether Lloyd's dwelling-house was decontrolled. Mr. Gordon Clark ingeniously referred to this as being a question of fact. He contended that the fresh letting was not the letting of a fresh dwelling-house, and that the whole of the original dwelling-house, minus one room, was let to Lloyd. In my opinion, however, as soon as Lloyd's tenancy was created, there was brought into existence a new dwelling-house and one that became the subject of a new tenancy. The question then resolves itself into this—Has that new dwelling-house been decontrolled? In my opinion, it has not. I agree with the whole of the judgment of the County Court Judge except the last two lines. I agree with his finding that Mrs. Cook was the landlord of the dwelling-house consisting of the three rooms let to Churchman, and that on the termination of Churchman's tenancy she came into actual possession of the whole of that dwelling-house within the meaning of section 2 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923. I agree with his decision that thereby the Act of 1920 ceased to apply to the dwelling-house. I do not agree with his conclusion that consequently Lloyd was not entitled to have the rent of 14, Eversholt-street apportioned. I do not think that that follows.

I am of opinion that here the tenant was entitled to an apportionment and that this appeal must be allowed. The judgment in favour of the landlord must be set aside, and judgment entered in favour of the tenant.

MR. JUSTICE CHARLES.—I agree.

Leave to appeal was granted.

AYLWARD v. AYLWARD.*

Divorce—Practice—Wife's undefended petition for dissolution — Temporary separation — Evidence of husband's association with a known woman — Charge of adultery at a hotel with woman unknown — Evidence based on hotel incidents.

Held, that the petition must be dismissed because his Lordship was not satisfied as to the fact of the adultery alleged to have occurred at a hotel. It was one of the class of cases that cast a great reproach on the administration of justice in the Divorce Division. His Lordship would not sanction the practice of resorting to hotels to establish a prima facie case for dissolution of marriage.

This was an undefended petition in which Mrs. Louise Elizabeth Frances Aylward, née Gilliland, of the Ladies' Army and Navy Club, St. James'-place, prayed for the dissolution of her marriage with Mr. Cyril Bland Aylward, of Bournemouth, on the ground of his adultery with a woman unknown at the Hotel Belgravia, Victoria, in August 1927. During the petitioner's evidence it was stated that the respondent was in love with another woman who was not the subject of any charge in the pleadings.

Mr. R. F. Bayford, K.C., and Mr. H. W. Barnard appeared for the petitioner.

LORD MERRIVALE, after hearing the evidence, delivered judgment as follows :—

The question is whether I am convinced that adultery took place. This is a case of a class which, as I said last week,† tends to cast a great reproach on the administration of justice in this Division. Two people of a good position in life have been married four or five years when disagreements arise and the husband ceases to occupy the same room with his wife. They suggest living apart from each other for a time in order to start afresh, and act accordingly. Shortly afterwards the husband asks his wife to assist him in securing a dissolution of marriage as he cares for another woman. The wife does not know what to do. He sees her again and states in effect that he is in love with another woman and identifies the woman in question and states her address, and again asks his wife to help him to procure a dissolution of the marriage. The usual formal letter follows, dated September 3, 1927, enclosing a bill dated August 31 from a well-known hotel, and saying : "It (the bill) speaks for itself, seeing how things are with us." It shows that the respondent and a woman occupied a room as Mr. and Mrs. Aylward and that he duly paid the bill. The wife consulted her solicitors to know if she could file a petition for divorce. The petition was filed and comes on for trial. It is said that the petitioner is entitled to a finding that the respondent has committed adultery with a woman unknown.

I have to consider evidence of this kind in a state of things which undoubtedly exists in regard to artifical proceedings for dissolution of marriage by consent of the parties. The respondent seems to be a self-respecting man, not the sort of man to commit adultery with some chance person. Doubtless he stayed at the hotel with a woman with the object of securing a decree nisi, but I see no reason to suppose that the respondent "committed adultery with a woman unknown." The woman at the hotel might have been, for all I know, some near relative of his own. I pronounce no decree in this case.

It is time that this practice of resorting to hotels in order to make a prima facie case for dissolution of marriage, as the effect of a conclusion at which the parties have arrived between themselves, should be stopped. For my part I do not sanction it, and it will be stopped in this Division unless it is sanctioned by a higher authority elsewhere. I dismiss the petition, with costs against the respondent. I do so more readily because the parties here are in a position, if they think justice has not been administered, to take care that the matter should be reviewed.

In reply to observations by Mr. Bayford, the President said : "The wife's reluctance to be a willing party to a divorce was apparently overcome. As to the couple who occupied the room, they might have sat up all night. It is part of the ceremonial that they should be found in bed together."

[Solicitors—Messrs. Charles Russell and Co.]

† In the previous week Lord Merrivale adjourned two undefended petitions for divorce by wives for further inquiry, the charges in both being in respect of adultery alleged to have been committed at hotels. In the first his Lordship said : "The case which exists is not presented. I am not satisfied with regard to the proof of the unreal case when the real case has not been investigated."

In the second case his Lordship said : "I want to know what the real case is. Why are these mechanically conducted cases presented as a cloak for the real facts ? I have made it clear that I will not be a party to that sort of proceeding if I become aware of it. This is the second case of the sort in the last hour. Facts within the reach of the parties, and in one case within the knowledge of the parties, are withheld. A real case of an apparently adulterous association by the husband with another woman seems to exist. Cases presented on flimsy material make constant difficulty for the Court in what is known as 'hotel divorce,' resting upon technical proof of what may be an act of adultery without, as far as I know, inquiries into the real case. Inquiries might have been made at addresses known to the parties. Cases brought here on a flimsy proof of adultery bring discredit upon the administration of justice."

In the list of undefended suits heard on the same day as Aylward v. Aylward there were several petitions, the charges in which were based on hotel evidence, and in which the President declared himself satisfied, and granted decrees nisi.

In the first week of the Easter term the President adjourned for further inquiries several cases in which the charges were based upon hotel evidence, and in two cases, in which wife petitioners gave evidence of association between the husbands and women actually living with them as their wives, directed that the petitions should be amended and served on those women.

Chan. Div. (Russell, J.) 1928. Apr. 2.

WELD v. PETRE.*

Mortgage—Redemption—Shares—Lapse in payment of interest—Retention of shares by mortgagee—Dividends received in excess of loan and interest—Summons to redeem and claim to be paid the excess—Claim for personal order against mortgagee—Rules of the Supreme Court, Order LV., r. 5*a*.

In 1900 B. mortgaged shares in a company to L. to secure a loan of £1,000 for three months with interest at 6 per cent. The shares were afterwards registered in the mortgagee's name. The mortgage not being paid off the mortgagee received additional shares as further security. The dividends received by L. cleared the interest on the loan up to 1908. No further dividends were paid until 1916. L. retained the shares and by 1921 had received dividends sufficient to pay off the loan. L. died in 1923 and in 1926 the plaintiffs, who were entitled to the equity of redemption in the shares, claimed the right to redeem them. The right was disputed by L.'s executors although at that date the dividends received were in excess of what was sufficient to pay off principal, interest, and costs.

Held, that equity would not deprive a mortgagor of his right to redeem if when the right was asserted the debt had been, or could be, repaid, and if the security was available and no one's position had been altered in the meantime. There would accordingly be an order to re-assign the shares to the plaintiffs, but as an order for the repayment of the excess would be a personal order for payment against the mortgagee it could not be obtained by originating summons under Order LV., r. 5*a*, such excess being only recoverable in proceedings commenced by writ.

This was a summons by which persons claiming to be entitled to the equity of redemption in certain shares in a limited company sought to redeem them, the defendants being the executors of the mortgagee. Redemption was resisted on the ground that, owing to the delay and laches of the applicants, either their right to redemption had been lost or the Court should withhold its assistance by refusing to order redemption.

The relevant facts were as follows : The shares in question were originally 300 ordinary shares of £5 each fully paid in the Cornbrook Brewery Company, Limited. These were the property of Henry Weld-Blundell, who in February, 1900, mortgaged them to Joseph Francis Lescher, to secure a loan of £1,000 for three months with interest at 6 per cent. The shares were registered in the mortgagee's name on December 10, 1900. Henry Weld-Blundell died on September 5, 1901. His legal personal representatives were his widow, the plaintiff, Herbert Joseph Weld, and William Dalglish Bellasis. Apparently the executors were unable or unwilling to pay off Mr. Lescher's £1,000, and in July, 1902, they offered him 200 more shares as additional security. He accepted this offer and 200 more shares were registered in his name on August 14, 1902. The estate of the mortgagor proved in fact insolvent, but his brother, Charles Weld-Blundell, who was a large creditor, came to the rescue and took over some of the assets at the value of £8,534. He then proceeded to settle those assets for the benefit of his brother's widow and daughter. The settlement was dated September 1, 1902. Among the assets so acquired and settled were the 500 shares subject to the £1,000 mortgage ; but the mortgage was incorrectly described in the settlement as carrying interest at 5½ per cent. The trustees of the settlement were and are the present plaintiffs. Among the assets so acquired and settled were further parcels of ordinary shares in the same company, of which some were and some were not subject to mortgages. The interest which fell due to Mr. Lescher on August 5, 1903, was not punctually paid, and as a result Mr. Lescher obtained further security from the trustees, in pursuance of a power contained in the settlement, to the extent of another 100 shares, which were registered in his name on October 16, 1903. He was then mortgagee of 600 shares of £5 each. A dividend at the rate of 2 per cent. per annum, less tax, received by Mr. Lescher, cleared the interest on the loan up to February 5, 1904, and by means of similar dividends received by Mr. Lescher interest was cleared up to February 5, 1908. In 1908 Mr. Lescher became desirous of having his loan repaid, because, according to his letters, having been appointed chairman of petty sessions, he did not wish to be a holder of brewery ordinary shares. A correspondence ensued, in which Mr. Lescher threatened to sell and to take legal proceedings, and which culminated in a letter of June 18, 1908, from Mr. Lescher to the solicitors for the trustees in the following terms : "I have your letter of the 15th inst. The course you therein recommend will incur further pourparlers which is not my intention—and I mean acting promptly, and at once, however unpleasant such a course may be."

Mr. Lescher, however, did nothing at all. He never at any time either sold or foreclosed. Bad times came to the company and no dividend was paid on its ordinary shares, nor was there any trace during this period of Mr. Lescher's demanding or receiving interest on the £1,000. During the War prosperity came to the brewery, and in respect of the year 1916 and succeeding years down to the present time substantial dividends free of tax were paid on the ordinary shares. These dividends were received and retained by Mr. Lescher. In 1920 the 600 shares of £5 each were subdivided into 3,000 shares of £1 each, and 1,500 bonus shares were allotted to Mr. Lescher, with the result that he then held 4,500 fully paid shares of £1 each. The continued prosperity of the company was well known to both the trustees of the settlement. They held, as already pointed out, other ordinary shares therein. Moreover, the plaintiff, Herbert Joseph Weld, had throughout been a director of the company. By 1921 the dividends received by Mr. Lescher were sufficient to pay off the loan.

At the end of 1922, or early in 1923, it occurred to someone that Mr. Lescher's loan must or might have been satisfied out of the Cornbrook dividends, and on January 5, 1923, the plaintiff, Francis Joseph Weld, one of the trustees and the solicitor for the trustees, wrote a letter addressed to Mr. Lescher : "Adverting to the advance made by you to the late Mr. Henry Weld-Blundell on security of some Cornbrook shares it has been suggested to me by one of the family that I should approach you in the matter in view of the fact that by this time your debt must have been largely reduced if not paid off out of the dividends. Would you be prepared to transfer the shares back to Mrs. Henry Weld-Blundell and her daughter on payment of the principal due together with a reasonable rate of interest over the whole period during which the debt has run ? As you are, no doubt, aware, Mrs. Henry Weld-Blundell and her daughter are not well off, and I shall be glad if you will give the matter your consideration." Mr. Lescher never received that letter. He died on January 7, 1923, and the letter was answered by his daughter, who said the matter was for the executors and lawyers, whose address she gave.

The defendants, the executors of Mr. Lescher, proved his will in April, 1923. In 1923 the company issued further bonus shares, with the result that 2,250 ordinary shares were added to Mr. Lescher's holding. The 300 shares of £5 each, which were the subject of the original mortgage, had thus increased and multiplied until they were represented by 6,750 fully paid £1 shares. The 6,750 shares were still standing in the names of the defendants as executors of Mr. Lescher.

On October 4, 1926, the solicitors for the trustees wrote to the solicitors for Mr. Lescher's executors claiming to redeem the security. Correspondence ensued. The right to redeem was disputed and eventually this originating summons was issued on July 30, 1927.

Mr. Jenkins, K.C., and Mr. B. A. Hall appeared for the plaintiffs ; Mr. Spens, K.C., and Mr. Evershed for the defendants.

Mr. Justice Russell delivered a considered judgment. His Lordship stated the facts and said : Mr. Lescher's position as regards the loan was this. He had no personal remedy for the principal and interest, for his mortgagor was dead and the executors had no estate. He could only hope for recoupment either by realizing the shares as mortgagee, or by foreclosing and holding the shares as an investment or realizing them as absolute owner. Foreclosure could be dispensed with by obtaining a release of the equity of redemption, but he neither sold nor foreclosed, nor did he obtain a release of the equity of redemption. The only possible inference is that he determined to hold on to his security with a view to realizing it later to greater advantage. He elected to stand on his security.

The following facts are clear upon the evidence : (1) The plaintiffs are assignees of the equity of redemption in the shares ; (2) the mortgagee received in his lifetime, by means of dividends, moneys far more than sufficient to repay him the £1,000 principal with interest at the agreed rate from the date of the loan ; (3) the mortgaged shares with the bonus additions are there, available for return to the assignees of the equity of redemption if the debt for which they stood in Mr. Lescher's name as security has been repaid ; and (4) no right of any third person affecting the shares has intervened, for those claiming under Mr. Lescher's will are mere volunteers. In those circumstances the plaintiffs are, in my opinion, prima facie entitled to redeem.

On what grounds is this claim resisted ? The evidence of the defendants contains suggestions of foreclosure by Mr. Lescher, or alternatively of a bargain by which in some way Mr. Lescher is supposed to have acquired the shares freed from any right to redeem. There is no justification for either suggestion, nor does any Statute of Limitations apply to bar the right to redemption. Ultimately the defendants were driven to rely solely on delay and laches and their contention was that this Court, in view of delay by the plaintiffs, would refuse to grant to the plaintiffs the equitable relief which they sought.

This question of delay requires some careful examination in order to see exactly at what point of time the delay is said to begin. Mr. Lescher undoubtedly held as mortgagee when he wrote his letter in June, 1908. The plaintiffs were under no contractual liability to him to pay either interest or principal, nor was there, so far as I can see, any duty on them to inquire from time to time whether he still held the shares, or, if he held them, whether he held them as mortgagee. It was open to him to sell after notice, or to foreclose. He did neither, and the plaintiffs were entitled, and indeed bound, to assume that he continued to hold the shares as mortgagee until the time arrived when the loan had or might have been paid off out of the dividends received by the mortgagee ; the plaintiffs were in no way bound to assert their right to redeem or their right to have the shares retransferred to them. But, from the evidence, we now know that this event did not in fact occur until some time in the middle of the year 1921. Eighteen months later the letter of January 5, 1923, is written, and in October, 1926, the claim to redeem is quite definitely made and insisted upon. In my view no greater delay can be attributed to the plaintiffs than the period of five years which elapsed between the middle of 1921 and October, 1926. If I am right in this view there is no foundation for the suggestion that delay or laches can be any answer to the present claim.

It was argued, however, by the defendants that the period of delay must for some reason be dated back to June 18, 1908, that is, some 18 years before the claim against the executors and some 19 years before the issue of the originating summons herein. Upon this footing it is said that the delay is so great that this Court ought to and will refuse to grant equitable relief, and in arriving at that conclusion will be assisted, if not guided, by a consideration of the Statute of Limitations. Why delay should commence to run in June, 1908, I confess I cannot imagine, but the case was argued on that footing. Instances were cited of cases in which equitable relief was refused after lengthy delay on the part of the person seeking it. I do not propose dealing with those cases, which are unconnected with mortgages. Three cases as to relief in respect of mortgages were cited, but no one of them appears to be of assistance to me here. In Floyer v. Lavington (1 P. Williams, 268) a bill was brought for the redemption of a rent-charge expressed to be redeemable in the grantor's lifetime. The rent-charge had been granted some 60 years before. In the meanwhile the grantee had, after the death of the grantor, conveyed the rent-charge to a purchaser who had settled it on his marriage. Redemption was sought by the heir of the grantor. The Lord Chancellor dismissed the bill on various grounds, which included delay. The reporter adds that "It was thought that the length of time was the chief objection." It is, however, obvious that in addition to lapse of time the position had altered and other rights had intervened.

Lockwood v. Ewer (9 Mod., 275) was a case in which, after 21 years, the representatives of a mortgagor claimed redemption against the representatives of a mortgagee. The subject-matter of the mortgage, made in 1708, was stock in the old East India Company. The facts are not very lucidly stated in the report, but this much appears, that the mortgagee had had to expend moneys on calls, that the old and the new East India Companies had been united, and that before his death in 1715 the mortgagee had sold out the mortgaged stock. The Lord Chancellor's judgment is in the main directed to showing that the mortgagee could sell the stock without the necessity of foreclosing. He then dismissed the bill, the delay in that case being fatal. In that case, too, it is obvious that during the period of delay changes had occurred, and indeed the stock seems to have been sold.

Brooks v. Muckleston ([1909] 2 Ch., 519) was an instance of the dismissal of a foreclosure action on the ground of delay. The delay was grievous, and in the meanwhile the defendant, though having notice of the mortgage, had paid value for the mortgaged property upon the faith of the fact that no interest had been paid or claimed for 45 years. The case is quite unlike the present one, and in any event different considerations should, it seems to me, apply to applications by mortgagors to redeem from those which apply to applications by mortgagees to foreclose. Even if the delay to be imputed to the plaintiffs extends beyond the five years which I have indicated to some point of time subsequent to June, 1908, none of the cases cited would, in my opinion, justify me in declining to order redemption in the present case. There can be no doubt on the evidence that when the account is taken nothing will be found due in respect of principal, interest, or costs. The shares are available and no one has altered his position in the meantime. Equity should not, in my opinion, deprive mortgagors of their right to redeem if when they assert it the debt has been or can be repaid, and if the security is available, and if no one's position has been altered in the meanwhile. If these circumstances co-exist the mortgagor should be allowed to redeem unless his right has been destroyed by statute, foreclosure, sale, or release.

There is no difficulty in the present case as to ordering a re-assignment of the 6,750 shares. The plaintiffs, however, ask in addition for an account of the dividends received by Mr. Lescher and his executors and payment of the balance after deducting the amount of principal, interest and costs in respect of the loan. This is asking for a personal order for payment against the mortgagee. Such relief they are not, in my opinion, entitled to obtain by means of an originating summons. The relief obtainable under Order LV., Rule 5*a*, is confined to the relief there specified and does not extend to personal orders for payment. If the plaintiffs desire to recover from the defendants any moneys received over and above the amount of principal, interest, and costs, they can only do so in proceedings commenced by writ, to which, of course, the relevant Statute of Limitations would apply. The plaintiffs concede that the defendants are entitled to their costs of the present proceedings. These must be taxed as mortgagee's costs. I will order an account to be taken of what, if anything, is due to the defendants as executors of Mr. Lescher for principal, interest, and costs, including therein their costs of this action in respect of the loan of £1,000 with interest at 6 per cent. advanced by Mr. Lescher to Henry Weld-Blundell in February, 1900. I further order that upon payment by the plaintiffs to the defendants of the amount, if any, found due or, if nothing is found due, upon the filing of the certificate finding that nothing is due, the defendants do transfer the 6,750 shares standing in their names to the plaintiffs or as they shall direct. And I direct that in taking the account interest is to be calculated only from November 5, 1905, and credit is to be given for all cash received since that date by Mr. Lescher, or the defendants, by way of dividend or bonus in respect of the shares from time to time standing in the name of Mr. Lescher or themselves as security for the said loan of £1,000. That is the strict order. I would, however, suggest that, without in any way prejudicing the defendants' right to appeal, an order should be made in the following form :—The defendants admitting that the cash dividends received by Mr. Lescher in his lifetime, or by the defendants after his death, in respect of the 600 Cornbrook shares and the 3,000 shares into which they were sub-divided, and the 1,500 and 2,250 bonus shares, exceed the amount which on taking an account would be found due for principal, interest and costs in respect of the loan of £1,000 with interest at 6 per cent. per annum made by Mr. Lescher to Henry Weld-Blundell in February, 1900, order the defendants to execute a transfer to the plaintiffs, or as they shall direct, of the said 3,000, 1,500, and 2,250 shares and to deliver to the plaintiffs such executed transfer together with the certificate or certificates relating to the said shares.

Counsel for the parties consenting, the order was made in the latter form.

EBNER v. LASCELLES.*

Landlord and Tenant—Restrictions—Dilapidations—Transfer of burden to tenant—Non-occupation by tenant — Subletting of part furnished — Assessment of dilapidations — Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 17), s. 2 (3).

The plaintiff was the lessor and the defendant was the lessee of a flat consisting of ground floor and basement, the lease exempting the lessee from liability for loss arising from fair wear and tear. When the lease expired in 1921 the plaintiff granted to the defendant a fresh lease but the above exemption was withdrawn. The defendant never occupied the flat but sublet the ground floor furnished and the basement unfurnished. When the lease expired both the ground floor and the basement were vacant and the defendant gave up the premises.

In an action for dilapidations,

Held, (1) that non-occupation by the tenant did not take away the protection given to the tenant by s. 2 (3) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, as regards the transfer of a liability for cost of repairs, (2) that the subletting of the ground floor furnished, which had come to an end, did not take any part of the premises outside the Act, so far as a claim for dilapidations was concerned, and (3) that the defendant was liable only for damages on the basis of the exemption contained in the earlier lease.

This was an appeal by the defendant from a decision of his Honour Judge Moore Cann, at the Brighton County Court, in favour of the landlord.

The plaintiff, Mr. William Frederick Ebner, was the landlord of a block of flats at Codrington House, Hampton-place, Brighton. The defendant, Miss Beatrice Lascelles, was the tenant of Flat No. 1, which consisted of a ground floor and basement premises. In 1916 the tenant had taken over the residue of a three years' lease of those premises from March 25, 1915, at a rent of £82 10s. per annum. Under that lease the tenant had been exempted from liability for loss arising from accidental fire, fair wear and tear, and reasonable use of the premises. She was granted a further lease, containing similar exceptions, at a rent of £90 per annum from March 25, 1918. Under a third agreement the premises were again let to her on March 25, 1921 ; the lease was for three years at a rent of £130, with an option of a further three years' lease at a rent of £150, but the exceptions clause contained in the earlier leases was withdrawn. The tenant exercised the option of renewal, and finally gave up the premises on March 24, 1927. The tenant had never herself occupied the premises, but had systematically sublet the ground floor portion as furnished premises. She had also sublet the basement portion unfurnished. Both portions became vacant before the lease expired.

The plaintiff brought an action, in which he claimed for dilapidations under the last-mentioned agreement. The defendant contended that the premises were under the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts, and that the withdrawal of the exceptions clause contained in the earlier leases constituted the transfer to her of a burden previously borne by the landlord within the meaning of section 2 (3) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, and that therefore the dilapidations ought to be assessed, not under the covenants in the last agreement, but under the earlier and less onerous covenants. She counterclaimed £33 10s. for rent overpaid for the period of six months before action brought.

The County Court Judge held that, inasmuch as the tenant had taken the premises for the sole purpose of subletting the whole, and had never gone into occupation herself, the premises were not protected by the Rent Restrictions Acts ; and that, if he were wrong in that conclusion, and the premises did come within the Acts, the ground floor flat had been taken outside the Act by reason of its having been sublet furnished.

The tenant appealed.

Mr. Alexander Cairns appeared for the appellant ; Mr. J. G. Hurst, K.C., and Mr. John Flowers for the respondent.

Mr. Justice Salter.—This appeal raises questions under the Rent Restrictions Acts which, as sometimes happens under those Acts, are not altogether free from difficulty. The action was one for dilapidations —an action to recover damages for breach of the repairing covenants under an agreement of tenancy. Liability for a breach of the agreement to repair was admitted, but it was said by the defendant that she was not liable on the whole of the covenants in the agreement inasmuch as they had been extended beyond the repairing covenants in previous agreements between the landlord and herself and therefore constituted a transfer of a burden from the landlord to herself within section 2 (3) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, and therefore one that was not permitted. That was her first contention. She further set up a counterclaim for rent overpaid in excess of the standard rent. The questions which arose in the case were whether the premises, the subject of the tenancy, were or were not a dwelling-house to which the Acts applied ; and, having regard to the sublettings which had been made by the defendant, the further question whether each part was or was not a dwelling to which the Acts applied and whether there was the larger or the smaller liability to repair in respect of each part.

The facts are that in 1916 the defendant, Miss Lascelles, became tenant from Sir James Bradford of the premises now in question for the residue of a term of three years expiring March 25, 1918, at a rent of £82 10s. The premises in question are known as Flat No. 1, Codrington House, Brighton, and it is common ground that this letting of 1915 was the first letting of this flat since August 4, 1914, and therefore it is common ground that £82 10s. a year is the standard rent of the dwelling-house which forms the subject of tenancy between these parties. That three years' tenancy expired on March 25, 1918, and from that date Miss Lascelles took this flat from Sir James Bradford for a further three years at an increased rent—namely, £90 per annum. Neither at that time nor at any time was any notice to increase the rent given under the Rent Restrictions Acts. On March 25, 1921, on the expiration of that second period, there was a third tenancy created which is the tenancy with which we are more particularly concerned. The tenancy was between Sir James Bradford and Miss Lascelles, and was for six years at £130 a year for the first three years and £150 a year for the second three years, with power to the tenant to determine the agreement at the end of the first three years. The repairing covenant in the agreements of 1915 and of 1918 had been a covenant to repair, fair wear and tear and reasonable use excepted. The repairing covenant in the tenancy agreement of March 25, 1921, omitted the words "fair wear and tear and reasonable use excepted" ; otherwise the repairing covenant was the same, so that it was made heavier upon the tenant to her disadvantage and the advantage conferred upon the landlord was made greater by the omission of those words. The tenant did not determine the six years' tenancy at the end of the first three years ; it therefore ran its full length and expired on March 25, 1927. Miss Lascelles during this period of 12 years, except for a short period, did not occupy this dwelling-house or any part of it herself. With regard to the ground floor part of the demised dwelling-house she furnished that and sublet it from time to time furnished to subtenants. With regard to the other part of the demised premises—the basement—she sublet that unfurnished from time to time to subtenants, and these sublettings by her, whether of the ground floor or of the basement, were sublettings for habitation. When the end of the period—March 25, 1927—was approaching both Miss Lascelles' subtenants had left the premises. The furniture had been removed and for a week or two before the contractual tenancy ended on March 25, 1927, this flat had been in fact unoccupied. This is, therefore, not a case of continuation under the statutes, or of a statutory tenancy : the tenancy here was always a contractual tenancy. When the contract ended the tenancy ended and the plaintiff took possession of the vacant premises. The plaintiff had been Miss Lascelles' landlord since 1922. The premises having been surveyed, the interior was found to be to some extent out of repair and this claim was made. The question is whether the landlord is entitled as against this tenant to enforce to the full the repairing covenant in its existing form with the omission of any words as to fair wear and tear and reasonable use.

The first argument that was raised before the learned County Court Judge was this : that the Acts did not apply to this tenancy of these premises because these were business premises. Business premises did not come within the purview of these Acts till 1920. The Act of that year brought them for a very short time within the purview of the Acts and provided by section 13 (1) : "This Act shall apply to any premises used for business trade or professional purposes or for the public service as it applies to a dwelling-house, and as though references to 'dwelling-house' 'house' and 'dwelling' included references to any such premises" subject to certain modifications.

The learned Judge applied his mind to the question whether these premises were used for business, trade, or professional purposes, and he has found that these are business premises. If they are, then, no doubt, the Act does not apply to them. So far as section 13 (1) is concerned, I agree that the question whether these are premises used for business, trade, or professional purposes is a question of fact, if there is any evidence ; but I am quite unable to see that these are premises used for business purposes, trade purposes, or professional purposes. What has to be considered is the actual use to which the demised premises are in fact put. I think it is not immaterial to refer to the description of the demised premises in the tenancy agreement. It is : "All that residential flat being the ground floor flat, Codrington House, Brighton, in the County of Sussex, together with the two front rooms, scullery, yard, and lavatory in the basement of such premises," and there is a covenant not to assign, underlet, or part with possession except as a furnished flat for a period not exceeding six months, and not to carry on, in, or upon the said premises any trade or business. The flat is, therefore, let as a residential flat and obviously let for habitation, and it has been sublet in two parts, always for habitation. I am quite unable to see any evidence on which the learned Judge could find that these premises are premises used for business, trade, or professional purposes. But I think that is not the real question. The real question is under subsection 12 (2), which provides : "This Act shall apply to a house or a part of a house let as a separate dwelling." The word "house" there obviously applies to the structure and this flat is, to my mind, quite clearly "part of a house let as a separate dwelling." It is quite clear from the agreement that these premises were let as a residential flat on condition that no business was carried on there. I am, therefore, not able to agree with the learned Judge in finding that the Acts did not apply to this flat on the ground that it was not a dwelling-house or was business premises.

The next point taken is that the Rent Restriction Acts did not apply to this flat because the defendant was never in occupation. Non-occupation is, in substance, admitted. Miss Lascelles, in her cross-examination, said, "I told Sir James Bradford that I got the premises for the express purpose of subletting. I only occasionally used them myself." It may, therefore, be taken that except for a short period or short periods she never was herself in occupation of this flat. In the last few weeks before the tenancy expired no one was in occupation. The subtenants had gone. Miss Lascelles, of course, was in possession of the whole flat but was not in occupation. It is said that since she was not substantially in occupation at any time during the tenancy the Acts do not apply to this flat, and in support of that contention Hicks v. Scarsdale Brewery Company ([1924] W.N., 189), Gidden v. Mills ([1925] 2 K.B., 713), and Prout v. Hunter (40 The Times L.R., 868 ; [1924] 2 K.B., 736) are cited. If those cases are looked at it will be seen they are all cases of actions for ejectment. In Hicks v. Scarsdale Brewery Company (supra) Mr. Justice Rigby Swift held that a tenant, in order that he may be entitled to hold over under the protection of the Acts after the expiration of the contractual tenancy, must be in occupation when the tenancy ended. This particular right which is given by these Acts to tenants was described by Mr. Justice Lush in the well-known case of Keeves v. Dean (40 The Times L.R., 211 ; [1924] 1 K.B., 685) as a "status of irremovability" and the subsequent authorities have approved that view. One of the tenant's rights is to hold over against the landlord's will after his contractual term is ended, but it is a right to keep possession—and if he has not got possession at the material time he loses that right. That, I understand to be the position in Hicks v. Scarsdale Brewery Company (supra). I do not know that I need say anything with regard to Gidden v. Mills (supra) and Prout v. Hunter (supra).

It has been said, quite rightly, that the main rights conceded to a tenant under these Acts are first a status of irremovability, and next fair rents, that is to say, the right not to have the rent raised unduly. The right to hold over is a right that comes into existence after the expiration of the contractual tenancy. As long as the tenant is there under the protection of his contract he has no need of the protection of the Act, but the Act also protects him during his contractual tenancy in regard to rent because, notwithstanding that he may make other agreements with his landlord, he is not to be charged more rent than the law allows, and if he is overcharged he can have it reduced. The latter is, therefore, a protection which he has during the tenancy and the two rights must be kept distinct. It does not at all follow that, because a tenant loses his right to hold over if he is not in occupation at the end of his contractual period, therefore he cannot have the benefit of the Act to protect him during the period of his contractual tenancy. It appears to me not to follow at all. In this case if Miss Lascelles had denied the plaintiff's right to possession it may be that the plaintiff would have succeeded against her on the ground that she was not in occupation at the end of the tenancy, but to my mind it does not in the least follow that therefore this was a tenancy to which the Act did not apply so as to protect her in regard to the amount of rent and repairs.

The third point taken is that, because part of this flat was sublet furnished by Miss Lascelles, therefore the Act does not apply to the flat as a whole or at any rate does not apply to the part sublet furnished. The authorities referred to here are Prout v. Hunter (supra), Leslie and Co., Limited v. Cumming and Others (42 The Times L.R., 504 ; [1926] 2 K.B., 417). The last also was an ejectment case. In Prout v. Hunter (supra) the tenant had sublet the whole furnished. It was held that the landlord was entitled to eject because the tenant had taken the whole premises out of the Act by subletting them furnished. In the case of Leslie and Co., Limited v. Cumming and Others (supra) the tenant had sublet part furnished. An action for ejectment was brought in regard to the whole premises, and the Court held that the landlord was not entitled to succeed in the action for the whole, leaving open the question whether he might not have succeeded if he had confined his claim to the part that had been sublet furnished. There are observations of Mr. Justice Roche and Mr. Justice MacKinnon which must be cited.

Mr. Justice Roche said, after referring to the terms of section 12 (2) of the Act of 1920 : "Then occurs the proviso as to furnished letting. The contention here is that the application of the Act to the whole of these demised premises is excluded by this proviso as to furnished letting. But the whole of these demised premises were not let furnished ; only two rooms were so let. It may be that in accordance with the reasoning in Gidden v. Mills (supra), which follows and applies Prout v. Hunter (supra) and Phillips v. Hallahan (41 The Times L.R., 407 ; [1925] 1 K.B., 756), the plaintiffs, if they had claimed possession of the two rooms let to Mr. Samad, might have succeeded. It is, however, unnecessary to decide that point." Mr. Justice MacKinnon said : "As regards the previous letting to Mrs. Willcocks and Mr. Moore, whose occupation had come to an end long before proceedings had been taken in this action, I agree that the time at which one has to consider whether a dwelling-house is a dwelling-house subject to the protection of the Act is the date of the writ or, in this case, the plaint in the County Court. I do not suppose that Mr. Stone would have sought to argue that Prout v. Hunter (supra) went as far as to apply in a case where the dwelling-house had been let furnished during the currency of the original lease, say in 1919 or 1920, but he does seek to say that a letting furnished for, I suppose, however short a period after the tenant became a statutory tenant took the house out of the category of a protected house and put it into the category of an unprotected house. It is only necessary to consider what startling results that contention would lead to in order to see that that argument must be wrong. For instance, if there be, as well there may be, a person in occupation of a house at Henley-on-Thames as what is called a statutory tenant, and supposing the owner of that house discovered that the statutory tenant let the premises furnished for the regatta week in 1922, could he now, by virtue of that use of the house for a week four years ago, come to the Court and say: Give me possession of the premises, because by virtue of that temporary subletting so long ago the premises ceased to be protected? I am far from saying that because you find that some contention under these Acts leads to an extraordinary result that therefore that cannot be the effect of the Act, because the Acts are so worded that extraordinary results of one kind and another do follow; but I think those considerations assist in leading one to the conclusion, with which I agree, that the fact that a house has been let furnished for a period which has expired before proceedings are commenced cannot be relied upon as taking the house out of the protection of the Act in the way which is suggested."

In this case these proceedings are commenced after this tenancy has completely ended and the landlord has retaken possession of the premises. Mr. Justice MacKinnon there suggests that it is right to say that a subletting even of the whole of the premises furnished which is finished and done with before action brought would not deprive the tenant of any rights and a fortiori the letting of a part would not have that effect. My view is that the letting furnished of a part of this flat by the defendant does not have any effect in taking this flat or any part of it out of the operation of the Act as regards the extent of the covenant to repair and the right of the tenant to claim the protection of the Act in respect thereof.

The only other matter to consider is the defendant's counterclaim with regard to rent overpaid. She puts her case, and I think she is entitled to do so, in this way—she says that the extension of the scope of the repairing covenant is under the Act equivalent to an increase of rent and is therefore not permissible. With regard to the rent it is common ground that the standard rent is £82 10s. a year, and that for six months before action was brought she paid at the rate of £150 a year. The difference is £33 15s. It is then argued that the claim for rent overpaid ought not to apply to the part let furnished, but only to the basement. I have already dealt with that point in another portion of my judgment. In my view it is not sound. I think, therefore, the judgment of the learned County Court Judge must be set aside and judgment must be for the plaintiff for such damages as may be found to be due on the assumption that the tenancy is subject to the "fair wear and tear" clause, and that on the counterclaim judgment must be entered for the defendant for £33 10s.

The appeal is, therefore, allowed.

MR. JUSTICE CHARLES.—I agree, and will add only a very few words on one point. The County Court Judge, in his judgment, said as follows: "Where a tenant takes premises for the sole purpose of subletting the whole and never goes into occupation herself, the case is not protected by the Act. It seems to me that that is only another way of saying that they are business premises taken for business purposes. That really deals with the whole of the case as regards the Act." I desire to say that that appears to me to involve a misconception of the true connotation of the term "business premises" in this Act of Parliament. It is a misconception to say that to take a lease of premises for the sole purpose of subletting is the taking of the premises for business purposes and that, thereby, the premises become business premises. It appears to me that no such meaning can be imported into the words of the Act, which mean exactly what they say. The premises here were not premises used for "business, trade, or professional purposes."

Prob., Divorce, and Adm. Div. (Lord Merrivale, P.) } 1928. Mar. 26.

Divorce—Maintenance—Deed of separation—Covenant by husband to provide allowance—Covenant by wife not to sue for further support, alimony, or maintenance—Decree absolute for dissolution granted to wife on the ground of husband's adultery—Petition by her for maintenance—Covenant pleaded in bar—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 49), ss. 190, 192.

A woman who in a deed of separation covenanted in consideration of certain benefits not to claim from her husband in the future "support, maintenance, or alimony," and was afterwards granted a decree absolute of divorce, was held not to be debarred from petitioning for maintenance after the dissolution of marriage, notwithstanding that the deed contained no provision for its termination on the marriage being dissolved. It was held that the woman made the covenant, as a wife, with her husband, as a husband, but being no longer the wife she was entitled to proceed with her petition for a pecuniary allowance from her former husband.

This was a summons adjourned into Court on appeal from the order of a registrar dismissing the petition for maintenance of a woman who had been granted a decree absolute dissolving her marriage. The parties were married on June 8, 1892, in Ireland, and there were four children now living, all of age. In 1904 the wife instituted proceedings in the Dublin High Court for a divorce a mensa et thoro on the ground of her husband's alleged cruelty, but the suit was compromised by an indenture dated June 8, 1904. It set out that owing to unhappy differences the parties had agreed to live separate from each other for the future; that the husband covenanted to pay the wife £50 a year during her life, and to charge a moiety of such annuity upon a leasehold house of the husband's; and that the wife covenanted that she or any person on her behalf "shall not at any time hereafter commence or prosecute any action or other proceeding for compelling the said G. E. H. to cohabit with her, or to allow her any support, maintenance, or alimony," except the £50 annuity. There was also a covenant by the wife indemnifying the husband against any liabilities or claims.

In 1919 the wife again filed a petition in the Dublin High Court for a divorce a mensa et thoro on the ground of alleged cruelty, but the proceedings were compromised by a fresh deed of separation dated November 15, 1920. The main difference between this indenture and that of 1904 was that the later one transferred to the wife all the husband's interests in the aforesaid house in substitution for the £50 annuity. The other covenants by both parties in the old deed were reproduced in the new deed, which, however, contained no provision for its termination in the event of the marriage being dissolved. The new deed also contained the proviso that the wife should not at any time thereafter take any proceedings against the husband to "obtain a divorce or judicial separation in respect of any misconduct which has heretofore taken place or is alleged to have taken place" on the part of the husband.

In November, 1924, the wife filed a further petition in the Dublin High Court for a divorce a mensa et thoro, to which the husband appeared under protest against the jurisdiction, and set up that since 1922 he had acquired an English domicile. In November, 1925, the petition was dismissed on the ground that the respondent had acquired an English domicile. On September 25, 1926, the wife filed a petition in the English High Court praying for the dissolution of her marriage on the ground of his adultery, and on May 4, 1927, at Liverpool Assizes, she was granted a decree nisi dissolving her marriage, and this decree was made absolute on November 14, 1927. On November 15, 1927, she filed a petition for maintenance. On January 6, 1928, the respondent issued a summons calling upon the petitioner to show cause why the maintenance proceedings should not be stayed and the petition dismissed on the ground that the petitioner was estopped from presenting or prosecuting the same by her covenant in the indenture of November 15, 1920. During the proceedings before the registrar it was not denied that the husband had complied with his covenants. The registrar dismissed the petition for maintenance, and the petitioner appealed.

Sir James O'Connor, K.C., and Mr. J. W. Morris appeared for the petitioner appellant; Mr. Clifford Mortimer and Mr. A. Richard Ellis for the respondent.

Sir J. O'Connor submitted that the petitioner was entitled to proceed with her claim for maintenance under section 190 (1) and (2) and section 192 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925.

By section 190, "(1) The Court may, if it thinks fit, on any decree for divorce or nullity of marriage, order that the husband shall, to the satisfaction of the Court, secure to the wife such gross sum of money or annual sum of money for any term, not exceeding her life, as having regard to her fortune, if any, to the ability of her husband and to the conduct of the parties, the Court may deem to be reasonable. . . . (2) In any such case as aforesaid the Court may, if it thinks fit, by order, either in addition to or instead of an order under subsection (1) of this section, direct the husband to pay to the wife during the joint lives of the husband and wife such monthly or weekly sum for her maintenance and support as the Court may think reasonable. . . ."

By section 192, "The Court may, after pronouncing a decree for divorce or for nullity of marriage, inquire into the existence of ante-nuptial or post-nuptial settlements made on the parties whose marriage is the subject of the decree, and may make such orders with reference to the application of the whole or any part of the property settled either for the benefit of the children of the marriage or of the parties to the marriage, as the Court thinks fit. . . ."

Counsel said that section 190 was drawn in the widest language and the Court was unfettered by the existence of the petitioner's covenant. Before the decree absolute the parties had mutual rights as husband and wife, but after it they were strangers to one another. There was a complete change of status. A covenant made by a wife qua wife could not fetter the discretion entrusted by the legislature to the Court in dealing with the question of maintenance. The Court was put in the position that Parliament occupied before the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, and had power to make arrangements which were proper and decent in the circumstances after a dissolution of marriage. He commented on the difference in the wording of the subsections relating to dissolution and judicial separation. Section 190 (4) said: "Where any decree for restitution of conjugal rights or judicial separation is made on the application of the wife, the Court may make such order for alimony as the Court thinks just." In regard to dissolution the word used was "reasonable." The distinction might be illustrated by the classical example in The Merchant of Venice. Portia in that great passage beginning "The quality of mercy is not strained" asked Shylock to be reasonable. He would not, and she then used her trump card. The petitioner's covenant not to take proceedings was bad as being against public policy.

Counsel referred to Bishop v. Bishop and Judkins v. Judkins (13 The Times L.R., 366; [1897] P. 138). There the Court of Appeal decided that notwithstanding that by an agreement for separation, made between husband and wife on withdrawal of the wife's petition for divorce, the wife had agreed to accept a specified sum for maintenance, to be paid whether the marriage were dissolved or not, the Court had power under the Divorce Acts, after a decree of dissolution on a fresh petition by the wife based on misconduct by the husband since the agreement, to disregard the agreement and order permanent alimony to be paid to her at a rate exceeding the amount specified in the agreement, if on inquiry the husband's means permitted it. Counsel pointed out that in his judgment in Bishop v. Bishop (supra) Sir Francis Jeune, President, explained Sir James Hannen's judgment in Morrall v. Morrall (6 P.D., 98), where the marriage had been dissolved on the ground of the husband's adultery and he contested his former wife's petition for maintenance on the ground that by an agreement she had covenanted not to seek further "support, maintenance, or alimony." Sir James Hannen, in Sir F. Jeune's opinion, considered that the agreement was based on the condition of separation between the parties and did not restrain the wife when her right to a dissolution of her marriage was established, and when thus a state of things arose which was not in contemplation when the deed was executed. Lord Justice Lindley, in giving judgment in Bishop v. Bishop (supra), said, at page 164 : "We are not aware of any authority since the Divorce Act which shows that a covenant by a husband or wife not to sue the other for a divorce grounded on future misconduct is valid, and we doubt whether an express covenant not to sue for increased alimony in the event of such a divorce could be recognized."

In Reid v. Reid (42 The Times L.R., 30 ; [1926] P., 1) it was held that a wife who had an allowance under a separation deed, which contained no provision for its termination in the event of a divorce, might be restrained by an order for permanent maintenance from taking any proceedings to enforce the allowance under the separation deed in addition to such maintenance.

He submitted that the registrar was wrong in dismissing the petition.

Mr. CLIFFORD MORTIMER said that this was a matter of importance arising for the first time. It had never been decided, though there were a number of judicial dicta relating to it. He understood that there were two propositions advanced for the petitioner : (1) The change of status resulting from the dissolution of the marriage entitled her to repudiate her covenant ; (2) the statutes empowered the Court to grant her maintenance despite her covenant. As against these propositions he submitted (1) that the change of status did not relieve the wife from her contractual obligations unless the deed gave her such power, and the deed did not ; and (2) that the Matrimonial Causes Acts gave the Court no power to set aside a covenant made in these circumstances and the petitioner was bound by her common law obligation. The decision in Morrall v. Morrall (supra) was given on grounds which by common consent had been accepted as wrong. In no case had there ever been a decision on this point. He distinguished Bishop v. Bishop (supra), in which there was no covenant not to sue, and Gandy v. Gandy (7 P.D., 77, 168), which was a judicial separation case. There was no doubt of a wife's capacity to enter into a separation deed and to be bound by her covenants (Besant v. Wood, 12 Ch.D., 605).

The wife had compromised a suit by a deed partly for her benefit. A deed of separation usually contained a covenant to end its provisions if the marriage were dissolved, but there was no such provision in this deed. If there was a deed made by a married couple agreeing to live separate, the husband to make his wife an allowance of £500 a year, but with no covenant by the wife not to sue for maintenance in the event of the marriage being dissolved, the husband would be bound by the deed to continue paying the £500 a year. He referred to Bosworthick v. Bosworthick (42 The Times L.R., 719 ; [1927] P., 64), where the marriage was dissolved but the marriage settlement remained in force. If a wife sued on the deed, she could not afterwards repudiate it (Roe v. Roe, 32 The Times L.R., 490 ; [1916] P., 163). He referred to Clifford v. Clifford (9 P.D., 76) and Tress v. Tress (12 P.D., 128).

He submitted that the reciprocal obligations under the deed had not come to an end, and the statutes did not absolve the petitioner from her covenant. As regards the power of the Court under section 192 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, variation of settlements was limited to settled property. There was no power to expunge this covenant from the deed, but only a power to allocate the settlements, and this appeal should be dismissed.

In his reply SIR J. O'CONNOR referred to Jump v. Jump (8 P.D., 159) as to an annuity being held to be a species of personal property with which the Court could deal.

The applicant was petitioner in a suit for the dissolution of her marriage with the respondent, wherein a decree absolute of divorce was pronounced in November, 1927. Subsequently to the decree, by a petition framed in accordance with the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, section 190, she sought an order for permanent maintenance. This application was met by the respondent with an affidavit setting up an agreement under seal, made between the parties in 1920 (by way of compromise of an action then brought by the applicant), whereby she covenanted that she should not thereafter commence or prosecute any action or other proceeding for compelling the respondent to allow her any support, maintenance, or alimony. The question now to be determined is whether the present petition of the applicant is maintainable by her notwithstanding her covenant.

For the respondent it was contended that the covenant, having been made for good consideration by a competent contracting party, ought to be enforced by the Court in the mode in which the provisions of agreements for separation made between husband and wife were enforced before the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, and, indeed, after that statute was in operation, by Courts of Equity ; and that, inasmuch as part of the consideration moving from the respondent was an assignment of property, the petitioner, while retaining the property, ought not to be heard upon an application in breach of the covenant. Stress was laid also upon the argument that, except in so far as a post-nuptial settlement may be varied in this jurisdiction by application of the powers contained in the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, section 192, the disposition of property effected by the deed in question is binding upon the parties, notwithstanding the change effected in their status by the dissolution of their marriage. Change of status, it was said, is immaterial. Bishop v. Bishop (13 The Times L.R., 366 ; [1897] P., 138), which was relied upon for the applicant, was said not to cover the present case, inasmuch as in that case there was no covenant not to sue.

Counsel also met by anticipation the doubt which was expressed by the Court of Appeal in Bishop v. Bishop (supra) as to the validity of any agreement during marriage not to sue for increased maintenance in the event of a subsequent divorce on the ground of adultery. This deed of compromise, it was truly said, was not made in contemplation of any proceeding for dissolution of marriage.

The matter last mentioned does not present the true ground on which, as it seems to me, the issue between the parties is to be dealt with. The deed in question was made by way of compromise of a suit for divorce a mensa et thoro in Ireland, the parties being at the time domiciled there. The marriage between them was incapable of dissolution under their then conditions except by Act of Parliament. No doubt an express undertaking by a wife in this country that she would not sue her husband for maintenance if he should be guilty of adultery would be held to taint with immorality a contract of which it should be found to have formed a part. If adultery supervened, and a petition for divorce was filed in respect of such adultery, the bargain would be evidence of collusion. Whether an Irish petitioner for relief by Act of Parliament would have fared any better in times when the procedure upon petition to Parliament by Irish applicants for divorce was settled is a speculative inquiry, but, inasmuch as the stringency of the provisions of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, was largely founded on the practice upon Bills for divorce, I think she would not. As I have said, however, the argument seems to me to have little practical relation to the facts of this case.

The decisive question here, as I see this case, is whether the present applicant has covenanted not to do the thing which she now seeks to do. In my opinion, she has not. She covenanted, as a wife, against making, as a wife, any claim upon her husband, as a husband, for support, maintenance, or alimony. That is to say, she covenanted not to proceed in a Court, having jurisdiction in such matters, to require as against her husband the provision for her livelihood for which in his marital capacity he would during their marriage prima facie be liable. She is not so proceeding. She is no longer a wife, but, having been the wife of the respondent, she comes to this Court, under a statute applicable to her present plight, to ascertain whether the Court will, in the circumstances of her case, deem it right that her sometime husband should make her some pecuniary allowance. It does not weaken the applicant's title to be heard under section 190 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, that in Morrall v. Morrall (6 P.D., 98) Sir James Hannen (as he then was) held that a wife's covenant not to claim increased maintenance was released by the adultery of her husband established in a suit for judicial separation, or that in Bishop v. Bishop (supra) the Lords Justices in the Court of Appeal appear not to have doubted that in a case of divorce this view would have been correct.

The applicant is entitled to be heard on her petition. The objection which was made to her claim on the ground that the respondent purchased the covenant on which he relies by a grant of property, so far as it has weight, will be open for consideration when the Court proceeds to determine, within the terms of the statute, what payment, if any, having regard to the applicant's fortune, the ability of the respondent, and the conduct of the parties, the Court deems to be reasonable. The respondent must pay the costs.

Leave to appeal was given on the terms of the respondent's securing the petitioner's costs.

HYMAN v. HYMAN.*

Divorce—Maintenance—Deed of separation—Husband's covenant to provide for wife—Wife's covenant not to sue for further alimony or maintenance—Decree absolute dissolving marriage on ground of husband's adultery—Wife's covenant pleaded in bar — Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 49), s. 190.

In circumstances practically the same as reported in H. v. H. (44 The Times L.R., 463), Hill, J., held that he was bound by the President's decision therein, and directed on the issue before him that the divorced wife might proceed with her petition for permanent maintenance.

This was an issue ordered by the President on October 24, 1927, to be tried on a preliminary point raised by the husband respondent in his answer to the wife's petition for maintenance, namely, that the petitioner was bound by her covenant, in a deed of separation dated September 20, 1919, not by any means, either by taking out citation or process or by instituting any action in England or elsewhere or in any other manner, to compel the respondent to allow her any alimony or maintenance further than the weekly sum which the respondent thereby covenanted to pay her.

The marriage took place on September 14, 1912. In July, 1919, the respondent left the petitioner—according to the points of claim to live permanently with another woman. By the deed dated September 20, 1919, the husband and the wife agreed to live apart, and the husband agreed to pay the wife £20 a week during her life for her maintenance and support, together with two separate lump sums of £200 and £2,000. In addition to the wife's covenant set out above which was pleaded in bar, and an undertaking by her not to sue for restitution of conjugal rights, the deed contained an indemnification of the husband against all debts and liabilities contracted by the wife, and an agreement that the weekly payment should cease and all the covenants be void if cohabitation as man and wife were resumed. There was also a covenant by the husband that he should not in any way annoy, molest, disturb, or otherwise interfere with the wife in her person or business or in her manner of living nor at any time thereafter require, or by any means, either by taking out citation or process or by instituting any action in England or elsewhere or otherwise, endeavour to compel the wife to cohabit with him, or to enforce any restitution of conjugal rights or sue or cause to be sued any person or persons for receiving, lodging, protecing, or entertaining her, but that she might live as if she were unmarried. There was a guarantee in the deed by a brother of the husband for the payment of the £2,000 and the £20 a week.

On January 11, 1926, the wife petitioned for a divorce on the ground of the husband's adultery with a named woman, and on January 25, 1927, the wife was granted a decree nisi for the dissolution of her marriage. On February 7, 1927, the petitioner filed a petition for maintenance, and the respondent set up the deed of separation in bar, on the ground that he had complied with all his covenants and continued to pay the agreed allowance. He submitted that the deed was a valid answer to the petitioner's claim for maintenance and asked for a declaration accordingly. The proceedings were stayed pending the issue, which came on for hearing on February 10, 1928. The husband was the plaintiff in the issue, and the wife the defendant. In his points of claim the husband said that though the decree nisi was pronounced on January 25, 1927, the wife had taken no steps to obtain a decree absolute.

Sir Herbert Cunliffe, K.C., and Mr. H. Durley Grazebrook appeared for the husband respondent; Sir W. Schwabe, K.C., and Mr. G. Tyndale for the petitioner.

Sir Herbert Cunliffe, K.C., on February 10, 1928, reviewed the authorities and submitted that there was no statute or ecclesiastical law that could do away with the contractual obligation of the wife. Having regard to the loss of time and the nature of the application, the Court might defer judgment until the decree was made absolute.

The hearing was then adjourned, and on its resumption on March 27 it was anounced that in the interim the decree nisi had been made absolute.

MR. JUSTICE HILL.—There is another important new factor, the President's judgment in H. v. H. (44 The Times L.R., 463). The President's view appears to be that the contract is made on the basis of a status which has now been changed, with the result that the contract is gone.

SIR W. SCHWABE claimed that the former wife's covenant was no bar, and cited authorities already referred to in H. v. H. (supra). The wide powers of the Court under section 190 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, could not be taken away by any previous agreement between husband and wife. This covenant by the wife was made in contemplation of the continuance of the marriage status. It must be void as being against public policy if a wife covenanted not to sue for further maintenance even in the event of her huband's committing adultery. But the deed as a whole, apart from the former wife's covenant, continued to operate (Charlesworth v. Holt, L.R., 9 Ex., 38).

SIR H. CUNLIFFE, in reply, said that the extra consideration of £2,200 which the wife received under the deed distinguished this case from H. v. H. (supra). Another important difference was that here there was a guarantee by the brother of the husband. If the President's decision in the other case was right and his Lordship was bound by it, the divorced wife could continue to claim all the benefits of her former husband's covenants, but could repudiate her own covenants, on the strength of which she secured all those benefits. It was inequitable that one party should remain bound by his covenants while the other was not. The petitioner must make her election. Either the deed was subsisting and binding on both parties, or it was ended and neither party was bound. If the petitioner claimed maintenance she was not entitled to such provision in addition to the benefits which she obtained under the deed. She must give up one or the other.

MR. JUSTICE HILL gave judgment as follows :—

In this case I am trying a preliminary issue arising on a deed of separation, namely, whether, having regard to the terms of the covenant made by the petitioner in the deed of September 20, 1919, she can proceed for an order for maintenance against her former husband under section 190 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925. In the case of H. v. H. (44 The Times L.R., 463) the President of this Division delivered a judgment which exactly covers the point that has been raised. In that case the Registrar had declined to proceed with a petition for maintenance on the ground that the wife petitioner had covenanted in a separation deed not to claim maintenance. The President decided in favour of the petitioner and allowed the hearing of the petition for maintenance to proceed and refused to treat the covenant in the deed as a bargain or as something which was conclusive. The only difference between that case and this, so far as I can see, is that in this case there was a guarantor of the husband's fulfilment of his obligations under the deed. It may be that this agreement contained in this deed is at an end. If so, the guarantor is discharged. As regards the relations between the previously married couple the guarantor's position is beside the point. His guarantee is not material to the issue between the parties in this petition. The President's decision is binding upon me, and it is unnecessary for me to go into the whole matter afresh. I am not in the least suggesting that, if I were not so bound, I should decide otherwise. The petitioner, therefore, is not precluded by her covenant from pursuing her petition for maintenance. The provisions in the deed of September, 1919, will be considered when the petition is heard. I give judgment for the petitioner in the issue with costs, and grant leave to appeal on security for costs being lodged.

THOMAS AND ANOTHER v. JONES AND ANOTHER.*

Probate—Practice—Costs—Will propounded in solemn form by co-executors — Benefit to solicitor executor's daughter—Allegations by defendants of lack of knowledge and non-disposing mind of testator — Will duly executed and pronounced for excepting residuary clause — Executors' right to costs out of estate curtailed — Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 49), s. 31 (1) (h)—Rules of the Supreme Court, Order LXV., r. 1.

A solicitor who knowingly and for his own purpose involves his own interests with those of his client, where there is doubtful capacity and no competent proof of a capable consent, disregards his fiduciary obligations, and affords the Court ground for an order impugning his prima facie right as executor propounding a will to claim his costs of the action out of the testator's estate.

This prima facie right of an executor is absolute, as laid down by the Court of Appeal in In the Estate of Plant (42 The Times L.R., 443 ; [1926] P., 139), unless it is "lost or curtailed by such inequitable conduct as may amount to a violation or culpable neglect of his duty" (per Sir George Jessel, M.R., in Turner v. Hancock, 20 Ch.D., 303).

An innocent executor may be involved in liability for costs arising from the action of his co-executor (In the Estate of Barlow, 35 The Times L.R., 326 ; [1919] P., 131).

This was a probate action arising out of a dispute concerning the estate, worth about £32,000, of Mr. John Llewelyn Jones, a fruit merchant, of Cyncoed House, Hollybush-road, Penylan, Cardiff, who died on May 31, 1927, aged 67. The plaintiffs, Mr. Henry John Thomas, solicitor, of Park-place, Cardiff, and Mr. William Thomas Banbury, of Willapark, Tydraw-road, Cardiff, propounded as executors a will of the testator, dated May 5, 1927, and alternatively a will dated November 2, 1926. The defendants, Mrs.

* Reported by WILLIAM LATEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Minnie Jones, of Cyncoed House, the testator's widow, and Mr. Frederick Turner and Mr. Thomas Turner, her sons by a former marriage, put the plaintiffs to the proof of the due execution of the will of May, 1927, and said that the testator did not know and approve of the contents of that will, and was not at that time of sound and disposing mind. The defendants, by way of counterclaim, asked the Court to pronounce against the will of May, 1927, and for the will of November, 1926.

Mr. Bayford, K.C., Mr. Clifford Mortimer, and Mr. A. Richard Ellis appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Willis, K.C., and Mr. R. M. Middleton for the defendants.

LORD MERRIVALE granted probate of the will of May 5, 1927, excepting a residuary clause.

On the matter of costs his Lordship delivered the following considered judgment:—

Certain questions of costs arise in this case under circumstances which make a decision between the parties, as litigants in a dispute as to probate, a matter of some difficulty. The testator, who seems to have made a considerable fortune as a trader, had been for some time retired from business when in November, 1926, he was found to be suffering from a malignant disease which necessitated an operation. He spent a substantial part of the day before the operation with his solicitor, the plaintiff Mr. Thomas, framing a will. He was not able to make up his mind then about various matters, or about the disposal of the bulk of his estate after the death of his wife, the defendant Mrs. Jones, whom he had married late in life when she was a widow. He executed the engrossment, which was hastily prepared, and intended to make a new will later if he should recover.

After the operation he appeared for some time to be regaining his normal health, and he took up again with the solicitor, with whom he was on confidential terms, the question of the will. Various uncertainties in his mind however postponed further definite action and the testator presently became very seriously ill. Ultimately, after his condition was known to be hopeless, the solicitor, who had meanwhile been constantly visiting him, supposedly as a friend, attended at the house on May 5, 1927, for the purpose of obtaining execution of the will in question. It was signed and witnessed and after the testator's funeral, was produced and read. Very promptly, and not unnaturally in view of its effect on her position, it was contested by the testator's widow.

The will of May 5, was remarkable in that it severely reduced the provision made in the earlier will for the widow (with whom apparently the testator had remained on very good terms to the end of his life) and in that it contained a residuary clause in favour of new beneficiaries. Two of them were cousins of the testator, and one was the daughter of his solicitor, a girl of 19 with whom the testator had practically no personal acquaintance. This young lady is also named in the body of the will as a legatee of £1,500. The revoked will had appointed three executors, the solicitor, a former partner of the testator, and a friend of the testator's widow. The later will omitted the third executor. The testator had told Mrs. Jones that this executor had been included as her friend.

No medical opinion as to the testator's capacity and fitness to execute a will on May 5 was obtained by the plaintiff Mr. Thomas. There were scanty instructions in the testator's handwriting with regard to the new will but none as to the parts of the will of May to which I have referred. The widow supposed, upon information given her by the solicitor, that when the will of May 5 was executed, her husband was making a codicil of trifling effect. Apart from the knowledge of the testator there was no knowledge outside the solicitor's office of the fact that—as was alleged by the plaintiffs—the testator was repeatedly occupied during the later stages of his illness in discussing testamentary dispositions. The solicitor was supposed to be with him as an old friend.

The case for the will of May 5 depended in the main upon the oral evidence and entries of and documents prepared by the plaintiff Mr. Thomas. He failed to give any clear account of the directions given by the testator, of the intentions expressed or motives declared by him, and in respect of such matters as he enlarged upon he was an unconvincing witness. The documents which he produced were not connected to my satisfaction with the matter dealt with in them, and inasmuch as those relating to the period in doubt were documents of which the main feature was the benefaction to the solicitor's daughter they could not be accepted as being in themselves satisfactory or cogent evidence. The evidence of various reliable witnesses showed that the testator's powers, mental and physical, underwent a continuous process of enfeeblement from early in April to the time of his death on May 31, 1927. From April 26 onward the deterioration was marked and rapid. On April 29 and from then to the end the testator was subject to delusions, incapable of concentration, and, as Dr. Dunbar described it, "facile and childish." From May 2 onward he was unfit to transact any business which required a present exercise of judgment or the taking of a new decision.

Giving all such weight as I could to the evidence in support of the will of May 5 I found that before April 29 this instrument had been determined upon as to all its contents except the residuary clause. The disposal of the residue of the estate after the specific devises and bequests in the will had not been decided by the testator. There had been conversations between the testator and the plaintiff Mr. Thomas with regard to it, and the name of Mr. Thomas's daughter had been from time to time spoken of, but the matter was at large; so much so that after the time at which Mr. Thomas at the trial suggested that it had been settled in the form in which it appeared in the will of May 5 he dictated for engrossment a clause which would have given his daughter not a third or fourth but half of the residue. The residue was spoken of in the course of the argument as a body of assets which upon the death of the defendant, the testator's widow, would exceed £19,000.

Upon close consideration, after the case was complete, of the evidence as to the testator's condition on May 5 I was confirmed in the view which the case presented to my mind as I heard it, that the testator had not on that afternoon, or at any material time on that day, capacity to determine upon any testamentary disposition. He had not then a disposing mind, memory, or understanding. He had, however, such a degree of knowledge and understanding as to recognize those about him, to know the plaintiff Mr. Thomas quite well, to remember that the plaintiff and he had been engaged in preparing his will, and to appreciate that he was asked to execute as his will the document which was then put before him. Testamentary capacity to any greater extent he had not, and I have not been able to satisfy myself that any understanding person who fully considered the facts which were already known, or which were then apparent to this plaintiff, could have been convinced that he had.

In the view that I took of the case it appeared to fall within the operation of a principle of testamentary law enunciated in 1883 by Sir James Hannen, President, in a case of Parker v. Felgate (8 P.D., 171, at p. 174), and in 1902 affirmed by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in a case of Perera v. Perera (17 The Times L.R., 389 ; [1901] A.C., 354). The law was stated by Sir James Hannen in these words :

" A person might no longer have capacity to go over the whole transaction, and take up the thread of business from the beginning to the end, and think it all over again, but if he is able to say to himself, ' I have settled that business with my solicitor, I rely upon his having embodied it in proper words, and I accept the paper which is put before me as embodying it,' it is not, of course, necessary that he should use those words, but if he is capable of that train of thought, in my judgment that is sufficient." Lord Macnaghten, Lord Davey, Lord Lindley, and Sir Ford North were members of the Board by which Sir James Hannen's pronouncement was approved.

Applying the principle laid down in Parker v. Felgate (supra) I came to the conclusion that the testator's execution of the will so far as it had been resolved upon while he had capacity was pro tanto good execution—that the residuary clause was severable and must be excluded from probate, and that probate of the remaining parts of the will could be and ought to be granted.

Probate of the will of May 5, 1927, excepting the residuary clause, having been decreed, the question as to costs arose which it is necessary now to determine. On behalf of the plaintiffs, as the executors, it was said that they had established the will of the testator and that, whether they got judgment with costs or not, they had become entitled as a matter of law and without any order of the Court to take their costs out of the estate. As to the costs of the defendants it was submitted that while there is a discretionary power in the Court to leave the defendants to pay them, or to order payment of all or part out of the estate, there is no power in the Court to order payment by the plaintiffs.

The rules of practice, if not of law, with regard to the costs of executors in and about probate of testamentary papers were fully discussed recently in the Court of Appeal in the case of In the Estate of Plant (42 The Times L.R., 443 ; [1926] P., 139), and it was definitely determined that under the Judicature Acts and Rules, and especially under Order LXV, Rule 1, an executor who succeeds in an action in establishing a will is prima facie entitled to have costs as between solicitor and client out of the testator's estate and that he has this right absolutely unless, as was said of a trustee by Sir George Jessel, Master of the Rolls, in Turner v. Hancock (20 Ch.D., 303, at p. 305) the prima facie right is " lost or curtailed by such inequitable conduct . . . as may amount to a violation or culpable neglect of his duty," and subject to the limitation stated by Lord Justice Lindley in In re Beddoe ([1893] 1 Ch., 547) that the costs and charges in question are " costs and charges not improperly incurred."

The plaintiffs are entitled to be reimbursed from the testator's estate for costs and charges properly incurred. Are they entitled then, as a matter of law in all events, to costs incurred by reason of their insisting upon probate not only of clauses expressing the testamentary mind of the testator but of a clause which was not his testamentary act ? This must depend, I think, upon the two tests supplied by the authorities which I have mentioned. Did they properly incur these additional costs, or were the same incurred by reason of a " violation or culpable neglect of a duty " ?

The answer to the inquiry so raised depends on a clear view of the conduct of the plaintiff Mr. Thomas. Not with a sole regard to his duty as a solicitor he laboured whilst the testator's powers were failing to secure a will in a form advantageous to a member of his own family. In a position in which his parental interests constantly influenced his action he had long interviews with the testator, professedly as a friend, of which no account could be had except his own. With accurate information of the opinion of the medical attendants as to his client's desperate condition he omitted to consult them as to his client's disposing capacity. He moreover omitted to secure that there should be competent independent evidence of the client's capacity to execute a will.

After the death of the testator the plaintiff Mr. Thomas on behalf of the executors unsuccessfully used ingenious means to secure statements in support of the will of May 5 from the doctors and others, and knowing the opinion of the doctors, that their patient had not testamentary capacity at the material times, the plaintiffs did not call them as witnesses. This course was taken not because the plaintiffs, as executors, challenged the honesty or competence of the medical men, but because as litigants, and one of them an interested litigant, they desired the tactical advantages of cross-examination of the doctors as witnesses called by their opponents. In all the things with which I have dealt the course of the plaintiffs was governed by the interests of the plaintiff Mr. Thomas.

The issues involved in the trial were confused, and the length of the hearing was very substantially increased by the mode in which the plaintiff Mr. Thomas fell back on vague general statements when critical matters were in question, and by the difficulty thus caused in testing material allegations of fact which rested entirely on his scanty testimony as to his own conduct which he, an interested witness, gave to this Court. In my judgment a solicitor who knowingly and for his own purpose involves his own affairs and interests with those of his client, without the client's effectual consent or where there is doubtful capacity and no competent proof of a capable consent is a wrongdoer. Being in a position of trust he disregards his fiduciary obligation. This I find to have been done by the plaintiff Mr. Thomas. There are, therefore, grounds in this case for an order which impugns the prima facie right of executors propounding a will to receive out of the testator's estate costs not otherwise provided for.

In some particulars the position of the two plaintiffs differs. The plaintiff Mr. Banbury had not the skill or knowledge any more than he had the professional responsibility of the plaintiff Mr. Thomas. At an early period after the testator's death, however, with abundant means of knowledge of the doubts which existed, he made common cause with his co-plaintiff. I accept the evidence of Dr. Dunbar, in preference to his, as to what took place at an interview when Mr. Banbury had full means of knowing the nature and prospects of the controversy over this will of May 5. The evidence of the testator's widow, Mrs. Jones, and his sister, Mrs. Morgan, gave me a surer view, also, as to the state of the testator after

May 5 than did Mr. Banbury's account of it. Further, for the conduct of the cause as a whole he must be held jointly responsible with his co-plaintiff. I must not disregard, either, the view expressed in the Court of Appeal in the case of In the Estate of Barlow (35 The Times L.R., 326 ; [1919] P., 131), that in proceedings for probate an innocent executor may be involved in liability for costs involved by the action of an executor affected by knowledge.

Ascertainment by taxation of the proportion of the costs, liability for which ought not to fall on the estate, is in the present case impossible. There is no clearly severable issue with regard to which they can be measured. Probably the costs in this action were doubled by the errors in conduct which I have found to be established against the plaintiff Mr. Thomas. I am satisfied beyond doubt that they were increased by more than a third.

I therefore direct that the plaintiffs' costs of the action be taxed and that as to one-fourth of the ascertained amount they be borne by the plaintiffs personally. The defendants' costs have also to be dealt with. The defence, though no doubt inspired by a natural sense of grievance which was not an actionable wrong, supplied the Court with much necessary information not proved by the plaintiffs. The will of May 5 was established without the residuary clause. As to the residuary estate there is an intestacy and the widow has a statutory interest in it, antecedent to the rights of the next-of-kin. To direct payment of the whole of the costs of the defendants out of this fund would be manifestly unsatisfactory. On the other hand, neither the whole of these costs nor a separable part of them attributable to a distinct issue can be taxed against the plaintiffs either as executors or personally.

I have arrived at the conclusion that three-fourths of the costs of the defence shall come out of the estate, and that, as the defendants' costs were needlessly increased in like manner with the costs of this action as a whole, one-fourth of the defendants' costs should be paid by the plaintiffs personally.

HARDIE AND LANE, LIMITED v. CHILTON AND OTHERS.*

Conspiracy—Duress—Trade union—Member's breach of rule—Threat to put on "stop list"—Offer to withdraw threat for payment—Payment—Whether money recoverable.

The plaintiffs were motor dealers and were members of a trade union which had rules providing that motor cars were not to be sold below a certain price and that persons breaking the rules might be put on the "stop list," in which case other members were forbidden to deal with them. By giving certain allowances to the purchaser of a car the plaintiffs sold it at less than the fixed price and the "stop list" committee of the trade union informed them that their names would be put on the "stop list" unless they paid £200 to the indemnity fund of the union. The plaintiffs paid a first instalment of £100 and brought an action against an official and two members of the committee of the union to recover it on the ground of conspiracy to obtain it from them under duress.

Held, that it was lawful to put a man on the "stop list" for breaking a rule, and the intimation of an intention to put him on it when he had broken a rule could not be unlawful, and the agreement to accept the payment was not unlawful but was a mere compromise of a dispute which involved no criminality, and therefore the action failed.

Rex v. Denyer (42 The Times L.R., 452 ; [1926] 2 K.B., 258) disapproved.

This was an application by the defendants for judgment or a new trial in an action tried before Mr. Justice Avory and a special jury.

In the action Messrs. Hardie and Lane, Limited, motor dealers, of Woodstock-street, New Bond-street, W., claimed from Mr. John Chilton, Mr. Harry Arnold Bennett, and Mr. Percy Ingram Denyer, of 157, Great Portland-street, W., officials of the Motor Trade Association, damages for alleged conspiracy and misrepresentation.

The Motor Trade Association was formed to protect the motor industry and the interests of manufacturers, wholesalers, and retailers of motor-cars and goods. Its rules forbade the sale of certain articles at a price above or below the "protected price." Persons who broke the rules could be put on the "stop list," in which case other members were forbidden to deal with them.

The plaintiffs' case was that in January 1926, a man named Neale, who was employed by the association, called on them, represented that he was an old customer, and that he wanted a Rover motor-car, but could barely afford to pay for it, and asked for a discount. The plaintiffs refused to give him a discount, but they agreed not to charge him for delivery, to pay a year's tax for him, and to give him some number plates. In March, 1926, they were charged by the association with having sold the motor-car at less than the proper price, which was £225, by the amount of the allowances. Later, they were told that the "stop list" committee had found the charges proved, but that the matter might be ended by their paying £200 to the indemnity fund of the association and signing an undertaking. Fearing that the only alternative was to be put on the "stop list," the plaintiffs paid £100 on account to the association, and £7 to advertise their undertaking, and they also bought back the motor-car, which they afterwards resold at a loss of £25. The plaintiffs complained that the association had no right to fine them, and that they had suffered damage through being influenced by the threats of the defendants.

The defendants denied that there had been any conspiracy or any misrepresentation.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiffs, assessing the damages at £132, and judgment was entered accordingly.

The defendants appealed.

Sir Patrick Hastings, K.C., and Mr. St. John Field

* Reported by E. J. M. Chaplin and T. W. Morgan, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

appeared for the appellants ; Sir Henry Slesser, K.C., and Mr. Harold Simmons for the respondents.

Sir Patrick Hastings, in opening the appeal, said that it was based partly on misdirection, but primarily it was an application for judgment on the ground that there was no evidence on which the jury could find as they had done. The Judge had taken the view that there was no defence to the action.

The plaintiffs were a firm of motor dealers. The defendants were three persons connected with the Motor Trade Association since 1920. Mr. Denyer was a paid official and the two other defendants were members of the committee. Counsel referred to the objects of the association and said that there was also a practice, which was not specifically provided for by the rules, that in a case in which they had decided that a certain person ought properly to be put on the "stop list," that person was given an option, in the alternative, of paying a fine and of publishing an apology. The plaintiffs were members of the association and were aware of the rules and of the alternative which had been provided. Admittedly, the plaintiffs had committed an offence. They were told that they would be put on the "stop list," but that if they desired it they might pay a fine instead, and they agreed to do so. They then paid the first instalment of the fine, but, subsequently, on hearing of the decision of the Court of Criminal Appeal in Rex v. Denyer (42 The Times L.R., 452 ; [1926] 2 K.B., 258), which made the levying of such a fine an offence against the Larceny Act, 1916, they refused to pay the remaining sum.

No evidence was called at the trial on behalf of the defendants.

He (counsel) contended that what the plaintiffs complained of gave no cause of action, because the defendants had done nothing more than they were perfectly entitled to do in law or in fact. The action had been launched as one based on blackmail, and the defendants had been stigmatized as "highwaymen." On the question of conspiracy he referred to Ware and De Freville, Limited v. Motor Trade Association (37 The Times L.R., 213 ; [1921] 3 K.B., 40). He submitted that that case decided that what the defendants had done—namely, putting persons on the "stop list" for breaches of the rules—was perfectly lawful, and that it was, therefore, not unlawful to threaten to do so. In Sorrell v. Smith (41 The Times L.R., 529 ; [1925] A.C., 700) a threat to do what one was entitled to do was held not to be an illegal act. As to the decision of the Court of Criminal Appeal in Rex v. Denyer (supra), upon which the plaintiffs relied, he submitted that it was wrongly decided and was not binding upon the Court of Appeal. It was in direct conflict both with Ware and De Freville's case (supra) and with Sorrell v. Smith (supra).

Counsel also referred to Williams v. Bayley (L.R., 1 H.L., 200).

There was no evidence at all that the defendants had entered into a conspiracy, and on that question he submitted that the Judge had misdirected the jury with regard to the trap which it was alleged the defendants had laid to find out whether the plaintiffs had sold motor-cars at prices below the "protected price." All charges of misrepresentation with regard to those matters were abandoned. With regard to Rex v. Denyer (supra) the prosecutor in that case was not a member of the association. In this case, however, the plaintiffs were members of the association. Concluding, counsel submitted that the appeal ought to be allowed and judgment entered for the defendants.

Mr. St. John Field, following on the same side, said that the Court of Appeal were not bound by the decision of the Court of Criminal Appeal in Rex v. Denyer (supra). He submitted that the Court of Criminal Appeal was equivalent to a Divisional Court and that the Court of Appeal would treat the decisions of that Court as they would treat the decisions of any Divisional Court.

Sir Henry Slesser, for the respondents, supported the verdict and judgment of the Court below. He said that the association was really a trade union and was a body which had no power under its constitution to take any money from the plaintiffs at all. There was power to put the plaintiffs on the "stop list," but no power to fine them or penalize them by making any compromise with them by way of accepting money. If the money which the plaintiffs paid was not paid under an agreement, either it was paid as a gift, or it was paid under compulsion or duress, and the authorities were conclusive that money paid in such circumstances could be recovered.

Admittedly, in a proper case, the defendants were entitled to place the plaintiffs on the "stop list," but that was quite irrelevant to the issue, the whole question being whether the money was paid by the plaintiffs under coercion, lawful or unlawful ; if it were, it was quite immaterial whether the threat to put the plaintiffs on the "stop list" was lawful or unlawful. In all the cases, the test was not the legality or illegality of the act, but whether the payment was made under duress or coercion.

There was evidence to support the jury's findings, and the question had been properly left to them. He submitted that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover from the defendants the amount which they had been forced to pay. The verdict and judgment ought to be affirmed.

Sir Patrick Hastings, in reply, said that the whole cause of action as fought in the Court below was based on conspiracy. He submitted that the defendants had only done in this case that which the Courts had said they could do, provided that they did it in furtherance of their trade interests. There was no evidence of conspiracy by the defendants. The appeal ought to be allowed and judgment entered for the defendants.

Lord Justice Scrutton delivered the following considered judgment :—

This is an appeal from a refusal of Mr. Justice Avory to withdraw the case from the jury and enter judgment for the defendants.

The facts are these. An association, called the Motor Trade Association, is registered as a trade union. Its objects are to protect the interests of motor manufacturers and traders. One of the matters with which it endeavours to deal is to prevent the agents who sell cars for manufacturers from selling cars either above or below the manufacturers' list price. To sell below the list price, if this is done by competing agents, disturbs the manufacturers' system of regular prices and of agency ; as does selling above the list price in times of scarcity of cars. The association endeavours to enforce the list price, by putting those who contravene it, whether members of the association or not, on a "stop list." The effect of being on this stop list is that no member of the association will supply goods to the named person, or to any one who supplies him with the protected goods. The legality of this system, even against a non-member, was determined by the Court of Appeal in Ware and De Freville, Limited v. Motor Trade Association (37 The Times L.R., 213 ; [1921] 3 K.B., 40), and this decision was approved by the House of Lords in Sorrell v. Smith (41 The Times L.R., 529 ; [1925] A.C., 700).

Hardie and Lane, Limited, were motor agents and had been members of the Motor Trade Association for some years. The directors were Captain Hardie and Captain Lane. Captain Hardie said that he knew that the objects of the association were to prevent alteration of list prices by agents and to promote fair dealing in the trade. He joined them for that reason, and because in some cases he could get a better trade discount by doing so. He knew that people were put on the "stop list" for selling at prices different from the list price, and he was anxious that such a system of underselling should be stopped. He knew also that sometimes the association, instead of putting on the "stop list" a man who had broken the rules, allowed him to escape it by paying a sum of money towards the expenses of the association and publishing an apology. He recognized that the latter was a more lenient course than putting a man on the "stop list," which was very serious.

In these circumstances, Captain Hardie sold to an agent of the association, who was sent to find out if he was keeping the rules about list prices, or, as he said, to "trap" him, a car for less than the list price, by taking the full list price, but including in the consideration for it a full year's tax—about £9—and some minor matters. Captain Hardie admitted that when he sold the car in this way, he knew that, if he was found out, he might go on the "stop list," but thought that he might only be warned. He was called before the "stop list" committee of the association, with notice of the charge against him, and the committee informed him by a letter of March 18, 1926, that if he would pay £200, buy back the car at its list price, and insert a signed undertaking in the association's journal, he would not be put on the "stop list." He assented on March 22, but got the fine altered to payment in two instalments.

On March 24 he sent the association a cheque for £332, being £225 for the repurchase of the car, £7 the cost of advertising the undertaking, and £100 for the first instalment, the balance to be paid in three months. In the summer a case of Rex v. Denyer (42 The Times L.R., 452 ; [1926] 2 K.B., 258), was reported in which the Court of Criminal Appeal decided that to obtain money by a threat of putting a person on the "stop list" was criminal. The plaintiffs thereupon declined to pay the last instalment and on October 28, 1926, issued a writ against the defendants. Denyer was the agent of the "stop list" committee who had communicated with the plaintiffs. Chilton and Bennett were probably selected as defendants and representatives because on a writ issued on July 17, 1926, their names had been selected to sue, as members representing the Motor Trade Association, on behalf of themselves and all other members of the Motor Trade Association, for the second instalment of £100. This action was discontinued, and on June 29, 1927, the Motor Trade Association, as sued in the name of representative members, was struck out of the present action by the Court of Appeal (43 The Times L.R., 709 ; [1928] 1 K.B., 663) on the ground that the fluctuating members of the Motor Trade Association had not the same interest so that any member could represent them, and that the Motor Trade Association being a trade union could not be sued in tort. As a matter of fact, Chilton was the chairman of the "stop list" committee ; all that was proved about Bennett was that he was believed to have been present at one meeting of the "stop list" committee, and that his name was put on the first writ as a representative member.

In the statement of claim the allegation of conspiracy was expanded into an allegation that Chilton, Bennett, and Denyer entered into a conspiracy to obtain money fraudulently and by duress from the plaintiffs without any consideration. The allegation of fraud was abandoned at the trial and the allegation "without consideration" was obviously unsupportable in view of the fact that the money was paid to procure that the plaintiffs should not be put on the "stop list," a most valuable consideration.

The case therefore resolved itself into an allegation of conspiracy to obtain money by duress, occasioned by the threat, menace, or intimation, that the plaintiffs would be put on the "stop list" if the money was not paid, and could escape being put on the stop list if the money was paid.

Conspiracy as a cause of action exists either when the end aimed at by the agreement is unlawful and causes damage, or when the means by which a lawful end is pursued are unlawful and cause damage. An agreement is not actionable when neither the end nor the means are unlawful.

An agreement to protect trade interests by refusing to supply a trader departing from fixed prices with any goods either directly or indirectly, and announcing that refusal by putting his name on a "stop list," has been held legal by this Court in Ware and De Freville v. Motor Trade Association (supra), as approved in Sorrell v. Smith (supra) by the House of Lords, although it causes damage to an individual, if it is done in reasonable protection of trade interests, as was found to be the case. If the action of putting on the "stop list" is lawful, it is not unlawful to say that you are going to do it. In Sorrell v. Smith (supra) the Lord Chancellor (Lord Cave) said, at p. 712 : "(1) A combination of two or more persons wilfully to injure a man in his trade is unlawful and, if it results in damage to him, is actionable. (2) If the real purpose of the combination is, not to injure another but to forward or defend the trade of those who enter into it, then no wrong is committed and no action will lie, although damage to another ensues."

And at p. 714 : "The second proposition, of course, assumes the absence of means which are in themselves unlawful, such as violence or the threat of violence or fraud. Your Lordships were asked to say that a threat to withdraw custom or supplies falls within this category, and of itself introduces an element of illegality ; but although there are passages in the books which appear to support that contention, it did not appear to me that the contention was made good. If a trader may withdraw his custom without breaking any law, he may with equal legality express his intention of withdrawing it unless his wishes are met, subject always to the condition that the purpose of the threat is to forward his trade interests and not wilfully and ultroneously to injure the trade of another : see on this point Hodges v. Webb (36 The Times L.R., 311 ; [1920] 2 Ch., 70) and White v. Riley (36 The Times L.R., 849 ; [1921] 1 Ch., 1) and the observations of Mr. Justice Holmes in the American case of Vegelahn v. Guntner (167 Mass., 92)." And Lord Dunedin said, at page 730 : "Expressing the matter in my own words, I would say that a threat is a pre-intimation of proposed action of some sort. That action must be either per se a legal action or an illegal, i.e., a tortious action. If the threat used to effect some purpose is of the first kind, it gives no ground for legal proceeding ; if of the second, it falls within the description of illegal means, and the right to sue of the person injured is established."

I adopt the language of Mr. Justice Holmes in Vegelahn v. Guntner (supra) that the unlawfulness of threats depends on what you threaten, and of compulsion on how you compel. Lord Justice Atkin expressed the same point in Ware and De Freville's case (supra). He said, at page 81 : "What is meant by coercion? If it means no more than procuring a person to do what he does not want to do, it covers many cases where no cause of action can be suggested to exist. The use of parental rights, the use of rights of property, the deprivation of social advantages, may be so applied as to make it plain to the person affected that he must yield or be ruined. A necessary servant or agent may compel advantages to himself or herself by offering as an alternative the withdrawal of his or her services ; and in the same way may compel disadvantageous treatment of third parties. I conceive that the logical mind of Mr. Justice Cave on his view of the law was working on lines of necessity in accepting the view that if the cook says to the master : 'Discharge the butler, or I leave you,' and the butler is consequently discharged, the cook is liable to an action (Allen v. Flood (14 The Times L.R., 125 ; [1898] A.C., 1, at p. 36)). Yet the decision in Allen v. Flood (supra) repudiates this view. In my opinion the wrongfulness of the inducement applied to the third person cannot depend upon its weight. Coercion therefore cannot simply mean successful or even inevitably successful inducement. I am satisfied myself that it means nothing at all on a question of tort except in reference to the means employed." There is also an excellent passage in the judgment of Mr. Justice Peterson in Hodges v. Webb (supra, at pp. 87-90).

I take it, therefore, to be clear law that, if it is lawful to put a man on the "stop list" for breaking a rule, to say that you are going to put him on the "stop list" when he has broken that rule cannot be illegal at common law. And I am quite unable to understand how it can be illegal to say, "I could lawfully put you on the 'stop list,' but if you will do something which is not illegal, and is less burdensome to you than the 'stop list,' I will not exercise my power." For instance, the Motor Trade Association has no express power to demand an apology, or an undertaking for future conduct, from a member who undersells, but it seems to me impossible to say that a statement, that such a member will go on the "stop list" unless he apologizes or gives an undertaking for the future, is a threat to do an illegal act, or a threat which is itself unlawful, and though the Motor Trade Association has no express power to ask for money as a more lenient alternative to the "stop list," which the plaintiffs admit it to be, it appears to have the ordinary power of any individual of compromising a dispute which involves no criminality but only a breach of rules. A member of a club after dinner, in a row, damages some club property. He is told that he is liable to expulsion, but that the committee will not enforce it if he makes good the damage. Are the committee conspirators who have obtained by threats money or money's worth which can be recovered by the member? In Fisher and Co. v. Apollinaris Company (L.R., 10 Ch., 297) Fisher was prosecuted for unlawfully using the company's trade-mark. The prosecution was abandoned on an agreement by Fisher to give an apology which might be published. Fisher afterwards endeavoured to stop publication on the ground that the apology was obtained under duress of the criminal prosecution. Lord Justice Mellish says, at page 303 : "There was no authority for saying that it was wrong in the prosecutors to withdraw from such a charge of this kind. The prosecutors allowed him to state that his offence was not wilful, and accepted an apology. Such compromises are constantly made before criminal Courts in cases of assault or libel. In some cases there is a payment of money ; in other cases, no payment at all ; and it has never been considered that there was anything wrong in such transactions. It would, of course, be different if there was any case alleged of extorting money under threats." All compromises of proceedings are induced by the desire to avoid the continuance of proceedings which will go on if the compromise is not arrived at, but there is nothing illegal in agreeing to do a legal act in order to avoid action which the other party may legally take.

When the end or means are illegal, the case is of course different. It was thought to have some bearing on the case below to introduce Dick Turpin's "Your money or your life." This when expanded is : "I will murder you," (crime No. 1) "if you do not allow me to rob you" (crime No. 2). What possible relevance this can have to a statement that I will not do an act that I may lawfully do, if you will do an act that you may lawfully do, but I shall do my act, if you do not do your act, I cannot understand. I regret that I did not add to my list of question begging epithets in Ware's case (supra, at p. 69), "Dick Turpin" and "highwaymen." A. has land facing a new house of B.'s. A. proposes to build on that land a house which will spoil the view from and the light to B.'s house, and depreciate the value of his property. B. implores A. not to build. A. says : "I will not build if you pay me £1,000 ; but I shall build if you do not." B. pays the money and A. does not build. Could it be seriously argued that B. could recover the money back as obtained by threats ? A valued cook comes to her mistress and says : "Raise my wages by £20 a year or I shall give you notice." The mistress foreseeing and much disturbed in mind by the tragedy that the loss of the cook will involve pays the money. Can she recover it as obtained by threats ? And examples innumerable could be quoted.

Cases involving agreements to abstain from prosecution in a matter of public interest if money is not paid are obviously different. To know of a felony and not to inform the King's officers is misprision of felony (Archbold, 27th Edn., p. 1430). An agreement not to prosecute for a misdemeanour of a public character is void as contrary to the public interest. An agreement to contrive to obtain money by an agreement not to prosecute would both have an unlawful end and be obtained by unlawful means. The learned Judge below carefully directed the jury in considered terms to which I refer but which I do not read in full. I shorten them, I hope accurately, into a direction that either for two or more to agree to obtain, or for one to obtain, money to which there is no legal claim either for themselves, or for a third person, by threats calculated to deprive a reasonable man of his voluntary power of action, is illegal.

In my opinion this direction is wrong in the following respects : (1) Where the money is not legally due without an agreement, but is due under an agreement obtained by the threat to do an act which may be lawfully done if the agreement is not made, both the agreement and the threat are lawful; the direction would make them unlawful. If the agreement is unlawful, or the threat inducing it is a threat to do an unlawful act, the case would be different. In the present case, it was lawful to put a member who broke the rules in the "stop list"; it was lawful to say that one was going to do it; it was lawful, or not unlawful, to agree not to exercise the legal right to put a man who broke the rules on the "stop list," if a more lenient alternative in the shape of a payment of money was exercised. (2) This is a minor form of the same point. In my opinion the direction is wrong if it assumes that to threaten to do what you have a legal right to do can ever be a ground for obtaining back money alleged to be paid under duress. A man lawfully claims a lien on property of which you are in urgent need; because of your urgent necessity you pay, the necessity disturbing your power of judgment. Is it suggested that you can recover the money back? To do so, you must prove that the lien is unlawful. A Judge tells a prisoner who has stolen that if he makes restitution his sentence will be lighter; terrified by the prospect of a heavy sentence, the prisoner makes restitution. Can he obtain the property back as having been handed over under duress? (3) It appears to be clear at common law that duress to goods does not avoid an agreement. (See per Lord Denman in Skeate v. Beale, 11 Ad. and E., 983, at p. 990.) It is difficult to see, therefore, how a threat not to supply goods can be valid ground of duress. Money paid under duress to goods can only be recovered in an action for money had and received if the detention of the goods or refusal to supply them was illegal. But forbearance to do an act which you have a legal right to do is good consideration for an agreement otherwise lawful (Jones v. Ashburnham, 4 East, 455).

It follows from these reasons: (1) The Judge below should have withdrawn the case from the jury because the evidence only showed an agreement to forbear from doing a legal act, putting the plaintiffs on the stop list, if the plaintiffs would do an act which was not unlawful, i.e., pay money which the plaintiffs might legally pay and the association legally receive; and such an agreement was not a conspiracy, there being neither unlawful end nor unlawful means and there being, therefore, no evidence of lack of reasonable and probable cause for the demand. (2) There was no case of obtaining money by duress, because the only duress was a threat, in effect, not to supply goods, and such a threat could not legally be held to deprive any reasonable man of his voluntary power of action or constitute any ground for twelve reasonable men making such a finding. Indeed, all that Captain Hardie said was that he was frightened of being put on the "stop list," and he paid the money to avoid going on the "stop list." He said: "It was better than going on the stop list." Persons who have broken rules and know it are often frightened of the consequences, but when the consequences are not unlawful an agreement to avoid them by doing something not itself unlawful is not illegal. (3) In my opinion, also, there was no evidence that Bennett was a party to any agreement, good or bad, and I doubt whether there was any as to Chilton, but the first two reasons are enough to justify the Court in setting aside the present judgment. It is to be noted that the plaintiffs themselves put in the answers to interrogatories of Chilton and Bennett, which state that neither of them knew of or authorized or sanctioned the visit of Neale to the plaintiffs; that neither of them published or was responsible for Motor Commerce; and that neither of them received any money from the plaintiffs, it being entirely a Motor Trade Association matter.

I think it better to say something about the case of Rex v. Denyer (supra), decided after the House of Lords had in Sorrell v. Smith (supra) upheld the legality of the "stop list," as decided by the Court of Appeal in Ware's case (supra). In Rex v. Denyer (supra) the Court of Criminal Appeal held that it was criminal to obtain money for the association by a threat of putting on the "stop list." The statute contravened was said to be the Larceny Act, 1916, section 29 (1), making it an offence punishable with penal servitude for life for any person, knowing the contents thereof, to utter a letter demanding of any person with menaces and without any reasonable or probable cause any valuable thing. On this I would remark that the language of the statute shows that you may demand a valuable thing with menaces with reasonable or probable cause without committing any offence; and the most obvious reasonable or probable cause appears to me to be when you have a legal right to do the thing which you threaten to do, on the assumption that the obtaining of the valuable thing thereby does not involve any criminal act such as an agreement not to prosecute or not to inform the authorities of a felony. In Ware and De Freville's case (supra) the person put on the "stop list" was not a member of the association, and had received an offer that if he paid a donation to a trade charity, gave an apology, not to be published, and an undertaking not to break the rules in future, he would not be put on the "stop list." He refused and was put on the "stop list." The conditional threat was not treated by the Court of Appeal or the House of Lords as having any effect on the legality of the transaction. In Rex v. Denyer (supra) the menace was to put a person not a member on the "stop list," i.e., not to supply him with goods, both legal acts. In the present case the person was a member of the association who had broken the rules, thereby rendering himself liable to be put on the "stop list," though there would be nothing contrary to the public interest in not putting him on the "stop list." In such circumstances it appears to me clear that a person menacing or stating that he would do an act which he had a legal right to do and compromising the menace by an agreement to substitute a more lenient and not unlawful penalty was guilty of no criminal offence against the Larceny Act, 1916. In my opinion the case of Rex v. Denyer (supra) was wrongly decided. There was no evidence from which a jury could find want of reasonable or probable cause, no evidence of any menace constituting a crime, and the Judge should, as in this case, have withdrawn the case from the jury. I am not saying that there may not be cases where a threat to do an act not unlawful may come within the statute though I find it difficult to imagine them. Generally when the threat is to make public something which it is not desired to publish, but which is true, the publication may be good cause for a criminal prosecution for libel, on the ground that, though true, it is not for the public interest to publish a defamatory statement, which may lead to a breach of the peace. Cases of this class may afford evidence of lack of reasonable or probable cause.

Before coming to this conclusion I have, of course, carefully considered the reasons given for the judgment in Rex v. Denyer (supra). Section 29 of the Larceny Act, 1916, after the general subsection acted on in Rex v. Denyer (supra), contains subsections dealing with threats to accuse of specified crimes of a serious character, e.g., subsection (3), and this, in clause (b) of subsection (2), is enlarged into "any felony." Crimes not coming within these subsections must be dealt with under subsection (1) which limits the menaces or demands to those made "without reasonable or probable cause," a provision omitted in the other subsections. As I have pointed out, this assumes that there may be reasonable or probable cause for demanding money for not accusing of criminal acts, and the trade mark prosecution in Fisher's case (supra) would, with its compromise, be an example of such a case. Subsection (4) is not very intelligible. As some of the subsections make accusation of crime the offence, it is not quite clear why it is immaterial whether the threats are of accusation. I suppose the subsection means that it is not necessary that the threat be of violence, or personal injury, or injury to goods, injury meaning unlawful damage, and that there may be criminal threats which are not threats of an accusation ; but they must in my opinion be threats to do an unlawful act.

The Lord Chief Justice in Rex v. Denyer (supra) obviously recognized that some observations of members of this Court in Ware and De Freville, Limited v. Motor Trade Association (supra) were contrary to the view which he was expressing, but he thought that they were obiter dicta. As the case was one of a threat to place on the "stop list" if money was not paid, put into execution when money was not paid, I do not think that the observations were obiter ; anyhow, I think they were right. I selected the case of a proposal to abandon a libel action, which otherwise would be prosecuted, if money was paid to a charitable institution. The Lord Chief Justice says that the case is one in which ex hypothesi the person making the claim has a money claim sounding in damages. What does this mean ? The plaintiff in the libel action may be making a claim which in the opinion of the jury will fail, but he has a legal right to compromise it by accepting a payment of money. Does not the Lord Chief Justice's observation show that a threat to do what the claimant has a right to do, i.e., to proceed with the action, does not invalidate, or render criminal, a proposal to settle that claim by payment of money, with a threat to proceed if the money is not paid ; which is contrary to what the judgment is saying. The quotation from Rex v. Dymond (36 The Times L.R., 421 ; [1920] 2 K.B., 260, at p. 265), which is directed to saying that belief that the person threatening has reasonable or probable cause for threatening is no justification for threatening if, in fact, the belief is erroneous, does not deal with what is to me the more obvious position that if there is no evidence on which a jury could find lack of reasonable or probable cause, in that the act threatened is one which the defendant had a right to do, the Judge should withdraw the case from the jury. And such a case is when a threatener has a legal right to do what he threatens. At the middle of page 268 the Lord Chief Justice states the proposition on which this judgment rests, and says, "it is not merely untrue ; it is precisely the reverse of the truth." I can only say that I think the proposition is, for the reasons given in this judgment, true, and supported by the judgments of the House of Lords, and, to me at any rate, it is obvious. The Lord Chief Justice says that it is an excuse which might be offered by blackmailers to an indefinite extent. I cannot understand this. The blackmailer is demanding money in return for a promise to abstain from making public an accusation of crime. The very agreement is illegal, even if a crime of a certain class has been committed. A man has no right to suppress his knowledge of a felony. How can this be analogous to proposing not to do a thing which you have a legal right to do, if money is paid to you, there being no public mischief in the agreement ? I do not understand the next sentence about "nexus or relationship." Supposing the person threatened with the "stop list" himself says, before any demand of money, "If you will not put me on the 'stop list,' I will pay £100 to any charity that you select, and give an undertaking not to break the rule in future," would there be anything illegal in accepting the offer, and would not there be the direct "nexus or relationship" between the offer and the consideration for which it is offered? Does it then make any difference from which side the proposal comes? Lastly, the judgment quotes a passage from the summing up of Mr. Justice Talbot : "A person has no right to demand money, according to the Act of Parliament, as a price of abstaining from inflicting unpleasant consequences upon a man." This, as expressed, is inaccurate, as it would include the cases which I have put above, of damaging a man's property, or light, or view, unless he pays money, or the cook's giving notice. Its inaccuracy is in not excepting the cases where the man has a legal right to inflict unpleasant consequences. In that case there is no evidence of want of reasonable or probable cause to go to the jury, and there is nothing illegal in the agreement to abstain from inflicting such consequences for a money consideration.

In truth, the judgment in Rex v. Denyer (supra), however well-intentioned, would make the case of members of trade associations who break the rules of their associations much worse than it is at present. They would no longer be able to avert the agreed consequences of their breach of rules by accepting the offer of a money payment, though they consider it more lenient than the agreed consequences. Anyhow, they can in future avert evil consequences by not knowingly breaking the rules of the associations of which they are members.

In my opinion, the Judge below should have withdrawn the case from the jury on the ground that there was no evidence of any lack of reasonable or probable cause to go to the jury and no illegal demand of money nor any evidence of duress, and the appeal must therefore be allowed and judgment entered for the defendants with costs here and below. In any event, there would have had to be an order for a new trial, as the Judge, in the respects I have mentioned, in my opinion, misdirected the jury as to the law.

Lord Justice Sankey.—In this case the plaintiffs sued the defendants for damages for conspiracy and alternatively for money had and received by the defendants to the use of the plaintiffs, upon the ground that the money in question had been obtained from them by the defendants by duress.

The action was tried by a Judge and jury and at the conclusion of the plaintiffs' case, the defendants submitted that there was no case to go to the jury. The Judge overruled the objection, whereupon the defendants elected to call no evidence, the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiffs for £132 (a sum arrived at after giving certain credits), and the Judge gave judgment accordingly. From that judgment the present appeal is brought upon the grounds

(1) That the learned Judge was wrong in leaving the case to the jury, and (2) That the learned Judge misdirected the jury. The facts are as follows : The plaintiffs and the defendants are all members or officials of a society known as the Motor Trade Association. That is an association composed of manufacturers, agents and dealers in motor-cars formed with the object of encouraging and protecting the motor industry in the United Kingdom, and, as admitted by the plaintiff Hardie, of ensuring that all members of the trade should deal fairly with each other. It has a number of regulations and by-laws and it seeks to maintain and stabilize the price of motor-cars. It has certain by-laws under which a "stop list" is created. It will be observed that there is no express power in the by-laws for the Association to take money in lieu of putting a person on the "stop list." In January of 1926 it came to the notice of the association that the plaintiffs had transgressed one of the rules of the association by selling a motor-car at a price below the list price. In fact, they had been induced to do so by one Neale, and one of the complaints in the statement of claim was that Neale acted in concert with the defendants and fraudulently induced the plaintiffs to enter into the above-mentioned transaction, but this charge of fraud against the defendants was abandoned at the trial. In these circumstances, the defendants upon March 3, 1926, wrote the following letter to the plaintiffs : "Dear Sirs,—As you are doubtless aware, this association exists for the purpose of protecting the fixed prices of its manufacturer and concessionaire members who desire that none of their goods be sold, offered or advertised above or below such fixed prices. We regret to have to inform you that facts have been brought to the notice of the association with which your name is connected and which will be brought before the "stop list" committee of this association meeting at this address on Wednesday the 10th instant at 11.45 a.m. Your attendance is invited, and if you attend you will have an opportunity of hearing the case submitted in your presence and of making any answer or explanation which you may think fit to place before the committee. We think it proper, however, to inform you that should you not attend, the matter will, nevertheless, be enquired into in your absence and such recommendation made to the council as is deemed appropriate. We enclose précis of the case which will be placed before the committee. Yours faithfully, The Motor Trade Association." The two directors of the plaintiffs' company—namely, Captain Hardie and Captain Lane—attended the meeting of the "stop list" committee when the charge against them was investigated. They said that they had always tried to carry out the rules of the association, but that the man, Neale, had pestered them into doing what they had done. On March 18 the defendants wrote to the plaintiffs the following letter : Dear Sirs,—With reference to your appearance before the "stop list" committee at their meeting on Wednesday, 10th instant, we beg to inform you the committee fully considered the evidence placed before them and came to the conclusion that the infringement of our recognized principles of price regulations alleged, as already stated to you, was proved to their satisfaction. The committee under all the circumstances are prepared to recommend to the council that if you will pay a sum of £200 to our indemnity fund (which is applied towards expenses) to mark your regret, sign and pay for the insertion of the enclosed undertaking in Motor Commerce, also re-purchase the car purchased from you, that this shall be regarded on this occasion as a satisfactory ending of the matter. Please let us hear from you by Wednesday, 24th instant, if you agree, and in that event let us have cheques for £200 and £225 made payable to this association and the signed undertaking with a cheque for £7 made payable to Motor Commerce. If we do not hear from you by the day named, we will assume that you do not desire to avail yourself of this method of concluding the matter." The plaintiffs acknowledge the receipt of that letter and they say : "We are quite prepared to re-purchase the car in question immediately, but would respectfully submit that the fine of £200 is extremely severe having regard to all the circumstances and we would be glad if you will kindly let us know by Wednesday next, the 24th instant, whether we may be permitted to appear again in person to appeal for a reduction of the fine." Captain Lane saw Mr. Denyer and it was agreed that he should pay £332 at once and the balance of £100 in three months. This was confirmed by the plaintiffs in their letter of the 24th and accepted by the defendants in their letter of March 25, the plaintiffs' letter being : "Dear Sirs,—Confirming our Captain Lane's call to-day when he saw your Mr. Denyer, we enclose herewith our cheque for £332, this sum being made up as follows : Re-purchase of car, £225 ; cost of insertion in Motor Commerce, £7 ; the remaining £100 being on account of the £200 fine, the balance of which to be paid within three months from this date." In his evidence Captain Hardie said that he knew the "stop list" committee had been adopting a similar course in other cases, that he was afraid of being put on the "stop list," and that he realized that to pay the fine and give the undertaking was a lenient alternative to going on the "stop list." The defendant, Chilton, was chairman of the "stop list" committee, Bennett is a member of the association, and Denyer is the secretary of the association and wrote the letters.

On July 17, 1926, the defendants, Chilton and Bennett, suing on behalf of themselves and of other members of the Motor Trade Association, issued a writ against the present plaintiffs for the balance of £100. Meanwhile, however, the defendant Denyer had been convicted at the Exeter Assizes under the Larceny Act, 1916, and his appeal against the conviction had been dismissed by the Court of Criminal Appeal. See Rex v. Denyer (42 The Times L.R., 452 ; [1926] 2 K.B., 258). The conviction was in respect of circumstances not dissimilar from the present case. The plaintiffs, therefore, refused to pay the £100 and brought the present action for damages and alternatively for the return of the £332 which they had paid to the defendants. It was contended by the defendants that there was no evidence of any conspiracy, that none of the defendants had done anything illegal, that all that they had done was to tell the plaintiffs what they, the defendants, were entitled to do, and would do, and to give the plaintiffs an option of paying a sum of money instead. On the other hand it was argued for the plaintiffs that the defendants were not entitled to demand money under coercion, and that it was immaterial whether the threat made was a lawful or an unlawful threat, and they pointed out on appeal that the finding of the jury was that the threat deprived the plaintiffs of their voluntary power of action.

The first matter to be considered is what are the circumstances which give rise to an actionable conspiracy. A conspiracy is defined in the Oxford Dictionary as being "a combination of persons for an evil or unlawful purpose." In my view, a conspiracy is actionable in law where it is an agreement by two or more persons to do an unlawful act or to do a lawful act by unlawful means. One of the means by which a conspiracy can be carried out is by making threats, and, there again, threats may be lawful or unlawful. In Sorrell v. Smith (41 The Times L.R., 529 ; [1925] A.C., 700), Lord Dunedin says, at page 730 : "A threat is a pre-intimation of proposed action of some sort. That action must be either per se a legal action or an illegal, i.e., a tortious action. If the threat used to effect some purpose is of the first kind, it gives no ground for legal proceeding ; if of the second, it falls within the description of illegal means, and the right to sue of the person injured is established." This makes clear the meaning of section 29 of the Larceny Act, 1916, which deals with demanding money with menaces and creates an offence where a person utters, knowing the contents thereof, any letter demanding of any person, with menaces and without any reasonable or probable cause, any property. That section clearly contemplates that there may be cases where there may be reasonable or probable cause for uttering a letter with menaces. Indeed, that must be so. Take, for example, the case of three persons who lend £1,000 without interest to a fourth person, and take a bond from him for repayment of the sum. Supposing the obligor refuses to repay and the three obligees meet together and write a letter to him threatening to bring an action unless he pays the money within a given time. That would be a case in which they would be demanding money with menaces, but with reasonable cause, and they could not be convicted under the section in question. There would be no evidence on which the Judge could leave to the jury whether there was a lack of reasonable or probable cause, and he should withdraw the case from the jury. Suppose, again, the same case, but the obligees, after sending the letter in question, agree to compromise their claim for £500 and demand that sum. There, again, they would not be committing an offence within the section.

Dealing now with the case before us, it must be admitted that since the decision of Ware and De Freville, Limited v. Motor Trade Association (37 The Times L.R., 213 ; [1921] 3 K.B., 40) the defendants' object was not an illegal one. The defendants in that case were this very same Motor Trade Association ; the plaintiffs were not members thereof, but it was held that the publication of the plaintiffs' name in the "stop list" was done by the defendants bona fide in the protection of the trade interests of the members of the association, and therefore was not unlawful and an injunction should not be granted to restrain them doing so. Lord Justice Scrutton, at page 64 of that case, said : "It is the commonest transaction to say in a libel action : 'I will not issue a writ or ask for damages if you will apologize and pay my costs,' but I never heard it called 'demanding money with menaces' before," and at page 69 : "If you may lawfully do a thing it cannot be unlawful to say you are going to do it ; if men may refuse to work for a master, they may surely tell him they propose to do so if he acts in a certain way." And further, at page 71, he says : "If so the question in this case is whether a combination (1) intended to secure that new goods shall be sold at a fixed price, neither higher nor lower, by refusing to supply with goods a person who sells those goods at other than the fixed price ; and (2) to inform the confederates who such persons are by means of a "stop list" ; and (3) to take steps to insure that the person who is not to be supplied with goods directly is not supplied with them indirectly, is a reasonable and legitimate means of protecting trade interests. In my view it is."

Starting therefore with the proposition that the defendants' object was not unlawful, and that the means by which they sought to attain it, viz., the threat and the "stop list," were not unlawful, there is not any ground upon which the plaintiffs have an action for conspiracy so far; but it is said that they had no power to take money in lieu of putting the plaintiffs upon the "stop list." I cannot think, however, that what they did with regard to taking money in the present case gives the plaintiffs cause of action for conspiracy. It will be observed that Captain Hardie himself said that he realized that to pay the fine and give the undertaking was a lenient alternative to going on the "stop list." There is no evidence that the fine itself was an excessive or extortionate amount. It cannot be maintained that the defendants had no right to forgo their full rights under the contract and to compromise their claim any more than that the obligees in the instance above given had no right to compromise their claim. In the case of Fisher v. Apollinaris Company (L.R., 10 Ch., 297) the headnote, which correctly states the facts, is as follows : "The prosecutors in a trade mark case offered no evidence against the offender, and he was acquitted, he giving a letter of apology, with authority to the prosecutors to make such use of it as they might think necessary. The prosecutors published this letter by advertisements, and continued to do so for nearly two months : Held, that the arrangement as to the apology was not void as made under duress, and that the prosecutors could not be restrained from continuing to publish the letter." And at page 303 Lord Justice Mellish said as follows : "But, in my opinion, there is no objection to the compromise of a charge of this sort on such terms. The complaint was that Fisher had used the trade mark of this company. Now, previously to the Trade Marks Act (25 and 26 Victoria, Chapter 88) the sole remedy for the wrong complained of by the company would have been by action at law or suit in equity, but under this Act the wrong became also the subject of a criminal prosecution. There was no authority for saying that it was wrong in the prosecutors to withdraw from such a charge of this kind. The prosecutors allowed him to state that his offence was not wilful, and accepted an apology. Such compromises are constantly made before criminal Courts in cases of assault or libel. In some cases there is a payment of money ; in other cases, no payment at all ; and it has never been considered that there was anything wrong in such transactions. It would, of course, be different if there was any case alleged of extorting money under threats." It is not necessary to speculate what may be the circumstances under which a conspiracy becomes actionable by reason of the unlawful means used to attain the object.

In Sorrell v. Smith (supra, at p. 719) Lord Dunedin said : "I entirely concur with what was said by Lord Justice Atkin in Ware and De Freville, Limited v. Motor Trade Association (supra). 'It appears to me,' he says, 'to be beyond dispute that the effect of the two decisions in Allen v. Flood (14 The Times L.R., 125 ; [1898] A.C., 1) and Quinn v. Leathem (17 The Times L.R., 749 ; [1901] A.C., 495) is this : that on the one hand a lawful act done by one does not become unlawful if done with an intent to injure another, whereas an otherwise lawful act done by two or more in combination does become unlawful if done by the two or more in combination with intent to injure another.'" It would not only be dangerous but impossible to lay down by anticipation a category of unlawful means, and it is not difficult to postulate circumstances in which even the Motor Trade Association might use unlawful means to carry out their object, but in the present case there is no evidence upon which it was possible to say that their object was unlawful, or that the means which they used to attain it were.

In the case of Rex v. Denyer (supra), I think the Court was not correct in saying, at page 268 of the report, that there was not the remotest nexus or relationship between a right to put the name of Read on the "stop list" and a right to demand from him £257 as the price of abstaining from that course. On the contrary, I think there was a nexus in the circumstances. See the remarks of Lord Justice Mellish above referred to in Fisher v. Apollinaris Company (supra). There may be circumstances in connexion with a demand which may make it illegal, but I cannot see the presence of any such circumstance either in this or in Denyer's case (supra).

With regard to the second cause of action, that is, for money had and received by the defendants, we were much pressed by the learned counsel for the plaintiffs with the cases of Cadaval v. Collins (4 Ad. and E., 858) and Williams v. Bayley (L.R., 1 H.L., 200). In my view both those cases are distinguishable. In the first, there had been fraudulent use made of legal process; in the second, the Court found that an agreement to make an equitable mortgage of the property had been obtained from a father, he well knowing that if he did not make the agreement his son would be prosecuted with a moral certainty of conviction. Both those cases must be read with reference to the facts, which are entirely different from those now before the Court. Having regard to the evidence given in the present case, I am unable to see that there was any such duress as would entitle the plaintiffs to recover this money from the defendants. I have already referred to the learned Judge's note of the evidence, which is borne out by the transcript of the shorthand notes. The defendants had a perfect right to threaten to put the plaintiffs on the "stop list," just as the obligees in the instance given above had a perfect right to threaten the obligor to bring an action against him if he did not pay the £1,000. Both had a right to compromise their full rights for something more lenient, and it cannot be said in either case that the money so obtained was money obtained by duress.

I do not desire to add anything to what my Lord has said on the question of misdirection, but upon the ground that there was no evidence to go to the jury I am of opinion that this appeal should be allowed and judgment entered for the defendants with costs.

MR. JUSTICE ROMER.—The allegations of fraud with which the statement of claim is plentifully sprinkled having been abandoned, the relevant facts of this case are simple, and for the most part are not in dispute. The plaintiffs being suspected of having infringed a price regulation of the Motor Trade Association, of which they were members, were invited to attend a meeting of the "stop list" committee of the association on March 10, 1926. The two directors of the plaintiff company, Captain Hardie and Captain Lane, duly attended the meeting. The former stated in evidence that he thought the defendant Chilton was present, and the latter stated that he believed both the defendant Chilton and the defendant Bennett were present. As a result of the meeting the "stop list" committee appear to have come to the conclusion that the infringement by the plaintiffs of the price regulation had been proved. The plaintiffs accordingly became liable to have their name placed upon the association's "stop list." Had this been done, the result would no doubt have been a serious matter for the plaintiffs. The "stop list" committee were therefore prepared to take a more lenient course and to recommend to the council of the association to treat the matter as being satisfactorily ended if the plaintiffs, to mark their regret, would pay a sum of £200 to the indemnity fund of the association, would sign and pay for an undertaking as to their future conduct to be inserted in Motor Commerce, and repurchase the car, the sale of which by the plaintiffs to an emissary of the association for £225 had been the cause of all the trouble. This decision of the committee was in due course communicated to the plaintiffs by the defendant Denyer, who was the agent of the committee for such purposes, by a letter dated March 18, 1926. The association had no express power to accept a payment and undertaking in lieu of inserting an offending member's name in the "stop list"; but in mercy to the offenders this association in proper cases adopted this course from time to time, and this fact was known to the plaintiffs, who recognized that they were being offered a lenient alternative. They tried, however, to get the alternative made even more lenient, and at an interview with the defendant Denyer on March 24, Captain Lane was successful in obtaining an alteration of the terms, by virtue of which in lieu of an immediate payment of the £200 the plaintiffs were to pay £100 down and another £100 in three months' time. Thereupon the plaintiffs paid to the association the sum of £332, which was made up of the £225, the first £100, and £7 for the cost of insertion of their undertaking in Motor Commerce. The second sum of £100 was never paid by the plaintiffs, but on October 28, 1926, they issued the writ in this action against Chilton, Bennett, and Denyer, claiming, amongst other relief not now material, (1) damages for conspiracy, and (2) money had and received by the defendants to the use of the plaintiffs. By their statement of claim they asked for damages including the £332 as special damage, and alternatively, the sum of £332 as and by way of money had and received by the defendants to the use of the plaintiffs.

Inasmuch as it must be conceded that the defendants, whether acting individually or in combination, would have committed no wrongful act had they placed the names of the plaintiffs upon the "stop list" without the plaintiffs' being given the lenient alternative, it would seem at first sight to require some little ingenuity to discover, in the facts that I have mentioned, any cause of action vested in the plaintiffs. So far as the claim is for money had and received by the defendants to the use of the plaintiffs, it does not appear that the defendants, or any one of them, ever had or received anything. The plaintiffs' only remedy, if any, must therefore lie in damages, and it was a judgment for damages that the plaintiffs succeeded in obtaining in the Court below.

Now that judgment is based upon certain propositions of law which were enunciated by Mr. Justice Avory in the course of his summing up to the jury, and which involve the following one: If A, or A and B acting in agreement together, induce C to pay money, which he may lawfully pay, to some other person who has no legal claim to it, by means of threats which are calculated to deprive any reasonable man of his voluntary power of action, and C thereby suffers damage, he is entitled to recover such damages from A or from A and B as the case may be, even though the threat be to do some lawful act. But I am not aware of any authority for so wide a proposition as this, and it is, in my respectful opinion, an unsound one in law.

It is not difficult to imagine cases that may arise in everyday life in which the proposition, if applied, would produce results that are nothing less than extravagant. Some of these have already been referred to by Lord Justice Scrutton, and I do not desire to multiply examples. "But"—say the plaintiffs—"however extravagant you may regard the proposition in its relation to your domestic or your club life, or any other situations your fancy may suggest, allow us to point out to you that in the present case the defendants have committed a felony for which they are liable to penal servitude for life."

This, I agree, is a serious matter indeed, if it be true, serious not only to the defendants in the present case, but to all who in analogous circumstances may seek to temper justice with mercy; and whatever modifications may have to be introduced into the proposition of law to which I have referred, that proposition must still be expressed in terms wide enough to cover the present case, if in the present case a felony has in truth been committed.

In order to ascertain whether this be the fact or no, it becomes necessary to consider section 29, subsection (1), of the Larceny Act, 1916. Now that subsection so far as material to the present case, provides as follows: "Every person who utters, knowing the contents thereof, any letter or writing demanding of any person with menaces, and without any reasonable or probable cause, any property or valuable thing; . . . shall be guilty of felony." Subsection (4) provides: "For the purposes of this Act it is immaterial whether any menaces or threats be of violence, injury, or accusation to be caused or made by the offender or by any other person."

It is said that the letter of March 18, 1926, was such a letter as is mentioned in the first subsection. It was actually written by Denyer alone, and, speaking for myself, I am unable to find anything worthy of the name of evidence to show that the other defendants had anything to do with the uttering of it. But for the purposes of this judgment I am willing to assume that the three defendants agreed together to have the letter written and sent to the plaintiffs.

The question then arises whether the demand contained in the letter was made with menaces and without any reasonable or probable cause. In my opinion, this question must be answered in the negative, for in my opinion the demand was not made without reasonable or probable cause. What the meaning of the word "probable" may be in this connexion, is the question that I am content to leave to others who are more familiar with the criminal law than I am. For it is sufficient for the defendants if they had reasonable cause for making the demand—and that they had I can feel no doubt. Having it in their power to place the plaintiffs on the "stop list," but being desirous of taking a more lenient course, they gave the plaintiffs the option of paying a fine. I am wholly unable to understand how it can be suggested that this was not an eminently reasonable thing to do.

The question of reasonable or probable cause appears to be one for the jury, but only, of course, where there is some evidence of its absence. In the present case there is, in my opinion, none. I cannot find that the defendants have done anything of which complaint can be made in a Court, whether of civil or of criminal jurisdiction. In my opinion the evidence shows at the most no more than that the defendants in good faith proposed and agreed to abstain from doing something that they could lawfully do, on condition that the plaintiffs made a payment that they could lawfully make.

This being so, the case should have been withdrawn from the jury, and judgment entered for the defendants with costs. That must now be done, and the appeal allowed with the usual consequences.

[Solicitors—Messrs. Kenneth Brown, Baker, Baker; Mr. C. S. Tomlinson.]

At the sitting of the Court of Criminal Appeal on April 23, 1928, the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE (Lord Hewart) referred to the decision of the Court in Rex v. Denyer (42 The Times L.R., 452; [1926] 2 K.B., 258). His LORDSHIP said * :—

Since the last sitting of this Court a situation has arisen, affecting the jurisdiction of the Court, which calls for some comment.

By the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, this Court is constituted the final Court of Appeal in criminal cases, subject only to an appeal to the House of Lords on the certificate of the Attorney-General.

On March 22, 1926, this Court affirmed the conviction of one Denyer, who had been convicted by a jury of the offence of demanding money by menaces, contrary to section 29 of the Larceny Act, 1916.

At the end of last sittings judgment was given in Appeal Court II. in the case of Hardie and Lane, Limited v. Chilton and Others, in which a claim had been made to recover money alleged to have been paid under duress in circumstances similar to those in Rex v. Denyer (supra).

The Lord Justice who delivered the leading judgment in the Court of Appeal is reported to have said, in the course of it, that in his opinion the case of Rex v. Denyer (supra) was wrongly decided. It may be well, therefore, to make it clear, for the purposes of the administration of the criminal law, that, unless and until the decision in Rex v. Denyer (supra) in this Court is reversed by the only competent tribunal, it is binding upon and will be enforced by this Court against any person or persons offending in like manner.

K.B. Div. (Acton, J.) } 1928. Apr. 4.

ST. ANNE'S WELL BREWERY COMPANY v. ROBERTS AND OTHERS.†

Negligence—Duty to adjoining owner—Ancient wall.

The defendants were the owners of a part of the ancient City Wall of Exeter, which also formed the back wall of an ancient inn owned by the plaintiffs. The portion of the wall belonging to the defendants collapsed, demolishing the plaintiffs' inn. As the Judge found, in an action for damages, excavations had been at some time made in the wall (which was of great thickness) to form recesses in the kitchen of the inn, but these excavations were not made by the plaintiffs.

* Reported by W. E. HURT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

† Reported by J. W. HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, (1) that the ancient wall was not a thing essentially dangerous within Rylands v. Fletcher (L.R., 3 H.L., 330), but (2) that there was a duty on the defendants to keep it in such a state that their neighbours might not be injured by its fall; (3) that the plaintiffs had not been guilty of contributory negligence in failing to discover the dangerous state of the wall; (4) that the action was maintainable against the owners and not merely against the occupiers of the wall.

Todd v. Flight (9 C.B., N.S., 377) followed.

This was an action tried before Mr. Justice Acton at Exeter Assizes. The facts appear fully from his Lordship's reserved judgment.

Mr. Holman Gregory, K.C., and Mr. G. D. Roberts appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. du Parcq, K.C., and Mr. J. L. Pratt for the defendants.

Mr. Justice Acton.—In this case the plaintiffs' claim as it appears from the statement of claim is as follows:—" (1) The plaintiffs are the owners of the house, premises and grounds known as the Custom House Inn, Quay Hill, in the City of Exeter. The said premises are bounded on one side thereof by a portion of the ancient wall of the said city, which portion is vested in the two first named defendants as trustees under the will of Robert William Wreford. The defendant Harriett Roberts is tenant for life of the said portion of the said wall under the settlement created by the said will. (2) On March 11, 1927, the said portion of the said wall fell upon the said premises, destroying the greater part of the said house, and covering the grounds thereof with debris to the height of 30 feet or thereabouts. (3) At the time of the fall thereof, as the defendants well knew or ought to have known, the said portion of the said wall was in a dangerous condition and constituted a nuisance. (4) Further and in the alternative, the fall of the said portion of the said wall was occasioned by the negligence and/or breach of duty of the defendants in failing to maintain the said wall in a safe condition. The plaintiffs will rely upon the fall of the said portion of the said wall as evidence of its condition." And the amended defence is to the following effect:—" (1) The defendants admit that the plaintiffs are the owners of the house, premises and grounds known as the Custom House Inn, Quay Hill, in the City of Exeter and the said premises are bounded on one side thereof by a portion of the ancient wall of the said city. The defendants further admit (1) that until December 31, 1925, under an indenture dated August 27, 1919, the defendants R. C. Roberts and A. Webber were the trustees and the defendant Harriett Roberts was the tenant for life of a parcel of land and of the said portion of the said ancient wall forming the boundary of the said land on one side thereof and (2) that as from January 1, 1926, the legal estate in the said parcel of land and portion of the said wall has been and is vested in the defendant Harriett Roberts by virtue of the provisions of the Law of Property Act, 1925, and the Settled Land Act, 1925, and not in the defendants Reginald Charles Roberts and Arthur Webber. Save as aforesaid, paragraph 1 of the statement of claim is denied. (2) The said portion of the said wall was, at all material times, in the possession of one John Wilson and not in that of the defendants or any of them. (3) The defendants admit that on March 11, 1927, the said portion of the said wall fell upon the said premises and caused damage thereto. Save as aforesaid no admissions are made as to paragraph 2 of the statement of claim. (4) If (which is expressly denied) the said portion of the said wall was ever in a dangerous condition or constituted a nuisance the defendants were not, nor was any of them, ever aware of the said fact nor ought they, or any of them, to have been aware thereof." Then there follows a denial of any negligence on the part of the defendants, and then, in paragraph 6, a plea that: "The fall of the said portion of the said wall was solely due to the negligence of the plaintiffs," particulars of that negligence being subjoined to that paragraph; and in paragraph 7 of the defence there is a plea of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiffs, the particulars of that contributory negligence being the same as the particulars of negligence under paragraph 6.

On those pleadings there was no question that the defendants were the owners of that portion of the ancient wall of the City of Exeter, a length of which fell upon and destroyed the greater part of the Custom House Inn, a very ancient inn which was the property of the plaintiffs. This portion of this very massive and ancient wall formed the boundary of the defendants' property which was behind and above the plaintiffs' land upon which the Custom House Inn was built. The wall which so bounded the defendants' property was also a containing wall for the plateau above and behind the plaintiffs' land, and the defendants' property upon this plateau consisted of a small house and garden which were occupied by one John Wilson as a weekly tenant at a rental of 4s. 3d. a week. The lower part of this length of the City wall also formed the back wall of the premises known as the Custom House Inn, the property of the plaintiffs. The wall was about 40ft. in height from the top to the floor level of the inn, and about 6ft. 4in. thick. Of this wall a length of about 30ft. fell.

The first question to be determined was what caused this length of about 30ft. to fall. This question was a very difficult question of fact, because that part of the Custom House Inn which was destroyed by the fall was practically completely buried under the masonry, earth and débris which fell, and it was impossible to determine with anything like certainty what had been the condition of the wall itself or of that part of the buildings which was buried beneath it when it fell. After the fall there was nothing to be seen of the lower part of the structure of the wall, or of the buried portions of the inn, but a huge mass or mound of masonry, earth, rubble and débris, as shown in the photographs which were produced.

The plaintiffs' case was that the fall was due to the wall having no footings or foundations, but being built upon soft sandstone which was liable to be affected in time by moisture, to the absence of bonding in the wall, and to the continual percolation of moisture running down from the defendants' property, coupled with the omission to provide any system of drainage, to have any inspection of the wall made, or to carry out any repairs of any kind, or to provide any weeping holes in the structure of the wall. I have no doubt that these were matters which materially contributed to the ultimate collapse of the wall. There was no suggestion that there had been any sort of examination of the wall or anything whatever done for the maintenance or repair of the wall at any time. It is, however, right to say that the allegation that there were no footings or foundations to that part of the wall which fell was merely a matter of inference from the condition of adjacent lengths of the wall where the base of the wall could be seen to rest upon the soft sandstone, or upon stones which themselves rested upon the sandstone, and where there were no footings or foundations whatever.

The defendants in their turn then adduced evidence to prove the facts set out in the particulars to paragraph 6 of the defence. These particulars were as follows : "The said fall was caused by excavations made from the plaintiffs' premises under and into the said wall which formed the back wall of part of the said premises. Prior to the said fall the defendants were unaware of the said excavations, but the plaintiffs were always aware thereof and of the danger to the said wall caused thereby. The plaintiffs were negligent in making, or permitting to be made, the said excavations and/or in failing to fill up or properly arch over the said excavations and/or in failing to take any steps to guard against the danger caused by the withdrawal of support from the said wall and to prevent the same from collapsing."

Upon this part of the case the dispute between the parties to this action was in substance this : The defendants maintained and sought to prove that the two recesses one on either side of the fireplace in the kitchen of the inn were in fact excavations which had been made in the masonry of the City wall which formed the back wall of the kitchen, though nobody could tell when or by whom these excavations had been made. The plaintiffs maintained and sought to prove that the recesses were formed by buttresses supporting the masonry of the City wall, and that these buttresses were, of course, an added support and strength to the fabric of the wall. The rival theories were accordingly either that there were two recesses sunk into the City wall itself, one on each side of the chimney breast in the kitchen, or that there were three buttresses within a space of about 30ft. in length, forming two recesses, with a central buttress so placed as to admit of the chimney breast being erected against it. I was invited to determine which of these two theories was the correct one, upon the hypothesis that one of the two must be the correct one, and that no other was suggested. In either event it was agreed that it was to be assumed that what lay at the back of the recesses (behind a lining of 4½in. brickwork) was the masonry of the City wall.

The evidence satisfied me that there was a rending away of a huge block of masonry from the bottom. The upper part of that block in fact fell in a solid mass, and, even after the rending and shock of the fall, remained as a solid mass of undisintegrated masonry. The rending was practically co-extensive in length with the kitchen of the Custom House Inn. I have no doubt that this was more than a mere coincidence. Within the inn there had been indications of movement years before the fall. Moisture had been finding its way into the kitchen at the back continuously and progressively, necessitating somewhat extensive renewals and repairs. As a consequence there had been a continuous thrust forward of what the plaintiffs' witness Ball, their clerk of works, called the buttress (that is, the central buttress) causing ultimately a grinding and crumbling of the stone which found its way into the kitchen, at first from the bottom of the right-hand side of the left recess, in a comparatively small quantity. There was a handful or two to be seen on February 11, 1927. Shortly before the fall (early in March) there was a sort of explosion of a very large quantity (about 30 tons) of stone fillings and earth which was thrown right across the kitchen. This seems to show that for some reason there was a weakening of the wall at this point where the burst took place, rather than a strengthening of it by buttresses. There was no suggestion of any other buttresses in this vicinity, or, indeed, anywhere else throughout the ancient City wall ; and if there were buttresses at this point they must have been so constructed as to adapt themselves conveniently to the kitchen of the inn, and in such a way that there was no sign of any other buttress outside the limits of this kitchen.

Upon this question there was a strong conflict of evidence. For the plaintiffs there was that of Mr. Ball, clerk of the works to the plaintiffs, and his assistant. Their evidence was very loose and unsatisfactory. There was no evidence to show at what height the buttresses were supposed to begin to project from the wall. They were apparently seen only just before the collapse of the wall, and it seemed most strange that nobody had ever seen them, at any rate clearly, before. The Club room over the kitchen had at the back a lath and plaster partition, and to the outside of this there must have been from time to time something done in the way of painting or repairs, and for that some light must have been necessary. Yet apparently nobody (except possibly Ball) had ever observed the existence of the supposed buttresses. It is also remarkable that the supposed buttresses were not mentioned to Bennett and Pickering, two representatives of the Corporation of the City, when they visited the premises in February to inquire into the cause of the indications of movement in the house which were making themselves apparent then. The plaintiffs' comment upon this is that it was not known then that it was to be suggested that recesses had been made in the wall and had weakened it. That is true : but Bennett and Pickering were there to inquire into the cause of the apparent movement in the house, and Ball had known for years of the forward thrust and the grinding and crumbling observed in what he says he regarded as the central buttress. It seems surprising, if he knew of the buttresses projecting from the City wall, that he did not indicate or even mention them to Bennett and Pickering, and, indeed, it was very careless to omit to do so if he really knew that they were there.

On the other hand there was the evidence of Bennett, the City architect, and his assistant Pickering, who were called as witnesses for the defendants, and, of course, so far as this action is concerned were, of course, quite disinterested. They made a very thorough examination. Pickering's was so thorough as to enable him to make detailed plans and sections to scale, which were produced by him and put in evidence, though it is indeed true that they were inevitably based to some extent on inference or surmise. Both Bennett and Pickering say that there were no buttresses. The plans prepared by Pickering, and showing no buttresses, but recesses, were shown to Ball about November last. He looked at them and described them as excellent. By that time the defence had been delivered, the existence of the "recesses" had been pleaded, and it was known to the plaintiffs and their advisers that there was a substantial issue as to this. Ball said that he looked at the plans only for a few minutes ; but he is a skilled man familiar with plans, and there seems to have been no suggestion from him that they were incorrect. Yet it leaps to the eye that there is no sort of indication of buttresses from the City wall projecting into the kitchen.

In these circumstances, upon what seems to me to be a very difficult question of fact, I accept, upon a review of the whole of the evidence, the contention of the defendants that there were no buttresses. On the materials before me the strong preponderance of probabilities seems to be that the plaintiffs are mistaken upon this point.

This leads to the conclusion that at some time or other—no one knows when or by whom—these recesses were made in the fabric of the City wall. No other conclusion (if the theory of the buttresses be excluded) is invited or suggested. Nobody questions that this was an unwise and dangerous thing to do, and had necessarily a tendency to weaken the wall where it was done. I think the collapse of the wall was partly caused by the continuous lateral thrust or pressure of the earth and other matter behind and above it, upon a part of it which had been weakened by the recesses made in it. In course of time that led to the wall bursting at the weak spot, with the ultimate result that there was a downward rending of all the upper fabric of the wall, practically co-extensive in width with the width of the weakened region. Accordingly at the top the collapse tore out a block about 30ft. in width, which fell in a solid block, and remained up at the top a solid block after the fall, leaving the masonry on either side of the gap almost sheer and apparently sound so far as the actual masonry was concerned. This, however, does not mean that the continual percolation of moisture over a very long period of time was not also a factor in causing the collapse of that length of the wall which fell upon and to a great extent demolished the Custom House Inn.

Upon these facts Mr. Holman Gregory contended that this was a case to which the principle of Rylands v. Fletcher (L.R., 3 H.L., 330) applies, and that it was unnecesssary to consider any question of negligence, since the fabric of this ancient wall was something which the defendants were bound to keep in at their peril, and, if they did not do so, they were answerable for all the damage naturally consequent upon its escape. As to this I think that what was said by Lord Justice Fletcher Moulton in the case of Barker v. Herbert (27 The Times L.R., 488 ; [1911] 2 K.B., 633, at p. 642) is very much to the purpose. "We are not dealing in this case," he said, "with anything analogous to the subject-matter of the decision in Rylands v. Fletcher (supra). This is not a case where a landowner has erected or brought upon his land something of an unusual nature, which is essentially dangerous in itself." It is reasonably clear from this what the learned Lord Justice considered to be the true principle of Rylands v. Fletcher (supra). There is also authority, with which I find myself in complete agreement, that in ordinary circumstances a retaining wall is not within the principle of Rylands v. Fletcher (supra). See Ilford Urban District Council v. Beal (41 The Times L.R., 317 ; [1925] 1 K.B., 671, at p. 675). There Mr. Justice Branson says : "Lord Justice Farwell (in Barker v. Herbert, supra) draws the distinction between the absolute duty owed to others by one who is making an abnormal use of land . . . and that owed by those whose use of land is merely normal. There can be no question that in the present case the use of the land by erecting a retaining wall upon it is a merely normal use, and the principle illustrated by such cases as Nichols v. Marsland (L.R., 10 Ex., 255 ; 2 Ex. D., 1) and Rylands v. Fletcher (supra) can have no application to it."

It might, indeed, possibly be a question of fact whether such an unusually heavy, massive, and antique structure as this very ancient wall, with its somewhat primitive method of construction and its fabric of materials ages old, might not be regarded as something both "unusual" and "essentially dangerous in itself" ; but I prefer to decide this case upon other grounds.

There is no doubt that there is a duty upon the owner of a building as such to keep it in such a state that his neighbour may not be injured by its fall. (See Chauntler v. Robinson (4 Ex., 163, at p. 169) and Todd v. Flight (9 C.B.N.S., 377).) The head-note of this latter case is as follows : "An action lies against the owner of premises who lets them to a tenant in a ruinous and dangerous condition, and who causes or permits them so to remain until by reason of the want of reparation they fall upon and injure the house of an adjoining owner." There can also be no doubt that there was a breach of this duty by the defendants, for though they owned this very picturesque and imposing length of ancient wall, they did nothing whatever to see whether it was safe or unsafe, but simply left matters to chance, unfortunately with the most disastrous consequences. There can be little doubt that it was assumed by them that what had stood unshaken for so many hundreds of years might be trusted to stand indefinitely without having anything done to it, and without even being inspected from time to time with the view of seeing in what condition the fabric of the wall was throughout, and whether anything was required to be done to any portion of it.

The suggested defence of contributory negligence which was raised but not very strenuously pressed, must, I think, be considered with special and careful reference to the particulars under paragraph 6 of the defence. The defendants do not anywhere seek to raise an issue of this kind—namely, that they were unable to discover, or were prevented from discovering, the unsafe condition of the wall by the fact that the lower part of it had been absorbed into and was being used as part of the plaintiffs' premises so that the defendants lost access to it, and that it in fact formed the back wall of those premises. Nor do the defendants allege as negligence on the part of the plaintiffs that they ought to have discovered the unsafe condition of the wall and communicated their discovery to the defendants. This is perhaps not surprising, for it could hardly be an answer to a claim for damages against the owner of a wall by an adjoining owner consequent upon the wall having been allowed to become unsafe and to fall on the adjoining owner's land, that the adjoining owner ought himself to have discovered that the wall was unsafe, and to have warned the owner that it was so.

Dealing then with the particulars as they stand, I am satisfied that the plaintiffs were not aware of the excavations or of the danger to the wall caused thereby. It is clear, I think, that the plaintiffs did not themselves make the excavations or permit them to be made, or indeed know that they had been made, and there is accordingly no evidence that satisfies me that there was any negligence of the kind alleged in the particulars. Moreover, in any event, the defendants by the exercise of all reasonable and proper care in the performance of what was beyond all doubt their duty to the plaintiffs as neighbours and adjoining owners, might, in my view, have prevented any damage resulting from any alleged want of care, even if there had been such want of care on the part of the plaintiffs.

The last point relied upon by Mr. du Parcq for the defendants was that this action was not maintainable against the defendants as owners and landlords, but only against the tenant John Wilson as occupier, on the principle of the well-known case of Nelson v. Liverpool Brewery Company (2 C.P.D., 311). The answer to this point was, as Mr. Holman Gregory contended, and in my opinion rightly contended, a two-fold answer. In the first place it was said that upon the evidence in this case John Wilson was not the tenant of that part of the City wall which fell, nor was he ever in occupation or possession of it. It is true that he became a weekly tenant of the small house or cottage and of the garden at a weekly rental of 4s. 3d., but nothing was said about the City wall. Moreover, in any event, Todd v. Flight (supra) is an authority that even if Wilson were tenant of that part of the City wall which fell, the defendants might still be made liable in this action. I think the law is quite accurately stated in "Foa on Landlord and Tenant," last edition, at page 272, in the following passage: "Liability can be enforced against him (scilicet the landlord) where the premises are demised in a ruinous or unsafe condition, and injury is consequently caused . . . to a person with regard to whom he has a duty, by reason of all the circumstances, imposed on him, as to a member of the public using the highway, or an occupier of adjoining property." For this the case of Todd v. Flight (supra) is cited as the appropriate authority.

I think it is correct to say that where the physical condition of a wall or other structure is the result of a wrong or omission by the owner, as, for instance, where the owner suffers it while in his possession to get into an unsafe state so that the whole of it or portions of it are likely to fall upon the land of an adjoining owner and do damage, such owner cannot rid himself of liability for the possible consequences of his breach of duty merely by letting the wall or other structure as a part of the premises let to a tenant, without taking a covenant from the tenant to repair; and that the liability of the lessor in such a case is independent of the question whether at the time of the letting he had or had not actual knowledge of the state of disrepair. (See per Chief Justice Erle, in Gandy v. Jubber, 5 B. and S., 485, at p. 492.) It is enough if he might have known of it if he had exercised all reasonable and proper care, or, in other words, if he ought to have known of it but did not know of it through his own default.

I am accordingly of opinion that the plaintiffs in this action are entitled to succeed. I was not asked to deal with the question of the amount of the defendants' liability, which I understand is to be dealt with elsewhere. It is, no doubt, in some ways a hard case; but I find myself unable to come to any conclusion other than that at which I have arrived.

K.B. Div. (Salter and Talbot, JJ.) 1928. Mar. 29.

JENKINS v. JENKINS.*

Executors—Debt due to testator—Executor one of joint and several makers of promissory note—Right to sue co-makers—Release of debt by appointment of executor.

A testator made his will appointing the plaintiff executor thereof. The plaintiff and the defendant and two others subsequently made a joint and several promissory note whereby they promised to pay the testator £100. The note was unpaid at the death of the testator.

Held, that the plaintiff, as executor, could not sue his co-debtors, since his appointment as executor released the debt at common law, and even if he would have been liable in equity the debt was deemed to be paid at probate.

This was an appeal by the defendant in an action tried at the Swansea County Court. The following statement of facts is taken from MR. JUSTICE SALTER'S considered judgment.

By his will, dated February 24, 1912, Joseph Elliott appointed the plaintiff, Lewis Jenkins, to be his sole executor. On December 1, 1923, the plaintiff, the defendant, Isaac Jenkins, and two others made a promissory note by which they jointly and severally promised to pay Joseph Elliott the sum of £100. Joseph Elliott died on March 18, 1924, and probate of his will was granted to the plaintiff on May 9, 1924. On August 15, 1927, the plaintiff began these proceedings in the county court, suing as executor and claiming on the promissory note. He obtained judgment, and the defendant appealed.

Mr. P. B. Morle appeared for the appellant; Mr. Roland Burrows for the respondent.

MR. JUSTICE SALTER, after stating the facts, continued:—

In my opinion the claim should have been dismissed on the ground that the debt sought to be recovered had been discharged before action. By the common law the effect of the appointment by a creditor of his debtor to be executor of his will is to release the debt on the death of the testator, because a debt is a right to sue and the executor cannot sue himself. Where, as in this case, the executor is one of a number of persons jointly and severally indebted to the testator, the effect in law of the appointment of the executor and the death of the testator is to release the debt as between the testator and all and each of the debtors. The present case is the same as the case cited from 21 Edward IV., 81*b*, in the report of Cheetham v. Ward (1 Bos. and P., 630, at p. 632): "Copley, prothonotary, asked of BRIAN (Chief Justice), if three be bound to a man in an obligation jointly and severally, and the obligee make one of the obligors his executor and die, whether he who is made executor shall have an action against any of the others? And BRIAN said that he should not, for if one was discharged, all shall be discharged; because the making one of them executor is as perfect a discharge in law, as if he had released to one in deed. Copley: Sir, the obligation is several. BRIAN: This does not matter; for a recovery against one of them and execution sued, will be a discharge to the others. And so of a discharge made to one of them." This was approved and followed in Wankford v. Wankford (1 Salkeld, 299) and in Cheetham v. Ward (supra). A century ago, when Freakley v. Fox (9 B. and C., 130) was decided, the rule was so well settled that counsel confined himself to arguing, unsuccessfully, that the doctrine did not apply to negotiable instruments. In that case the payee and holder of a promissory note appointed the maker the executor of his will. The executor endorsed the note to the plaintiff, and it was held, that the plaintiff could not recover because the debt had been released from the date of the death of the testator.

In equity the executor is held liable to pay the debt if the interests of the creditors require it and unless he can show a continuing intention on the part of the testator to make him a gift of the debt, Strong v. Bird (L.R., 18 Eq., 315), In re Applebee—Leveson v. Beales ([1891] 3 Ch., 422). When the executor is thus held liable, equity enforces payment by treating the debt as assets in his hands. He can be declared accountable in an administration action and ordered to pay, and on default he may be liable to attachment. In equity, therefore, it is plain that his debt to the estate has been paid. See In re Bourne—Davey v. Bourne (22 The Times L.R., 417 ; [1906] 1 Ch., 697). In that case Lord Justice Romer said of the executor debtor who was sought to be made liable : "He was indebted to the testator in his lifetime, and by the will he was appointed executor, and he proved the will. The effect of that was that at law the debt was extinguished because there was no one to sue or be sued, but in equity he as debtor is held to have paid himself as executor, and therefore as executor to have in his possession the full amount of the debt as having been paid to him as executor. That is the view of equity, and it is on that view that he can be made liable in an action to administer the estate of the testator."

The result is that, if the plaintiff was not liable in equity to pay the debt, it was discharged by release at the date of the death of the testator ; if he was liable in equity, then it was satisfied and discharged by payment at the date of probate. In either case, the debt now sought to be recovered had ceased to exist before action brought.

For the plaintiff reliance was placed on Beecham v. Smith (E., B. and E., 442). In that case, A., B., and C. promised jointly and severally to pay £1,000 to C. and D. on demand, and it was held, that C. and D. could enforce against A. his several promise. In that case, however, the debt was in existence when the action was brought ; in this case it was not. Reference was also made to the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, section 61, to the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, sections 42, 43, 44, and 202, and to Order XVIII., Rule 5, and Order XVI., Rule 8. I can find nothing in those statutes and rules to alter the view which I have expressed.

The appeal must be allowed and the judgment for the plaintiff set aside and judgment entered for the defendant.

Mr. Justice Talbot.—I am of the same opinion. I need not restate the facts. If a creditor makes his debtor his executor he thereby releases the debt. It is "sanctioned by unquestionable authority that the debtee's discharge of one joint and several debtor is a discharge of all." See Nicholson v. Revill (4 Ad. and E., 675, at p. 683). The reason is that otherwise the co-debtors, if not released, could, by recovering contributions from the one who was released, defeat his release : see North v. Wakefield (13 Q.B., 536). Therefore if an obligee makes one of two or more joint and several obligors his executor all are released : see Cheetham v. Ward (1 Bos. and P., 630), following a case in the Year Book of Edward IV. And in the case of a negotiable instrument such a release is a good defence to an action not only by the executor but by his indorsee, because the note or bill is discharged and the debt gone : see Freakley v. Fox (9 B. and C., 130). The release is, as is said in the Year Book, equivalent to a release by deed. Beecham v. Smith (E., B. and E., 442), on which the learned Judge appears to have founded his judgment, has, I think, really nothing to do with this case. It mainly decides that one of joint and several obligors may be sued alone on his several debt ; in other words, that the debt is several as well as joint ; see King v. Hoare (13 M. and W., 494, at p. 505). The defence here is not that the note is joint and several but that the plaintiff who sues as executor is one of the makers of the note and has been released by the payee, his testator. In Beecham v. Smith (supra) there was no question of a release. It was argued for the plaintiff that the effect of section 61 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, is that the fact that one of the makers of a note is holder as executor does not discharge it, though if he were holder in his own right the note would be discharged. It appears, however, from Nash v. De Freville (16 The Times L.R., 268 ; [1900] 2 Q.B., 72) that the words "in his own right" in the section are not used by way of contrast with "in a representative capacity." I do not think that this section has anything to do with discharge by release.

There is another ground upon which in my opinion there was a good defence to the action. Where a debtor is released by being made his creditor's executor, the effect in equity, and perhaps at law, is that the debt is deemed to have been paid by the debtor to himself as executor, and therefore he is deemed to have assets of the testator in his hands : see Wankford v. Wankford (1 Salkeld, 299, at p. 306), per Chief Justice Holt, and In re Bourne—Davey v. Bourne (22 The Times L.R., 417 ; [1906] 1 Ch., 697). If the debt has been paid, it clearly cannot be sued for by the executor as such, though he may have a right personally to recover contributions from his co-debtors.

In the case before us the will was made before the note, but I think this makes no difference, though at first sight it seems strange that by the appointment of an executor the testator should release a debt which was not then in existence. But an executor is not executor until the testator's death. Until then the will may be revoked or altered and until then, therefore, it is not known that it is the testator's last will. It is then, therefore, that the executor is really appointed and that the release effected by the appointment operates. Where debts are expressly released by a will it is at the testator's death that it is to be ascertained what debts, if any, are so released : see Everett v. Everett (7 Ch. D., 428). The same must be true of the implied release effected by making the debtor executor.

In my opinion judgment ought to have been entered for the defendant, and I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Chan. Div. (Astbury, J.) 1928. Apr. 18.

IN RE VILLAR—PUBLIC TRUSTEE v. VILLAR.*

Will—Rule against perpetuities—"Period of restriction"—Validity.

A testator by his will, which was made in 1921, left his residuary estate to trustees to pay the income to certain of his issue during "the period ending at the expiration of 20 years from the day of the death of the last survivor of all the lineal descendants of her late Majesty Queen Victoria who should be living at his death." After the expiration of that period the capital was to be distributable. The testator died in 1926.

Held, that as it would not be impracticable to obtain legal testimony so as to ascertain the period when the capital would become distributable the limitation was good.

This summons raised the question whether a "period of restriction" of 20 years from the day of the death of the last survivor of all the lineal descendants of her late Majesty Queen Victoria living at the time of the death of a testator, which was formerly usually found as a limitation in the books of precedent, was in the present circumstances valid or void for uncertainty and impracticability.

Mr. William James Villar, of Taunton, Somerset, by his will dated June 14, 1921, appointed the Public Trustee and any of his (the testator's) sons who should be of full age and ordinarily resident in England at the time of his death executors and trustees of his will, and defined the meaning of certain expressions used in the will. Among others, he defined "the period of restriction" as meaning "the period ending at the expiration of 20 years from the day of the death of the last survivor of all the lineal descendants of her late Majesty Queen Victoria who should be living at his death."

After making certain specific gifts he devised, bequeathed, and appointed unto his trustees his residuary estate upon trust thereout to pay an annuity to his wife, and subject thereto to stand possessed during the period of restriction of the income of his residuary estate upon trust to pay and divide the same to and equally per stirpes between or among his participating issue, as defined in his will, subject to certain provisions as to forfeiture of shares. The testator declared that after the expiration of the period of restriction his trustees should stand possessed of the capital of his residuary estate upon trust for the participating issue, as defined, who should then be living, in certain proportions.

The testator died on September 6, 1926, and his will, with a codicil thereto, which did not affect the question, was duly proved by the Public Trustee and one of the testator's sons. Five children and two grandchildren survived the testator. His estate was of considerable value.

The children of the testator contended that at the present time such a limitation of the estate as was made by the will, though within the limits of the rule against perpetuities, was invalid on the grounds of uncertainty and impracticability of carrying it into effect and that there was an intestacy.

An affidavit was made by Mr. Alfred Trego Butler, Portcullis Pursuivant of Arms, that he had made a pedigree of the lineal descendants of Queen Victoria living in 1920. They amounted to about 120 persons and were to be sought in Germany, Russia, Sweden, Denmark, Norway, Spain, Greece, Yugoslavia, and Rumania, as well as in the United Kingdom. It would be a matter of enormous expense to prove strictly all the births, marriages, and deaths involved and it would be extremely difficult and probably impossible in the future to prove who was the last survivor of such descendants living on September 6, 1926. He instanced the great difficulty of ascertaining the real fate of the family of the late Tsarina of Russia, who was a granddaughter of Queen Victoria. A large number of the descendants were members of German Royal families, who since the revolution in 1918 had become private persons and whose existence in the future would be difficult to establish. It was possible that the period of 20 years from the death of the last survivor might extend to 100 years from the death of the testator.

The Public Trustee took out this summons to have this question, with others arising on the will, decided.

Mr. J. H. Stamp appeared for the Public Trustee.

Sir Thomas Hughes, K.C. (with him Mr. J. W. F. Beaumont), appeared for the children of the testator and said that the form in question had formerly been in the precedent books when the descendants of Queen Victoria were not numerous and were easily ascertained, but it was not now found in such books. Since the War and the great upheavals consequent thereon the difficulty both of ascertaining the class and of following the fortunes of its members had become enormous. Questions of the law of many foreign countries might arise as to legitimacy and also the question of the validity of morganatic marriages, while in the case of many of the descendants in question it would have to be shown whether the assent of the English sovereign was given to the marriages. It might cost the whole of the value of the estate to show the death of the survivor. He relied on the opinions of the Judges and the judgment of Lord Eldon in Thellusson v. Woodford (11 Ves., 112) as showing that a limitation might be void as being impracticable to ascertain.

Mr. Topham, K.C. (with him Mr. Bischoff), for the grandchildren, said that this was a most important and serious question as the decision might disturb a number of limitations made under what was once a common form. He submitted that the opinions and judgments in Thellusson v. Woodford (supra) showed that the number of persons in question did not matter, and that, if legal testimony as to the facts could be obtained, difficulty and expense could not be considered. There was no difficulty in ascertaining the class as it existed in 1926, and, though it might be expensive, there would be no real difficulty in tracing the survivor. The persons in question were all resident in civilized countries. The Court ought not to cut out of participation unborn persons.

Mr. Baden Fuller appeared for the testator's widow.

Mr. Justice Astbury, after stating the facts, said that the testator had desired to tie up his property to the fullest extent allowed by law, and the question was whether effect could be given to "the period of restriction." The question depended on the construction of the opinions in Thellusson v. Woodford (11 Ves., 112). If, in the circumstances of a gift dependent on the existence of selected lives, it was substantially impracticable to ascertain the date of the extinction of the lives, the gift would be bad; but if, although the lives were numerous and the ascertainment of deaths might be difficult or expensive, ordinary legal testimony would be available, the gift would not be bad.

* Reported by E. K. Corrie, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Here the testator had made use of an obsolete form which would involve a long postponement of vesting, but, having regard to the character of the lives in question, he (his Lordship) could not say that it would be impracticable to obtain legal testimony so as to ascertain the period when the capital would become distributable.

The expense involved would probably be very great and, if he could have seen his way to stop the tying-up of the property involved he would have gladly done so. He did not think, however, that in the circumstances he was at liberty to invalidate the gift, especially as there were probably many other trusts in existence with similar limitations made many years ago. He must hold that the limitation was good.

CANNON BREWERY COMPANY, LIMITED, v. SIGNAL PRESS, LIMITED, AND OTHERS.*

Landlord and Tenant—Covenant by tenant to repair — Breach — Notice — Service — Requisites—Law of Property Act, 1925 (15 Geo V., c. 20), s. 196 (3).

Under s. 196 (3) of the Law of Property Act, 1925, a notice of a breach of covenant is properly served on the premises and if there are reasonable grounds for supposing that that person will, if possible, pass it on to the tenant.

His Lordship gave judgment in this action for the plaintiffs, the Cannon Brewery Company, Limited, of 156, 158, and 160, St. John-street, Clerkenwell, London, who sought to recover possession of premises at 170, St. John-street, on the ground of breach of a covenant contained in a lease to keep the premises in good and substantial repair.

The defendants, Mr. George Lewis and Mr. Percy Lewis, trustees of the estate of Mr. Joseph Lewis, who applied to be joined as defendants after the issue of the writ and before the statement of claim was filed, and/or their tenants were in possession of the premises as under-lessees by way of mortgage, the mortgagor, the original lessee of the premises, not having been heard of since. There was a covenant between the lessee and the under-lessees to pay the rent directly to the plaintiffs. It was now admitted that the reversion expectant on the termination of the lease was vested in the plaintiffs. A schedule of dilapidations specifying breaches of the covenant to repair was served by the plaintiffs on January 14, 1927.

The defendants relied on two points: (1) that the yearly payments of the rent by them to the plaintiffs instead of the original lessee created a new implied yearly tenancy, so that they were not bound by the covenant to repair contained in the lease; and (2) that there had been no valid service of the notice of dilapidations.

Mr. Cartwright Sharp and Mr. E. H. Blain appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. C. L. Henderson appeared for two defendants, Mr. George Lewis and Mr. Percy Lewis. The other defendants did not appear and were not represented.

Mr. Justice Humphreys, in giving judgment, said that the plaintiffs claimed possession of the premises. They said that they had served the notice of dilapidations, which was a condition precedent to this action as required by section 146 of the Law of Property Act, 1925. The defendants contended that no valid notice had been served. The notice, which was addressed to John B. Lemaitre, the original lessee of the premises, was in fact taken by a clerk of the plaintiffs' solicitors on January 14, 1927, and handed to a forewoman on the premises. What service was good service of such a notice?

His Lordship referred to sections 146 and 196 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, and said that counsel for the defendants had argued that the notice must be physically affixed to the building or left on the building, and that it was not sufficient that it should be left with any person, other than the lessee, unless he was specifically authorized by the lessee to accept service. In his view the expression "left for him" in subsection 3 of section 196 included the case of a notice which was left with some person on the premises if there were reasonable grounds for supposing that that person would pass it on to the lessee if possible. On the facts of this case he was satisfied that the notice was left for the lessee, and "left for him" on the premises.

The next point was this. It was said that a yearly tenancy must be assumed and implied in law because the rent was regularly paid to and accepted by the plaintiffs from the defendants. He did not think, either in law or as a matter of common sense, that that was the finding to which he ought to come. He could only decide that the payments showed that the defendants were, and remained, under-lessees of the premises, and that they paid rent, not as yearly tenants, but because they had covenanted with the original lessee. The defendants were not assignees but under-lessees. There must be judgment for possession for the plaintiffs, with costs.

His Lordship added that it was a proper case for relief on terms to be agreed, with liberty to make further application, if necessary.

CONQUER v. BOOT.*

Judgment—Res judicata—Contract for erection of bungalow "in a good and workmanlike manner"—Breach—Action in County Court giving particulars of defects — Recovery of judgment — Subsequent action on same contract alleging different defects.

The plaintiff contracted with the defendant, a builder, for the erection of a bungalow "in a good and workmanlike manner." He subsequently brought an action in the County Court alleging that the bungalow was not completed in a good and workmanlike manner, and giving particulars. In this action the plaintiff recovered £24 damages. He subsequently commenced a second action in the same Court, alleging the same contract, but with new particulars. The defendant inter alia pleaded res judicata. The County Court Judge held that the plea succeeded so far as the damages claimed in the second action were known to, or ascertainable by, the plaintiff at the date of the first action, but gave judgment for the plaintiff for the balance of his claim.

Held by the Divisional Court, allowing the appeal of the defendant, that the cause of action was the same in both actions, and that the plea of res judicata was sufficient. To sustain a second action on the same contract or the same facts there must be a distinct cause of action, not merely different damages.

This was an appeal from Brentford County Court, and was heard before Mr. Justice Sankey and Mr. Justice Talbot on November 30 and December 1, 1927, when it was adjourned. Before the hearing was resumed on March 19, 1928, Mr. Justice Sankey was appointed a Lord Justice of the Court of Appeal, but to avoid the inconvenience of a re-hearing his Lordship sat as an additional Judge of the King's Bench Division to complete it. The facts are fully set out in his Lordship's judgment.

Mr. F. J. Powell appeared for the appellant ; Mr. A. M. Trustram Eve for the respondent.

Lord Justice Sankey.—This is an appeal from the learned Judge sitting at the County Court of Middlesex holden at Brentford in a case where Mr. Conquer was the plaintiff and Mr. Boot was the defendant. The learned Judge at the conclusion of the case and after hearing arguments on points of law gave judgment for the plaintiff for £81 19s., and it is from that judgment that the present appeal is brought.

It is brought upon a variety of grounds, one of which is that the matter was res judicata, or, in other words, that the plaintiff had already brought an action in respect of the matters complained of and had judgment given in his favour, and that that precluded him from bringing a second action in respect of the matter. The appeal came on for hearing before Christmas. Unfortunately both my learned brother and I had to go circuit, and in the result there has been considerable delay, which was quite unavoidable in this case. The only point argued has been res judicata, which goes to the whole of the appeal, and we thought it better to have that point argued first. This is the last case I shall try in the Divisional Court, and I would like to say that we have had the greatest possible assistance from both the learned counsel in this case, and I have seldom heard a case better argued by two junior counsel.

The present action was started in the County Court by particulars of claim in the following words : "The plaintiff's claim is against the defendant for the sum of £75 14s. damages for breach of contract to complete a bungalow known as 'Faulds Hope,' Millet-road, Greenford, Middlesex, in a good and workmanlike manner and with proper materials. The plaintiff also claims the sum of £6 6s. as damages for linoleum ruined through dampness arising from the said negligence." The plaintiff was asked to give further and better particulars of his particulars of claim, and he did so on July 11, 1927, as follows :—

"1. The contract referred to in the particulars of claim is the contract which was dated on or about July 17, 1924, proved in an action entitled Conquer v. Boot which was tried at the Brentford County Court of Middlesex on November 5, 1926, of which action the plaint number was F.2623.

"2. The defendant is in breach of the said contract by reason of the fact that he failed to complete the work thereby contracted to be done in a satisfactory and workmanlike manner."

On pausing there for a moment it is obvious on the plaintiff's own particulars that in each action he was suing on the same contract. I am not at all saying that that is an impossible position in law so far as one contract may give rise to several causes of action, but I do desire to point out this : that the effect of what the plaintiff has done in this case is to obtain in the two actions—i.e., the action with which we are now concerned and the previous action—a sum which is beyond the jurisdiction of the County Court ; and if the plaintiff's contentions are right I can see no reason why on some future occasion he may not bring another action on the same contract in the same County Court. It therefore becomes necessary to look at the particulars of the first action, which are as follows :—

"The plaintiff's claim is against the defendant for the sum of £24 10s. for breach of contract to complete in a good and workmanlike manner a bungalow known as 'Faulds Hope,' at Millet-road, Greenford, in the county of Middlesex" ; then followed particulars of the matters complained of. The words are precisely the same in both actions, the only difference being that in the second action the words "and with proper materials" are added. The plaintiff in the first action gave particulars of a number of matters which he stated constituted a breach of contract to build in a good and workmanlike manner. These particulars are fairly numerous and are set out with great particularity. In the second action the particulars are of similar character ; they also are fairly numerous and are set out with great particularity. But so far as this claim is concerned it appears to me to be identical in both cases: it is for breach of contract to complete in a good and workmanlike manner the bungalow in question.

Now that was a matter which obviously struck the learned Judge : in the first action he went into the matter, and he found a sum of money to be due to the plaintiff by reason of the defendant's failure to complete the bungalow in a good and workmanlike manner. When he came to the second action he was faced with the difficulty that this point of res judicata was taken ; and this is his judgment : "As to the plea of res judicata, I allow this so far as the claim in respect of the manhole and airbricks was concerned, because these defects were obvious at the time of an earlier action in November, 1926, between the same parties. So far as the bulk of the claim is concerned I disallow it, as the state of dampness and rottenness of the premises, and particularly of the flooring, was not apparent at the time of the earlier action." The question remains whether this is a correct determination in point of law.

Now with regard to the plea of res judicata a great number of cases have been cited to us, the most informative of which is that of Brunsden v. Humphrey

"Damage to goods and injury to the person, although they have been occasioned by one and the same wrongful act, are infringements of different rights, and give rise to distinct causes of action ; and therefore the recovery in an action of compensation for the damage to the goods is no bar to an action subsequently commenced for the injury to the person.

"So held by Sir Baliol Brett, M.R., and Lord Justice Bowen, Lord Coleridge, C.J., dissenting.

"The plaintiff brought an action in the County Court for damage to his cab occasioned by the negligence of the defendant's servant, and, having recovered the amount claimed, afterwards brought an action in the High Court of Justice against the defendant, claiming damages for personal injury sustained by the plaintiff through the same negligence.

"Held by Sir Baliol Brett, M.R., and Lord Justice Bowen, Lord Coleridge, C.J., dissenting, that the action in the High Court was maintainable and was not barred by the previous proceedings in the County Court.

"Judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (11 Q.B.D., 712) reversed."

Now it will be observed that there was one wrongful act, but there were two distinct causes of action—viz., the injury to the cab and the injury to the man's person—and Lord Justice Bowen at page 147 says this : "It is a well-settled rule of law that damages resulting from one and the same cause of action must be assessed and recovered once for all." Pausing there for a moment and taking the case of Brunsden v. Humphrey (supra), in my view of that case it would have been impossible for the plaintiff to bring several actions in respect of the damage to his cab. He could not have sued one day for a broken wheel and next month for a broken shaft and later for a broken window and so forth ; and so, too, with regard to the personal injuries, it would have been impossible for the plaintiff to sue one day for the loss of a leg and another day for the loss of another leg, and later to sue because he lost his fingers or had injured his head. One knows that in personal injury cases damages are assessed once for all. This may be a difficulty to a plaintiff in a personal injury case, but I am not so sure that in this case a like difficulty could have arisen.

Sir Baliol Brett, M.R., said in this same case, "Different tests have been applied for the purpose of ascertaining whether the judgment recovered in one action is a bar to a subsequent action" ; then he discusses the sort of evidence which would have to be given to prove injuries to the cab and injuries to the person. In the present case, adopting the same analogy, it seems to be quite impossible here to say that in the first month of the year the plaintiff could have brought this action for failure to complete in a proper and workmanlike manner the dining room, and next month for failure to complete the drawing room, and so forth. If that could be done I do not at all see why any of these cases should ever be brought into the High Court, because all the plaintiff would have to do would be to issue separate plaints for damages up to £100 and try the whole in a County Court. Mr. Eve, in his excellent argument, referred us to what appeared to me to be the strongest case in his favour, the case of Bristowe v. Fairclough (1 M. and G., 143). I need not go into all the facts of the case, because the difference is set out in the well-known judgment of Chief Justice Tindal. He says : "The plaintiff, it seems, brought an action in the Court of Exchequer upon the agreement, in which the breach assigned was the not giving the note for £730 ; and it appears that an order was made in that action whereby the defendant was directed to give to the plaintiff a note for £505. In the present action a second and a different breach is alleged, namely, that although the mortgage money had been called in, the defendant had neither paid the balance, nor obtained another loan for the plaintiff. The answer set up by the plea is that the present action is brought upon the same agreement, and to recover the same damages, as the suit in the Exchequer. The plaintiff replies that although it is true that the action is on the same agreement, yet he does not sue for the same breach but for another and different breach. It seems to me that this is a good answer to the plea which, prima facie, would lead the plaintiff to suppose that it alleged that he was suing for the same cause of action. . . . The present breach could not be sued for in the former action, as it has been occasioned subsequently by the calling in of the mortgage money." I do not think these words can apply to circumstances like those of the present case. If they were carried to the extremity, the failure to put proper material into the house might be so construed that an action could be brought in respect of each bad brick that was put into the house, on the ground that each bad brick was a separate cause of action. I think that the present case falls within the rule laid down by Lord Justice Bowen in Brunsden v. Humphrey (supra), "It is a well-settled rule of law that damages resulting from one and the same cause of action must be assessed and recovered once for all."

The cause of action here is (1) the contract to complete in a good and workmanlike manner a bungalow, and (2) the breach of it. I do not think that every breach of it, every particular brick or particular room that is faulty, gives rise to a separate cause of action. I am of opinion that the cause of action here was the contract and the breach of it, which had been assigned in the original action. I do not think it is possible to say that every one of these breaches is a separate cause of action. In that I am confirmed by the notes in Bullen v. Leake (3rd edition [1868] p. 625) where, in my view, the law is correctly stated as follows : "Where the plaintiff has recovered judgment in a previous action for part only of the amount claimed, the judgment affords a good defence to a subsequent action upon the same claim." Numerous cases are there cited which show that it is quite impossible to treat every breach of contract of this sort as giving rise to a separate cause of action. The cases are all discussed in Mr. Spencer Bower's recent book on Res Judicata, at pages 192, 193, and he quotes the case of Brunsden v. Humphrey (supra), which lays down that there may be two actions in respect of the same facts where the facts give rise to two distinct causes of action.

In my view the plaintiff in this case, having recovered on the contract for the breach he alleged, cannot recover in another action upon precisely the same particulars of claim but adding further particulars of damages only. Having recovered judgment in the one action, he is debarred from bringing a second action. For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment of the County Court Judge was wrong and that this appeal should be allowed.

Mr. Justice Talbot.—I had an opportunity of considering this case a few days after the argument, and of coming to the conclusion to which, indeed, I was inclined to come at the time when the case was argued. I wrote a judgment to that effect, and will now read it. [His Lordship then read the following judgment.]

The plaintiff in 1926 by action in the County Court recovered from the defendant damages for breach of contract to complete a bungalow for him at Greenford in a good and workmanlike manner. The particulars of claim in that action set out certain matters as needing to be done in order to make the bungalow what the defendant had contracted to make it. In the present year the plaintiff brought a second action expressed to be for breach of the same contract (adding the words " and with proper materials ") but with another list of particulars. Amongst other defences the defendant raised in the County Court the defence of res judicata or judgment recovered, on which the Judge decided against him. The defendant appeals to this Court, and the question is whether the Judge ought to have entered judgment for him.

The rule of law on which the defendant relies is thus stated by Lord Justice Bowen in Brunsden v. Humphrey (14 Q.B.D., 141, at p. 147) : " It is a well-settled rule of law that damages resulting from one and the same cause of action must be assessed and recovered once for all " ; and by Lord Halsbury in Darley Main Colliery Company v. Mitchell (2 The Times L.R., 301 ; 11 App. Cas., 127, at p. 132) : " No one will think of disputing the proposition that for one cause of action you must recover all damages incident to it by law once and for ever." See the form of plea in Bullen and Leake, 3rd edition, page 624. The defendant contends that there is here but one cause of action—namely, that the defendant, having promised properly to complete a bungalow for the plaintiff for a sum of money to be paid on completion, has failed to do what he promised—and that the particulars subjoined in the two actions are mostly details of the manner in which he has failed to perform the one contract and of the damages payable for his breach of it.

The plaintiff, on the other hand, says that the first action was brought for the various breaches of contract specified in the particulars, that each of them is a separate breach of a separate contract and a separate cause of action, and that therefore the former judgment is no answer to the present action.

It appears to me that as to this the defendant is right, and that the cause of action sued on in the second action is the same as that sued on in the first. It is the same in point of form. The form is substantially that in Bullen and Leake, 3rd edition, page 271, and the precedents there referred to. It is the same also in substance. The contract is an entire contract. No claim for payment could have been made by the defendant unless and until he had finished the bungalow. There is one contract and one promise to be performed at one time, although, no doubt, the defendant may have failed to perform it in one or in many respects. There may, of course, be many promises in one contract, the breach of each of which is a separate cause of action. An example is Bristowe v. Fairclough (1 M. and G., 143), quoted by Mr. Eve in his excellent argument. There the contract contained two separate promises by the defendant to be performed at different times and in different events ; and it was accordingly decided that judgment in an action for breach of one was no bar to an action for breach of the other. The period of limitation would be different for the two. Here there is but one promise, to complete the bungalow ; and the question whether or not it has been performed is to be decided by the state in which the bungalow was when it was handed over by the defendant to the plaintiff as complete. From the moment when the Statute of Limitations began to run as to the whole, the plaintiff could not alter the fact that he was recovering damages for the breach of this single promise by failing to specify in his action all the particulars of the breach and all the damages to which he was entitled. " The test whether a previous action is a bar is not whether the damages sought to be recovered are different, but whether the cause of action is the same," per Chief Justice Bovill in Gibbs v. Cruikshank (L.R., 8 C.P., 454, at p. 460). If this were not so the rule would be nullified. The plaintiff relied on the judgment of Sir Baliol Brett, M.R., in Brunsden v. Humphrey (supra), which mentions, as a test for deciding whether two causes of action are the same, whether the same evidence will support both ; and he urged that on his first action no evidence would have been admitted of breaches of contract by the defendant other than those specified in the particulars. But the question is not whether, as the action was actually brought, the plaintiff could or could not go into certain matters, but whether he could if he had given the proper particulars have proved the whole of what he claims in the second action under the cause of action for which he sued in the first. See Death v. Harrison (L.R., 6 Ex., 15), especially the judgment of Baron Cleasby, at page 19 ; Newington v. Levy (L.R., 6 C.P., 180). He could not justify an action for the loss of an eye by the defendant's negligence when he had already recovered for the loss of a foot by the same negligence, by saying that in the first action he only gave particulars of the loss of his foot. No more can he recover in one action for breach of a single promise in ten respects and in another for breach in ten other respects of the same promise. The giving of such particulars as are necessary to enable the defendant to know what case he has to meet is merely incidental to the bringing of the action, and a plaintiff cannot give himself a right to bring an action which otherwise he could not bring by failing to specify all the matters which go to make up his one cause of action, or to claim all the relief to which he is entitled in respect of it. This is well illustrated by Serrao v. Noel (1 The Times L.R., 581 ; 15 Q.B.D., 549). There the plaintiff alleged that the defendant was detaining certain shares, the plaintiff's property. He first brought an action in the Chancery Division claiming an injunction to restrain the defendant from parting with the shares. In this action the defendant consented to an order for the delivery of the shares to the plaintiff. The plaintiff afterwards sued in the Queen's Bench Division for damages for the detention. It was held that he could not recover, since the damages could have been claimed in the former action, injunction and damages being only different forms of relief applicable to the same cause of action. " The principle," said Lord Justice Bowen at page 559, " is that where there is but one cause of action damages must be assessed once for all," and this was enforced although in the former action damages had not been claimed and consequently could not be assessed.

There are many authorities on this subject, or connected with it, but they all come back to the same test : is the cause of action in the second action the same as that for which the plaintiff had judgment in the first ? If it is, the second action cannot be maintained, and (speaking generally) it is immaterial whether the plaintiff knew, or might have known, when he brought the first action, the facts on which he relies in the second. See, for example, Clegg v. Dearden (12 Q.B., 576) and the judgment of Mr. Justice Holroyd in Howell v. Young (5 B. and C., 259). In Lord Bagot v. Williams (3 B. and C., 235) the knowledge of the plaintiff or his agent as to what was owing to the plaintiff when the first action was brought was considered, not because a plea of judgment recovered would not have been good although when the first action was brought the plaintiff did not know of the debt sued on in the second action, but in order to ascertain for what debts in fact the former action (in an inferior Court in which there were no pleadings) was brought.

I think, therefore, that the plea of res judicata, or judgment recovered, is an answer to the whole of this action, and that the defendant is entitled to judgment. This being so, it is unnecessary to consider the other points which the defendant takes in his notice of appeal, and on which we have heard no argument.

K.B. Div. (Swift, J.) 1928. Apr. 3.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. PRITCHARD AND OTHERS.*

Sale of Goods — Payment by instalments — Death of purchaser — No instalments ever paid—Resumption of possession of furniture by vendor — Claim against purchaser's executors for instalments.

By the terms of a lease of a house granted by the Crown the lessee agreed to pay six yearly instalments in respect of furniture on the premises which on completion of the instalments was to become his property, but in interim belonged to the Crown. The lessee died without paying any instalments and the Crown subsequently brought an information against his executors and his widow, to the latter of whom he had bequeathed his interest under the lease, claiming three instalments which had become due at the time when the widow had surrendered the lease, and, together with the executors, her sons, had vacated the premises owing to financial difficulties. When the defendants left the premises the Crown took charge of and dealt with the furniture in a manner prejudicial to the defendants' interests in it.

Held, that there was an agreement for the sale of the furniture, payment to be made by instalments, the property not to pass until the price was fully and finally satisfied ; and that by resuming possession of the furniture when it was abandoned by the defendants the Crown had disentitled itself to sue for a part of the purchase price. The proper course of action was to sue for damages for breach of agreement to purchase.

This was an information preferred by the Attorney-General for sums due to the Crown in respect of unpaid instalments on furniture let on hire under the terms of a lease. By an indenture of lease dated October 14, 1921, the Crown demised to Mr. Henry Pritchard for the term of 14 years certain premises known as the Speech House, in the Forest of Dean, near Coleford, Gloucester, at a rent of £80 per annum, rising by £10 yearly to a maximum of £140. By clause 2 of the lease certain furniture, fixtures, goods and effects upon the premises were let on hire to Mr. Henry Pritchard, and in consideration thereof he bound himself to pay to the Crown in each of the six years 1922, 1923, 1924, 1925, 1926, and 1927, the yearly sum of £350 19s. 9d., the payments to be made on May 10 in each of those years, the lessee also covenanting to pay interest quarterly at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum on so much of the aggregate amount of the six yearly sums as was for the time being unpaid. The clause further provided that the furniture was to become the property of the lessee on completion of the payments, but pending that, to remain in the Crown.

Mr. Henry Pritchard died on July 17, 1923. He appointed the present defendants, his two sons, Mr. John Owen Pritchard and Mr. Edward Stephen Pritchard, his executors, and bequeathed to his wife, the defendant Mrs. Alice Pritchard, all his interest under the lease. The executors duly proved the will on February 22, 1924, and assented to the bequest to their mother, who entered on the premises and attorned tenant to the Crown and became bound by the covenants in the lease. Owing to the inability of the defendants to make a financial success of the business on the premises they decided to dispose of the premises to other tenants and a surrender of the lease was executed on March 24, 1926, the defendants having previously left the premises and the Crown having taken possession of the furniture. Neither the original lessee nor any of the defendants paid any of the instalments which were due for the years 1922, 1923, 1924, in all amounting to £1,052 19s. 3d., and the Attorney-General claimed from the executors in respect of the first two years and against the widow for the last year.

The two executor defendants alleged that the Crown could not claim the instalments inasmuch as they had taken possession of the whole of the furniture comprised in the lease, which, they alleged, was not only a lease but a purchase agreement. They further said that they had fully administered the estate and had no assets whatsoever belonging to it ; that the estate of their late father was liable for the covenants under the lease and not they personally. They also said that there was a hire-purchase agreement which was determined by the Crown taking possession of the furniture. Mrs. Alice Pritchard also denied liability on this last ground.

The material clauses of the lease and the finding of the jury appear in the judgment.

Mr. Hubert Hull appeared for the Crown ; the defendants appeared in person.

MR. JUSTICE SWIFT.—By an indenture of lease made on October 14, 1921, the Crown leased to Mr. Henry Pritchard the dwelling-house known as the Speech House in Dean Forest in the county of Gloucester for a term of 14 years from October 10, 1920, at a rent of £80 for the first year of the term, £90 for the second year, and so on, increasing by £10 per annum for each year of the term until the annual rent should amount to £140, and thereafter at the annual rent of £140. The second clause of that indenture is as follows : "(a) The Commissioners shall let to hire to the lessee the furniture, fixtures, goods and effects which are in or about the Speech House but are the property of His Majesty and which are set forth in inventory B (subject to the variation made therein by the fourth schedule to these presents) attached to a valuation dated October 13, 1920, and made by Messrs. Bruton, Knowles, and Co., on behalf of the Commissioner, and by Messrs. Bill and Son on behalf of the lessee, which valuation and inventory is deposited in the office in London of the Commissioners, and also the wooden pavilion now standing on the field adjoining the garden of Speech House and being of the value as is hereby agreed of £50. (b) In consideration of the said letting to hire the lessee shall pay to His Majesty's Receiver on behalf of His Majesty, His Heirs and Successors in each of the six years 1922, 1923, 1924, 1925, 1926 and 1927 the yearly sum of £350 19s. 9d., such payments to be made on May 10 in each of such years and the first of such payments to be made on May 10, 1922, and shall also pay to His Majesty's Receiver on behalf of His Majesty, His Heirs and Successors on each of the quarter-days hereinbefore appointed for the payment of rent interest to such quarter-day at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum on so much of the aggregate amount of the said six yearly sums as is for the time being unpaid, the first of such payments of interest having become due on July 5, 1921. (c) Upon the payment at the times and in the manner aforesaid of all the said six yearly sums together with interest as aforesaid, the property in the said furniture, fixtures, goods and effects hereby let to hire shall pass to the lessee but until all such sums and interest shall have been paid as aforesaid the property in the said furniture, fixtures, goods and effects shall remain in His Majesty."

Then by clause 6 of that indenture it is provided that: "If the said yearly rent hereby reserved or any payment hereby made payable or any part of such rent or payment shall at any time be in arrear and unpaid for forty days after the same shall have become due (whether any formal or legal demand thereof shall have been made or not) or if the lessee shall at any time fail or neglect to perform or observe any of the covenants, conditions or agreements herein contained and on his part to be performed and observed or if the lessee while the said demised premises or any part thereof shall remain vested in him shall become subject to the bankruptcy laws or make any arrangement or composition with his creditors or permit any execution to be levied on the demised premises or if the assigns of the lessee being a company shall enter into liquidation whether compulsory or voluntary or if the said licences shall be forfeited or not renewed or if the lessee shall be convicted of any offence against any of the laws affecting publicans or licensed victuallers then and in every such case it shall be lawful for the lessor or any person or persons duly authorized by him in that behalf into or upon the said demised premises or any part thereof in the name of the whole to re-enter and the said premises peaceably to hold and enjoy thenceforth as if these presents had not been made without prejudice to any right of action or remedy of the lessor in respect of any antecedent breach of any of the covenants by the lessee hereinbefore contained."

Mr. Pritchard did not pay any yearly instalments of £350 which he had undertaken to pay on account of the furniture, but apparently the interest was paid at 7 per cent. per annum on so much of the aggregate amount of the said six yearly sums as remained unpaid—that is, on the whole £2,105 18s. 6d. He died on July 17, 1923, having by his will, dated March 30, 1920, appointed the defendants, Mr. John Owen Pritchard and Mr. Edward Stephen Pritchard, his executors and having bequeathed to his wife, the defendant Mrs. Alice Pritchard, all his interest in the said indenture of lease. The executors proved the will and assented to the bequest to Alice Pritchard. From the time of the testator's death Mrs. Pritchard and her two sons (her co-defendants) lived at the Speech House and carried on there the business of a licensed victualler, and for that purpose used the stock-in-trade and furniture in the house. They did not pay either the instalments which had become due for the years 1922 and 1923 in the testator's lifetime, nor the instalment which became due on May 10, 1924.

The business was not prosperous. From the beginning of the lease the Crown was pressing—and quite properly pressing—for the payment of the instalments and the interest on the unpaid aggregate of the instalments. That pressure was not effective because the Pritchards had not got and could not raise the money, and in the early part of 1925 they recognized that they must abandon the struggle to make the business of the Speech House—encumbered as it was by their indebtedness to the Crown—a paying concern. After some protracted negotiations, it was ultimately agreed that Mrs. Pritchard should surrender the premises demised to her late husband, and on March 24, 1926, a deed of surrender was made by her, by which "Alice Pritchard as beneficial owner hereby assigns, surrenders and confirms unto the Commissioners all and singular the premises comprised in and demised by the said indenture of lease as from the said February 24, 1925, to hold unto the Commissioners and their assigns for all the unexpired residue of the said term, to the intent that the said term of 14 years granted by the said indenture of lease may merge and be absolutely extinguished in the freehold and inheritance of the said premises." That deed has, so far as I observe, nothing whatever to do with the furniture dealt with by clause 2 of the original indenture of lease—it does not purport to be a surrender of that furniture, and in no way settles any dispute or questions of liability as to it—and it does not in any way allude or refer to it, except that, in words immediately following those which I have quoted, it proceeds to state: "Provided always and it is hereby agreed and declared that nothing herein contained shall prejudice any rights which may have accrued to the Commissioners prior to the date of these premises in respect of the covenants on the part of the lessee contained in clause 2 of the said indenture of lease."

I read this proviso to mean that the parties are expressly excluding any question of the furniture from this deed of surrender—the furniture is certainly not included in the premises surrendered—and I think that the proviso was intended to assert the Crown's right to deal with the furniture as not being covered by the surrender and to leave the Commissioners all the rights which they then possessed in regard to the furniture and the instalments which had accrued due. Long before the deed of surrender was executed, the defendants had in fact abandoned the furniture. On February 24, 1925, new tenants of the Crown had taken possession of the Speech House, and on or about that day the defendants left the premises and left the furniture behind them. The Crown then took possession of the furniture, they assumed dominion over it, and they dealt with it, either by letting or selling it to the new tenants or by selling it by auction. It is not quite clear to me how the furniture was dealt with, but it is not disputed that after the Pritchards left it in the house, on or about

February 24, 1925, the Crown in fact did exercise dominion over it and treat it in a manner which was quite inconsistent with any proprietary rights of the Pritchards in it.

No payment was made by the defendants, or any of them, on account of the instalments unpaid in the years 1922, 1923 and 1924, and on May 13, 1927, the Attorney-General filed the information in this action, claiming £1,052 19s. 3d., alleging that £701 19s. 6d. was due from the executors of Mr. Henry Pritchard, and £350 19s. 9d. was due from Mrs. Alice Pritchard to the Crown. The answer of the executor defendants to that information is two-fold : (a) Plene administravit ; (b) the Crown has taken possession of the whole of the furniture comprised in the lease, and, therefore, they cannot claim. The answer of Mrs. Pritchard is confined to the second of these grounds. All the defendants have complicated their answers by alleging that the lease was not only a lease but a hire-purchase agreement, but I think the real substance of their defence is that the Crown, having taken possession of and dealt with the furniture in antagonism to any rights which they may have had in it, has precluded itself from claiming as such any portion of the agreed purchase price. The action came on to be tried with a special jury before me, on March 18 last. At the trial the defendants appeared in person, and I had not the advantage of the assistance of counsel appearing on their behalf, but Mr. Hubert Hull, who appeared for the Crown, was most helpful to me in explaining the facts and in directing my attention to the points of law to be considered and the authorities which might guide me in considering the defendant's contentions.

When Mr. Hull had opened the facts of the case it was obvious that, while questions of law had to be considered, there was only one question of fact to be determined—namely, had the executor defendants properly administered the estate which came into their hands ? Upon that issue I left the jury the questions : "Did the executors receive money available to meet the Crown debt, and, if so, how much ? " and received the answer "Yes. £800." Upon that verdict it is clear that if the Crown is right in its contention that the executors are liable to pay the two instalments payable under clause 2 (b) of the indenture of October 14, 1921, there were funds of the testator for which they are still answerable, and they must pay.

Now the question to be determined is, whether, on the undisputed facts of the case, they are, and Mrs. Alice Pritchard is, liable to pay the instalments claimed from them, or has the Crown, by taking possession of the furniture and exercising dominion over it contrary to the defendants' rights—even though without their opposition or by their consent—terminated the contract so that the Crown cannot sue for the instalments, although they may have other rights enforceable if properly formulated claims are brought before the Court ? That question whether the Crown can recover these instalments in the circumstances seems to me to turn entirely on the construction of clause 2 of the indenture of October 14, 1921. Is that clause a hire agreement with an option to purchase ? or a hire agreement in which a purchase will be effected when a certain number of hire payments have been made ? or is it an agreement for the sale of the furniture—payment to be made by instalments, the property not to pass until the price is fully and finally satisfied ?

I have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that the latter is the correct view, and I am justified in this opinion by Mr. Hull who, in argument, said, "This was an agreement for the sale of property not passing to the purchaser." Although in clause 2 the words "let to hire" are used to describe the transaction, I am satisfied that they do not really and appropriately describe it. This was not a hiring agreement ; it was an agreement of sale, the property not to pass until the whole of the purchase price had been paid. The amount of the instalments, in proportion to the agreed total value of the furniture, the charging of interest on the unpaid instalments, the inability of the grantee to determine the contract, all point to this being in reality an agreement for sale and not an agreement for hire, with a right to purchase included. That being so, it seems to me that by resuming possession of the furniture when it was abandoned by the defendants, the Crown has disentitled itself to sue for a part of the purchase price. The proper course of action, I think, was for damages for breach of agreement to purchase, and in that form compensation would have been recoverable for the usage of and depreciation in the value of the furniture during the three or four years while it was in the possession of the defendants and their testator.

This is not a case, in my opinion, like Brooks v. Beirnstein ([1909] 1 K.B., 98) in which it was held that an owner who had let goods out on hire, did not, by retaking possession, abandon his right to recover hire instalments which had accrued due before he retook the goods. In that case a clear distinction is drawn between an agreement for the hiring of goods and an agreement for the sale of goods, and the reasoning in that case makes it quite clear, to my mind, that if it is an agreement for the sale of goods, the owner cannot retake them and at the same time sue for the price. This, I think, is clearly laid down in the case of Hewison and Another v. Ricketts (63 L.J.Q.B., 711). In that case the plaintiffs let to W.G. certain chattels, £125 was paid in advance, and the balance (£243) was to be paid by monthly instalments. There was a power to seize in case of default. If all the instalments were met the chattels were to belong to G. Default was made, and the plaintiffs seized. The defendant, in consideration of the return of the chattels to G., guaranteed the remaining instalments. Further default was made as to two instalments. The plaintiffs again seized, and afterwards sued the defendant for the amount of the two instalments. It was held that the plaintiffs had determined the original contract and could not recover from the surety. In that case Mr. Justice Charles said that the "words point to its being a hiring agreement, but a hiring agreement not quite in the usual form. In effect it constitutes an agreement between a vendor and a purchaser although the payment is described as hire. . . . Seizure by the plaintiffs extinguished liability, as far as Guerin (the purchaser) was concerned with regard to these two instalments, and in my opinion relieves the surety. The practical result of holding otherwise would be that vendors, or as they term themselves, owners, in cases of this kind, on default being made, might seize the property and keep it, keeping at the same time the £125 and all instalments paid and thus get paid twice. Upon the true construction of the agreement the general right to sue Guerin (the purchaser) having been put an end to by the seizure, the right to sue the defendant as surety falls to the ground." Mr. Justice Collins said : "Here the agreement, which is called a hire and purchase agreement, is primarily a sale and purchase agreement, the property in the goods meanwhile remaining in the vendor. In the first place it is seen that a sum has to be paid down in advance, and there is a provision that this sum, together with all money paid under the agreement, shall belong to the vendors absolutely. Were this otherwise they would have to refund. This agreement, upon its true construction, provides for payment of the residue of the purchase money by instalments. It is needless to consider what would happen if a complete default were made or not, for the provision was that the owners, or rather vendors, were to have a right to seize and resume possession of the goods if default were made in the payment of one instalment. Here, after the guarantee had been given, the plaintiffs had two rights—they could, under their original agreement, resume possession, or they could sue the surety, the present defendant, on his guarantee. By resuming possession they would determine the agreement. This they did, and by doing so lost the right they had to sue Guerin; consequently, any proceedings taken by them against the defendant to enforce the guarantee against him as surety must fail. The agreement does not give the plaintiffs, who are the vendors, the right to resume possession of the goods, and at the same time recover unpaid instalments from the defendant, the surety, upon his guarantee."

I think that this case covers the one which I am now considering. In my opinion it would be inequitable that the vendor, having resumed possession of the furniture and dealt with it in such a way as to put it out of his power to return it to the purchaser, if the price were paid, should be allowed to recover a part of that price. The Crown's remedy, if any, is, I think, for damages for breach of contract, and not for the price of goods, and I therefore give judgment for the defendants, with costs.

STOTT AND ANOTHER v. SHAW AND LEE, LIMITED.*

Bills of Sale — Validity — Contemporaneous mortgage forming part of contract — "Defeasance or condition"—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict., c. 31), s. 10 (3).

By the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 10 (3): "If the bill of sale is made or given subject to any defeasance or condition, or declaration of trust not contained in the body thereof, such defeasance, condition, or declaration shall be deemed to be part of the bill, and shall be written on the same paper or parchment therewith before the registration, and shall be truly set forth in the copy filed under this Act therewith and as part thereof, otherwise the registration shall be void."

The grantor of a bill of sale for £1,000 was being pressed by other creditors and approached the grantee for further financial assistance. It was ultimately agreed that the grantee should pay the other creditors a sum of £600, and receive a new bill of sale from the grantor for £1,600, the old bill being cancelled. Contemporaneously with the bill of sale, and as part of the same bargain, a mortgage instrument was executed by way of collateral security. The bill of sale provided for the repayment of the principal "on the 24th day of December next," and the mortgage instrument provided as follows: "The mortgagor . . . covenants with the mortgagee to pay him on the 24th day of December next the sum of £1,600 . . . and it is hereby agreed and declared that (subject to the right of the mortgagee to require repayment of the said principal sum on the 24th day of December next according to the foregoing covenant by the mortgagor or at any time thereafter) the principal money secured shall be repaid by instalments of not less than £20" on agreed dates.

Held, that the clause in the mortgage providing for the repayment of the principal by instalments was not a variation of the terms of the bill of sale so as to amount to a "defeasance or condition" within the mischief of section 10 (3) of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878.

This was an appeal from an order of the Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Shearman and Mr. Justice Finlay) (44 The Times L.R., 210), affirming a judgment of the Judge of the Salford County Court in favour of the claimants in an interpleader issue. The claimants, Messrs. Stott and another, were the executors of one Albert Stott, who died on December 10, 1926, and the appellants, Messrs. Shaw and Lee, Limited, were a firm of moneylenders who held a judgment against one Robert Thornley. In 1910, Thornley built a laundry at Flixton, Lancashire, and he bought some land from Stott for that purpose. As Thornley was unable at that time to find the whole of the purchase money, it was arranged that a mortgage of £150 in favour of Stott should be left on the land, and by 1912, as the result of a further series of loans, Thornley's indebtedness to Stott had been increased to £600. In 1913, Stott lent Thornley a further £400, taking as security to cover the entire sum of £1,000, a bill of sale dated May 30, 1913.

In June, 1925, Thornley was being pressed by the appellants in respect of a series of loans which they had made to him on various occasions, and he again approached Stott for further financial assistance. On June 24, 1925, Stott paid £600 to the appellants to clear Thornley's debt to them on that date. It was agreed between Thornley and Stott that the former securities should be withdrawn and that Thornley should give the deceased a new bill of sale on the machinery and chattels in the laundry to cover the entire £1,600 owed by him, and also a mortgage for the same sum on the building as a collateral security. The material portions of the bill of sale, which was dated July 1, 1925, were as follows: "In consideration of the sum of £1,600 paid to Robert Thornley by Albert Stott on the 24th day of June, 1925 (the receipt of which sum the said Robert Thornley hereby acknowledges) . . . Robert Thornley doth hereby assign unto . . . Albert Stott, his executors, administrators, and assigns, all and singular the several chattels and things specifically described in the schedule . . . and the said Robert Thornley doth further agree and declare that he will duly pay to the said Albert Stott the principal sum aforesaid with the interest then due on the 24th day of December, 1925 . . ." By the mortgage instrument, which also was dated July 1, 1925, the mortgagor covenanted "in consideration of the sum of £1,600 paid by the mortgagee to the mortgagor on the security of a bill of sale dated the 1st day of July, 1925," to "pay to [the mortgagee] on the 24th day of December next the sum of £1,600 with interest thereon"; and it was further provided that "subject to the right of the mortgagee to require repayment of the said principal sum on the 24th day of December next according to the foregoing covenant by the mortgagor or at any time thereafter, the principal money hereby secured shall be repaid by instalments of not less than £20" on March 24, June 24, September 24, and December 24 every year, the first payment to be made on September 24, 1926. In January, 1927, the appellants seized Thornley's chattels to satisfy a judgment for £157 9s. 6d. which they had obtained against him. Stott's executors paid that sum into Court, and on an interpleader summons they were made claimants and the execution creditors (the present appellants) were made the respondents. It was contended on behalf of the execution creditors that the bill of sale of July 1, 1925, was invalid, first because the collateral mortgage constituted a defeasance or condition, which was not written on the same paper or parchment as the bill before registration, as required by section 10 (3) of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878; and, secondly, because the consideration for the bill of sale was not truly stated in the bill.

The County Court Judge held that the bill was not invalidated on either ground, and that therefore the claimants on the issue were entitled to judgment. This judgment was affirmed by the Divisional Court.

The execution creditors appealed.

Mr. E. W. Wingate-Saul, K.C., and Mr. J. C. Jolly appeared for the execution creditors; Mr. Cyril Atkinson, K.C., and Mr. J. Lustgarten for the claimants.

Lord Justice Scrutton, in the course of his judgment, said that before the County Court Judge two points were taken. The first point was that the consideration was not truly stated in the bill of sale. The County Court Judge decided that it was truly stated and the Divisional Court affirmed the judgment of the County Court Judge. In the Court of Appeal, counsel had abandoned that point and they were not troubled with it in that Court. The second point was that the bill of sale was subject to a defeasance or condition not contained in the body thereof, and that it was therefore void under subsection (3) of section 10 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878. That subsection provided that: "If the bill of sale is made or given subject to any defeasance or condition, or declaration of trust not contained in the body thereof, such defeasance, condition, or declaration shall be deemed to be part of the bill, and shall be written on the same paper or parchment therewith before the registration, and shall be truly set forth in the copy filed under this Act therewith and as part thereof, otherwise the registration shall be void." What was said in this case was that there being a bill of sale to secure the payment of the sum of £1,600 and also a mortgage to secure the payment of the same sum there was a provision in the mortgage deed which added to and contradicted the bill of sale and that therefore the bill of sale was void under the above subsection. What he (the Lord Justice) understood to be the principle of the matter was that if there were in respect of the same debt varying provisions relating to the repayment thereof they must all be in the same document. If there are two documents containing different provisions, the provisions contained in the second document are a defeasance of the first document.

His Lordship then referred to the bill of sale dated July 1, 1925, and to the mortgage of the same date for the same amount, whereby the mortgagor covenanted in consideration of the sum of £1,600 paid by the mortgagee to the mortgagor on the security of a bill of sale dated July 1, 1925, to pay to the mortgagee on December 24 next the sum of £1,600 with interest thereon, and continued. Then came the clause which had given rise to the question in this case. It provided that "subject to the right of the mortgagee to require repayment of the said principal sum on the 24th day of December next according to the foregoing covenant by the mortgagor or at any time thereafter, the principal money hereby secured shall be repaid by instalments of not less than £20," on March 24, June 24, September 24, and December 24 every year, the first payment to be made on September 24, 1926.

It was very difficult to give any intelligible meaning to the clause about repaying the principal by instalments. But the personal covenant to repay the principal debt was expressly reserved and was not affected by the clause in the mortgage deed providing in certain events for repayment by instalments. There was no variation or alteration of the terms of the bill of sale so as to amount to a defeasance of it. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

Lord Justice Sankey agreed. He said that it was sought to defeat the bill of sale in this case on the ground that a contemporaneous document—namely, a mortgage of the same date as the bill of sale—contained provisions relating to repayment by instalments which were not contained in the bill of sale and that therefore the bill of sale was void under section 10, subsection (3), of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878. The difficulty was to ascertain the real meaning of the instalment clause in the mortgage. It must have some meaning, although it was difficult to say what it was. Personally, he (the Lord Justice) had great doubts whether it had any meaning at all. It did not affect the mortgagee's right to sue for the principal. The clause itself was made subject to the right of the mortgagee to require payment on the fixed day or at any time thereafter. It did not affect the bill of sale and there was nothing in it which affected the rights or liabilities under the bill of sale and it did not contain any variation amounting to a defeasance of the bill of sale, and the transaction did not come within the mischief of section 10 (3) of the Act of 1878. The decision of the Judges of the Divisional Court was right and the appeal must be dismissed.

Mr. Justice Tomlin also agreed. The mortgage was obscure. It might be that the provisions with regard to repayment by instalments had no effect at all, or they might have the effect of limiting the mortgagee's rights in respect of foreclosure. In either case they did not vary the terms of the bill of sale and there was no defeasance. He therefore agreed that the appeal should be dismissed.

Prob., Divorce, and Adm. Div. (Hill, J.) 1928. Mar. 27.

WOODLAND v. WOODLAND (OTHERWISE BELIN).*

Divorce — Nullity — Husband's petition—Ceremony of marriage in England—French decree dissolving wife's previous marriage — Decree not complete—Wife's order for restitution of conjugal rights — Appearance by husband —Estoppel.

If a man goes through the form of a ceremony of marriage in England with a woman who is not really free to marry owing to a foreign decree of divorce not having become effective at the time of the English ceremony, and if afterwards, with full knowledge of this fact, he does not raise the question of the validity of the English marriage when sued for restitution of conjugal rights, and thereupon a decree of restitution is granted in which the couple are declared "lawful man and wife," the man is estopped from impeaching the validity of his marriage, and a petition by him for a declaration of nullity of marriage will be dismissed.

This was a petition for nullity of marriage, filed on June 10, 1927, by Mr. Percy Maurice Woodland, a racehorse trainer, of Childerton, Wiltshire, formerly of Alfriston, Sussex. The petition stated that on December 5, 1914, at the register office, St. Martin's, London, he went through a form of ceremony of marriage with Ivy Vera Belin, who described herself as a spinster. There were no children. On March 21, 1907, at the register office, St. George's, Hanover-square, she had been married to Francis Saville Barton, and it was now alleged that this marriage had not been dissolved or annulled on December 5, 1914, and was still subsisting, Mr. Barton being still alive. In 1921 the respondent was granted a decree of restitution of conjugal rights, and on April 5, 1927, she presented a petition for periodical payments. By her answer to the petition for nullity the respondent said that the marriage of 1907 was lawfully dissolved by the Civil Tribunal of the Seine, Paris, on November 18, 1914. By his reply the petitioner denied this plea.

The Hon. Victor Russell appeared for the petitioner ; Mr. G. Tyndale and Mr. H. Rolfe for the respondent.

During the hearing it was established that the Civil Tribunal of the Seine, in an undefended divorce suit brought by Mr. Barton on May 5, 1914, against Mrs. Barton (the present respondent) on the ground of her relations with Mr. Woodland, then a jockey riding in England and France, granted a decree dissolving the marriage. Mr. Woodland joined the Royal Naval Air Service on the outbreak of war, and while on leave awaiting orders to go abroad was married to the respondent at her urgent request on December 5, 1914. At the register office the respondent described herself as a spinster. After that he lived with the respondent for about four weeks, but had not cohabited with her since. While flying over the enemy lines in Palestine he was shot down and taken prisoner by the Turks and was not released until 1919.

Expert legal evidence showed that according to French law a divorced woman could not enter into a valid remarriage until the time for appeal had expired (two months), and in any event not until the formalities of transcription had been carried out in the register of the office of civil status. In this case the transcription was not made until July 29, 1915, when the decree of dissolution became absolute. Even then a further interval might be necessary under French law before remarriage was valid, but this consideration did not arise in the present case. On July 29, 1921, the President granted the respondent a decree of restitution of conjugal rights against the petitioner (Mr. Woodland), the order reciting that they "were and are lawful husband and wife." Mr. Woodland did not defend these proceedings and did not resume cohabitation, Mrs. Woodland returning to France shortly after the decree.

Mr. Justice Hill adjourned the nullity proceedings for argument as to whether the petitioner was not estopped from putting forward his present plea by reason of the principle of res judicata being involved in the restitution decree. He granted the respondent leave to amend her answer, which was accordingly amended on February 22, 1928, alleging the order of restitution by way of estoppel.

Mr. Tyndale submitted that a party could not stand aloof and let his opportunity go, and at some later date raise his plea. Among other authorities he cited Humphries v. Humphries ([1910] 1 K.B., 796 ; [1910] 2 K.B., 531) and Rudd v. Rudd (40 The Times L.R., 197 ; [1924] P., 72), a suit for restitution of conjugal rights, in which Mr. Justice Horridge said : "This suit is brought for the avowed purpose of testing the validity of that decree" (an American decree of divorce). In Hoystead v. Commissioner of Taxation (42 The Times L.R., 207 ; [1926] A.C., 155, at p. 165) Lord Shaw said : "Parties are not permitted to begin fresh litigations because of new views they may entertain of the law of the case, or new versions which they present as to what should be a proper apprehension by the Court of the legal result either of the construction of the documents or the weight of certain circumstances. If this were permitted litigation would have no end, except when legal ingenuity is exhausted." Counsel could not agree that the marriage here was valid, but the petitioner was estopped from raising the plea.

Mr. Justice Hill.—Your submission is summed up in Article 41 of Stephen's Digest of the Law of Evidence :

"Every judgment is conclusive proof as against parties and privies of facts directly in issue in the case, actually decided by the Court, and appearing from the judgment itself to be the ground on which it was based ; unless evidence was admitted in the action in which the judgment was delivered which is excluded in the action in which that judgment is intended to be proved."

Mr. Russell submitted that a question of status was involved which was on a different footing from other cases of estoppel. He referred to Cowley v. Cowley (29 The Times L.R., 690 ; [1913] P., 159) and Miles v. Chilton (1 Rob. Ecc., 684). In Harriman v. Harriman (25 The Times L.R., 291 ; [1909] P., 123, at p. 144) Lord Justice Farwell said :

* Reported by William Latey, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"No rule of evidence which prevents a party as against the other litigant from giving evidence of the truth can bind the Court to shut its eyes if it is not satisfied that all the truth is before it."

MR. JUSTICE HILL, in delivering judgment, said: In the course of the hearing it appeared that there had been proceedings in this Court in 1921 which had resulted in a decree of restitution of conjugal rights being pronounced on July 29, 1921, in a suit by the present respondent against the present petitioner, and, I think, the first suggestion came from me that that might create difficulties in the way of the petitioner's now setting up the case that the original marriage was void. The matter stood over for counsel to consider it and they have assisted me very much by their argument.

They also, however, asked that I should express my opinion both on the merits of the nullity question as well as upon the estoppel point, and I do so at their request, but I think that if the estoppel point is good I am in truth debarred from considering the merits. It may, however, be convenient if the case goes higher, and if I am wrong on the estoppel point, that the Court of Appeal should know what my decision would be upon the merits if the matter is open.

It is clear that the decree of the French Tribunal on November 18, 1914, did not operate to dissolve the marriage. It was a preliminary step like a decree nisi for the dissolution of marriage, but it was not effective to dissolve it. The necessary steps to convert it into a dissolution of marriage had not been taken by December 5, 1914, when the petitioner entered into a ceremony of marriage with the respondent. I think it is clear from the evidence of the French lawyers that the judgment of the Court did not itself make any change of status. It did not dissolve the marriage in itself. Further requirements were necessary. Certain intervals of time had to elapse and the decree had to be transcribed into the Register of Civil Status before the marriage was dissolved.

On December 5, 1914, the necessary time had not expired and the decree had not been transcribed into the register of civil status. It follows that on that date the respondent was still the wife of Mr. Barton and, therefore, incapable of marrying the present petitioner. Therefore, if the matter is open to the petitioner, he would be entitled to a decree of nullity, but I cannot see how the petitioner can be heard to say that he did not become the legal husband of the respondent by reason of the ceremony of December 5, 1914.

In 1921 the respondent brought proceedings for restitution of conjugal rights. She had to allege marriage in her petition. The Court would have no jurisdiction to grant such a decree until it found the marriage proved. The decree of the Court pronounced in terms that the petitioner "had sufficiently proved the contents of the petition," and that the respondent and the petitioner "were and are lawfully married," and ordered "that the said respondent do within 14 days from service of this order on him return home to the petitioner and render her conjugal rights" and so on.

It may be that such a decree does not directly affect the status of the parties, but it is a final decree and it can only be made upon the finding of status —namely, that the husband and wife were and are lawful husband and wife. The husband and wife were both parties to that suit. The husband appeared and he put in no answer, but he might in that suit have traversed the wife's allegation of the marriage; he might have put the marriage in issue. He did not do so. It may well be that at that time he had not ascertained that there were any grounds for disputing the validity of the marriage. He may not have ascertained his rights, but he did not file an answer, and the decree went by default upon the wife's proof of the marriage, which at that time no doubt she believed to be a valid marriage, and upon proof of the other matters entitling her to a decree.

Can it be that in such circumstances it is open to the petitioner to allege that the marriage was not a valid marriage? No doubt in some respects the questions which arise under a contract of marriage are different from questions which arise under other contracts, but I have listened to the argument and attended to the cases that have been cited and I am unable to find that there is in the law peculiar to this Division anything which renders inapplicable the general law of estoppel. [His Lordship read Article 41 of Stephen's Digest of the Law of Evidence, and continued.] The marriage was directly in issue in the proceedings for restitution. It was actually decided by the Court, and the Court could not have granted a decree without finding that it was a valid marriage. That appears from the judgment itself to be the ground upon which it was based. There was a finding that the parties were lawful husband and wife. I can see no reason for saying that, because this was a marriage contract, I am to refuse to apply the principles laid down in the cases cited to me.

In this view I am very much assisted by Wilkins v. Wilkins (12 The Times L.R., 212; [1896] P., 108), in which it is clear that Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes (as he then was) felt the same difficulty which presented itself to me when this case was opened. In that case the wife took proceedings for judicial separation on the ground of the husband's adultery, and the husband put the marriage in issue on the ground that a previous husband of the woman was alive, but the jury found otherwise and a decree of judicial separation was granted. Apparently the previous husband had not been heard of for nearly 40 years, but he appeared nine months after the finding of the jury and the respondent then petitioned for nullity. Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes had no doubt that the other man was the real first husband, but he felt a difficulty in granting a decree of nullity by reason of the verdict and decree in the former suit, and he adjourned the consideration of the case in order that the then petitioner might make an application to the Court of Appeal. He felt the same difficulty that I feel. It is quite true that there the validity of the marriage had been put in issue by the husband and the question had been fought out, but that can make no difference.

In the case of this wife's petition for restitution of conjugal rights she alleged the validity of the marriage, and the husband, if he had chosen, might have appeared to traverse it, but he did not choose to do so at that time. Therefore, in my view, I have every reason to feel the same difficulty as Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes felt. But the way in which the Court of Appeal dealt with that case (Wilkins v. Wilkins, supra) was to extend the time for appealing, and it was not suggested in the Court of Appeal that the decree of judicial separation was not binding as long as it stood, and, indeed, Lord Justice Kay clearly expressed his view that it was binding. He said: "As evidence is now forthcoming which could not by the exercise of reasonable diligence have been obtained at the first trial, there must be some mode of getting over an estoppel arising from a verdict which was obtained under a misapprehension of the real facts. In my opinion, we have jurisdiction to enlarge the time for moving for a new trial of the first suit, and I am also clearly of opinion that the case is one in which the jurisdiction ought to be exercised." The estoppel was clearly there recognized, and a way of getting round it was found. I asked Mr. Russell if he would like me to do what Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes did in that case, and he said that he would prefer me to deal with the case as it stands.

No doubt he can go to the Court of Appeal. If I am wrong in finding that there is an estoppel, the matter is open to the husband. I have stated in my opinion what will be the result if I am competent to deal with the merits. If, on the other hand, the Court of Appeal think that the proper way is to extend the time for appeal, it is within their power to deal with it in that way, but for the moment I must dismiss the petition with costs.

IRONMONGER AND CO. v. DYNE.*

Gaming—Dealings in foreign currency—Obligation to deliver.

Observations upon what constitutes a transaction a gaming or wagering contract.

This was an application by the defendant, Mrs. Aminta Marjorie Bradley Dyne, of Earl's Court, S.W., and Tring, Hertfordshire, for judgment or a new trial on an appeal from the verdict and judgment entered at the trial before Mr. Justice Horridge and a special jury in favour of the plaintiffs, Messrs. Ironmonger and Co., foreign bankers, of 5, Angel-court, Throgmorton-street, in an action in which they claimed to recover from the defendant about £39,000. The plaintiffs said that the money was due and owing in respect of foreign currency sold by the defendant to the plaintiffs and resold by them to her.

The defendant pleaded the Gaming Act, alleging that the contracts referred to gambling transactions. She contended that she and the plaintiffs were conducting a gamble in foreign currency. She said that there were no real purchases and sales, and that it was not intended by the parties that there should be any liability either to deliver or to accept delivery. All that the parties intended, she said, was to gamble on the rise and fall of the franc and lira during the time which elapsed between the date of each contract and the date of its performance.

The plaintiffs sued the defendant in respect of her separate estate.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiffs, and Mr. Justice Horridge entered judgment for them for £38,938, the agreed amount.

The defendant appealed.

Mr. Jowitt, K.C., and Mr. Blanco White appeared for the appellant; Mr. Stuart Bevan, K.C., and Mr. St. John Field for the respondents.

Mr. JOWITT, in opening the appeal, complained of the summing up of the Judge, and said that some important matters had not been mentioned to the jury.

He (counsel) contended that there was conclusive evidence of gambling. The transactions began in 1923 with Mr. J. D. Gregory, who then occupied a prominent position in the Foreign Office. In January, 1924, the defendant, Mrs. Bradley Dyne, started operations, and throughout 1924, 1925, and 1926, down to the date of the writ, she operated on a very extensive scale. Counsel said that he was told that there were 280 separate transactions, and the turnover amounted to 421,000,000 francs, 17,000,000 lire, 1,000,000 pesetas, 120,000 Norwegian kroner, and 100,000 United States dollars. This case far transcended all other previous cases in the magnitude of the transactions.

The subject-matter of the action consisted of the last 12 of the transactions, which took place between December, 1926, and February, 1927. It was material to consider the nature of those transactions. In no single one was any currency ever delivered by either party. In no single case was any arrangement for delivery of currency ever made, and no delivery was ever asked for. No address was ever given at which delivery could be made.

Whenever Mrs. Bradley Dyne wanted to speculate she communicated with the plaintiffs and a contract would be arranged by them in the market in a sense directly opposite to that in which the contract was to be made with Mrs. Bradley Dyne. In that way, counsel suggested, they preferred to "lay off the bet."

As the case related to the sale of foreign currency, the obligation to deliver was an obligation to deliver currency. If the day came for delivery and the defendant—as in fact happened—could not deliver, what happened? The plaintiffs would "close" the transaction (without instructions) in the sense of entering into a new contract with the defendant, of sale by them to her, which would have the effect of undoing the former contract, subject to payment of the difference.

The evidence was that it was not expected that the defendant would have to deliver. It was understood that the transaction would be closed at the rate of the day. The Judge ought to have directed the jury that they ought to draw the inference that all the transactions between the defendant and the plaintiffs were simply and solely gaming transactions.

In reply to LORD JUSTICE SCRUTTON, counsel said that Mrs. Bradley Dyne paid back what she could. In 1924 she repaid £28,000, and in 1925, £2,000.

Mr. STUART BEVAN, for the respondents, said that she received £24,000 in 1926.

Mr. JOWITT said that whether the plaintiffs were or were not affording the defendant facilities for gambling it was clear that they were, by means of enforceable and genuine contracts, covering their obligations to the defendant.

LORD JUSTICE SCRUTTON.—That is to say, treating their obligation to the defendant as one which they might be called on to perform.

Mr. JOWITT.—Yes: but that does not affect the case. The plaintiffs had two risks: (1) the risk of the defendant's solvency. The way in which they regarded that was shown by the fact that they never asked for any cover: and (2) the risk of her repudiating her liabilities by pleading the Gaming Act. In view of the method and manner of the introduction by Mr. J. D. Gregory, that risk must have been regarded as completely negligible.

Continuing, counsel said that at one time there was a hopeless muddle between the defendant and Mr. Gregory with regard to the relative division of the "spoils."

LORD JUSTICE SCRUTTON.—None of these people had any idea of the mischief that they were doing to France.

* Reported by T. W. MORGAN and E. J. M. CHAPLIN, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Mr. JOWITT.—I agree. The view taken of gambling is a merely selfish one. The gambler never thinks of anything except the immediate prospect of winning money without working for it.

LORD JUSTICE GREER.—Was the defendant winning at that time?

Mr. JOWITT.—Yes; in 1926 I think she won £23,000.

LORD JUSTICE GREER.—That explains her plunging since.

Mr. JOWITT read a letter written by Mrs. Dyne to a member of the plaintiff firm in which she said:—

"My husband has definitely refused to recognize my gambling debts and I have to go to work to pay them off myself. . . . My dear Albert, I do not know what more to say. I fully recognize that this further blow on the top of everything is going to affect you and your firm very seriously. But at the present moment I am utterly cornered. It is not much use saying I am terribly sorry, but I do say it. I never in my darkest moments thought I should have to let you down."

Counsel said that that was not the letter of a person willingly dishonouring gambling debts, but of one who realized that it was a most humiliating thing.

LORD JUSTICE SCRUTTON.—You can say, "I can't pay" without saying, "I plead the Gaming Act."

Mr. JOWITT.—Yes; but there were the words "my husband has definitely refused to recognize my gambling debts."

Counsel submitted that on a review of all the circumstances the inference could properly be drawn that both parties intended that nothing but differences should be paid, and that was a gambling transaction.

LORD JUSTICE GREER.—You will have to satisfy me of that.

Counsel proceeded to read the evidence and the summing-up, and submitted that the question was not properly expounded to the jury. Counsel then referred to Universal Stock Exchange, Limited v. Strachan ([1896] A.C., 166); In re Gieve (15 The Times L.R., 251; [1899] 1 Q.B., 794); In re Duncan and Co. (The Times, March 17, 1903); Miles v. Lowenfeld and Others (The Times, December 21, 1900, May 7 and 8, 1901); and Barnett v. Sanker (41 The Times L.R., 660), and submitted that, where on the totality of the circumstances of the case the proper inference was that the transactions related to differences only, then the transactions were gaming transactions; and even though on the face of them the contracts gave an option to the buyer or seller to demand delivery or acceptance, as the case might be, the transactions were none the less gaming transactions where it was not anticipated by either party that any delivery would be made or asked for.

Mr. STUART BEVAN, in opening the case for the respondents, said that the case made before Mr. Justice Horridge was not as to the true inference to be drawn from the circumstances. Mrs. Bradley Dyne's case was that a direct agreement was entered into under which she was to pay differences only, and the question, therefore, was whether such an agreement had been entered into. The question of the intention of the parties was, therefore, not open, the only matter to be considered being the terms of the agreement. The summing-up could not be effectively criticized because it dealt with the case in all its aspects.

As to the verdict being the only possible verdict, he submitted that on the evidence the only possible verdict was one for the plaintiffs, and for this broad reason, that it took two parties to make a gamble. In this case the one element of gambling was wanting, because the plaintiffs never gambled at all.

Mr. ST. JOHN FIELD followed on the same side.

Mr. JOWITT, in reply, said that what the defendant desired to have tried again was whether, in all the circumstances, the jury ought not under a proper direction to find that what the parties were doing was not entering into genuine commercial bargains but entering into transactions which, though couched in commercial language, in reality amounted to gambling transactions.

LORD JUSTICE SCRUTTON, in giving judgment, said that the defendant appealed on two grounds: (a) misdirection and (b) that the verdict was against the weight of evidence.

The question in the case might be stated very shortly. The action was brought on 12 contracts of purchase of foreign exchange. The defence set up was that these were gaming contracts unenforceable under the Gaming Act. The transactions between the plaintiffs and the defendant extended over three years, although the particular amount sued for covered only the period of two months in 1926 and 1927.

The transactions in question were not of a pleasant nature. After the War, while Europe was recovering from the various upheavals which were the result of it, the value of currency fluctuated extremely. Contracts for the purchase or sale of currency which, before the War, had been a comparatively sober business became very speculative in their making and their result. It was possible to make very large profits and equally possible to make very great losses, and, as was to be expected when great profits might be made, the birds of prey gathered together. Reckless speculators, absolutely indifferent to the damage that they were doing to the country in the currency of which they were dealing, began operations. People bought and sold foreign currency to a very large extent, with the most disastrous results to the countries concerned. That was particularly the case with regard to sales and purchases of French currency, which went near to bringing that country to ruin. People who indulged in those speculations were beneath contempt and ought to be condemned. They were utterly selfish, and had no regard at all to the enormous injury which they were inflicting on the legitimate trade of the country in whose exchange they were speculating. The unfortunate result of such speculations was one of the reasons which made the case unpleasant.

Another reason which had made the case unpleasant and notorious was that in the particular set of speculations in which Mrs. Dyne was interested more than one prominent official of the Foreign Office was concerned. That had nothing to do with the legal merits of the case, and he proposed to say nothing more about it, except that the Government had dealt with the matter properly in so far as they had declared that such transactions were a disgrace to the Civil Service, and the proper punishment had fallen on those officials who engaged in them. The only question to be determined was whether those 12 transactions, upon which the claim was based, were gaming and wagering transactions. It must be borne in mind that the case was one tried by a jury, and the question was, therefore, not what conclusion the Court, or the Judge before whom the case was tried would have come to, but whether the Judge had properly directed the jury and whether there was evidence on which the jury could, under that direction, properly arrive at their finding. The jury were the persons to decide.

In considering the summing-up, one must have regard to the course which the case took at the trial. He was not going to attempt exhaustively to define what was a gaming or wagering contract. Lord Justice Cotton had attempted a definition in Thacker v. Hardy (4 Q.B.D., 685) when he said, at page 695 :—

"The essence of gaming and wagering is that one party is to win and the other to lose upon a future event, which at the time of the contract is of an uncertain nature—that is to say, if the event turns out one way A will lose, but if it turns out the other way he will win."

With great respect, he thought that that definition was not exhaustive. If goods were sold to be delivered three months hence at a fixed price, and the price fell below or went above that figure, the price at the date fixed would determine whether there was a profit or a loss ; but that was not a gaming or wagering contract. Lord Justice Cotton had omitted any such consideration as that. Assume the case of the Grand National and a horse called Tipperary Tim, and A and B agreed that if Tipperary Tim did not win A would pay £1 to B, but that if it did, B would pay £100 to A ; that was a bet, because neither of them had any interest in the horse except their agreement about the money to be paid if the horse should win or lose. But if the contract was that A said that he would buy Tipperary Tim for £200, and, if he won the Grand National, he would pay another £800, a matter which depended on a future event, that was not a gaming transaction because they had a proprietary interest in the subject matter—Tipperary Tim—which passed from one to the other.

A number of similar examples might be given in commercial matters, as in the case of goods to be delivered three months hence, the price of which would depend on the market and would determine whether the seller would get out with a profit or not. That rested on matters over which he had no control, but if the contract was to result in the delivery of goods or in the passing of property it was not gaming or wagering. If it were a contract in which differences in prices were to be paid it was not a gaming contract unless it could be shown that there was an agreement between the parties that the purchaser had no right to claim delivery of the goods and the seller had no right to claim acceptance.

The question to be considered here was whether the transactions were such that nothing was to happen except payment of differences, or whether currency was to be delivered. That depended on the agreement between the parties, and it had been agreed by counsel in the Court below that the question to be left to the jury was that which had been put by Mr. Justice Cave in Universal Stock Exchange, Limited v. Strachan ([1896] A.C., 166, at p. 167) to the jury and was approved in the House of Lords. What Mr. Justice Cave said was this :—

"The question which you have to try is whether these transactions were real bargains for purchase of stock or whether they were simply gambilng transactions intended to end in the payment of differences. . . . A man goes to a broker and directs him to buy and sell so much stock, as the case may be. That may be, in the eye of the purchaser, a gambling transaction or it may not. If he means to invest his money in the purchase of the stock which he orders to be bought, that undoubtedly is a perfectly legitimate and real business transaction."

After referring to the "terms of business" that Judge concluded thus :—

"Notwithstanding those ostensible terms of business, was there a secret understanding that the stock should never be called for or delivered, and that differences only should be dealt with ? If there was that secret understanding, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover his securities. If there was not that secret understanding, then he is not entitled to recover them, and that is the only question with which I need trouble you."

A question based on that direction had in this case been put to the jury, and he thought that no complaint was to be made about how the question was put. In his opinion, although the summing-up might have been improved in one or more matters, there was no ground for saying that there had been a misdirection. And further, he was of opinion that there was evidence on which the jury could come to their conclusion. The plaintiffs, who were said to have been gaming, had covered themselves by genuine commercial contracts which could be enforced against them and protected them against payments to the defendant, but did not apply to payments to be made by her. The appeal therefore failed, and must be dismissed.

Lord Justice Greer and Lord Justice Sankey delivered judgments to the same effect.

LONDON HOLEPROOF HOSIERY COMPANY, LIMITED v. PADMORE.*

Vendor and Purchaser—Lessee's option of purchase—Destruction of premises by fire—Subsequent exercise of option—Refusal of lessor to reinstate premises—Repudiation of contract by lessees—Claim to specific performance.

The defendant demised to the plaintiffs for three years a piece of land with a factory on it, and the plaintiffs were to keep the inside of the factory in repair. The agreement said nothing as to the repair of the outside and as to insurance, but gave the plaintiffs an option of purchase during the term. The defendant insured the factory against fire, and, on the occurrence of a fire which almost completely destroyed it, he received compensation from the insurance company. The plaintiffs then gave notice of the exercise of their option of purchase and paid a deposit, but the defendant declined to reinstate the walls and roof and alleged that in exercising the option the plaintiffs had to take the property as it was. In an action for a declaration that in these circumstances the plaintiffs were not bound to proceed with the purchase the defendant counterclaimed for specific performance.

Held, that since at the date of the exercise of the option the plaintiffs, to the knowledge of the defendant, thought that he was going to re-erect the factory, the parties were never ad idem and the plaintiffs were entitled to a return of their deposit and the counterclaim for specific performance failed.

* Reported by H. C. Garsia, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Decision of Tomlin, J., (44 The Times L.R., 161) reversed.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from an order of Mr. Justice Tomlin (44 The Times L.R., 161).

In the action the plaintiffs claimed from the defendant (1) damages for breach of contract (if any); and (2) in the alternative, a declaration that the plaintiffs were not bound to proceed with the purchase of a factory, and an order for return of £160 paid as a deposit. The defendant counterclaimed for specific performance of the contract to purchase the factory.

By an agreement, dated August 20, 1925, the defendant demised to the plaintiffs a piece of land at Woodgate Rothby, Leicestershire, with a factory fitted with machinery thereon, for the term of three years from August 1, 1925, at a rent of £60 a year. The agreement contained a provision that the plaintiffs should keep in good repair and condition at all times during the term the inside of the factory and premises. The agreement was silent as to keeping in repair the outside of the factory and as to keeping it insured. It contained an option for the plaintiffs to purchase the factory premises on or before June 24, 1927, at the price of £1,600 on giving to the defendant six months' notice in writing and paying a deposit of £160 and all arrears of rent up to the date fixed for completion.

In November, 1926, the factory was almost completely destroyed by fire. The factory had been insured by the defendant against fire and he received the sum of £625 from the insurance company.

Correspondence ensued between the parties and on December 8, 1926, the defendant's solicitors wrote to the plaintiffs saying:—

"According to the agreement you are responsible for payment of rent of the factory until August 1, 1928, notwithstanding the fact of the fire which has occurred, and you are similarly liable to repair the interior of the premises. . . . Our client is obtaining an estimate for the necessary repair of the exterior roof and exterior walls and will be glad to know that you appreciate the responsibility for the repair and replacement of the interior and will be glad to know when this work will be put in hand."

To that the plaintiffs' solicitor replied on December 13, 1926:—

"My clients in no way suggest that they do not intend to carry out their obligations under the agreement for tenancy and they are quite willing to proceed with the repairs as soon as your client has put the building in such a condition that it can be repaired. I understand it is quite obvious that there is nothing in the nature of internal repairs which can be carried out until after your client has replaced the building. It has occurred to me that as your client is dealing with the roof and walls, &c., it might be advisable if you put me into touch with the builder who is doing your client's work."

In answer to that the defendant's solicitors wrote on December 14 stating that they were obtaining an estimate of the work required for external repairs.

On December 20, 1926, the plaintiffs' solicitor gave the defendant a notice in writing exercising the option to purchase and paid a deposit of £160. That notice was accompanied by a covering letter in which the plaintiffs' solicitor said that it was, of course, necessary for the building to be placed in proper repair by the defendant at the earliest possible moment, and pointing out that the plaintiffs were acquiring the freehold of the property when reinstated by the defendant. The defendant's solicitors replied on December 22:—

"In reference to your suggestion that the building should be placed in proper repair by our client we can only say this is a misconception of the position. Your clients in exercising the option take the property in its present state subject to and with the benefit of the tenancy agreement, which contains no covenant on our client's part to repair."

The plaintiffs' solicitor replied saying that he could not agree that there was any misconception of the position on the plaintiffs' part. Further correspondence ensued in which each side maintained the same position. Requisitions were delivered and answers made maintaining the same opposed views.

The plaintiffs brought the action on March 2, 1927.

Mr. Justice Tomlin dismissed the action and made an order for specific performance on the counterclaim, holding that the plaintiffs were too late in seeking in this action to repudiate the contract and that the contract was to take the premises in the condition in which they were when the option was exercised.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. C. A. Bennett, K.C., and Sir Arthur Underhill appeared for the appellants; and Mr. Archer, K.C., and Mr. H. A. H. Christie for the respondent.

The Master of the Rolls (Lord Hanworth), in giving judgment, said that what the plaintiffs were now claiming was (1) that they were not bound to proceed with the purchase of the property and (2) an order for the repayment to them of the deposit of £160. The option contained in the tenancy agreement was only exercisable if the plaintiffs had committed no breach of their obligations under the tenancy agreement. That option was to be regarded as an offer made independently of and collateral to the contract of tenancy.

It was essential in the first instance to consider the precise terms of the option. It was not an unqualified option, and only came into existence if there were no existing breach by the plaintiffs of their obligations. If there were such a breach in existence, there was no option to exercise. One of the covenants by the plaintiffs was to maintain and keep in repair the inside of the factory premises, and a covenant to keep in repair involved, as had long ago been decided, an obligation to put in repair. It followed that before there was an option which the plaintiffs could exercise they had to put in repair the interior of the premises which had been burnt down. It seemed to follow that there must be premises in existence to enable the plaintiffs to carry out their agreement to repair the interior.

The option in his view involved a condition that the plaintiffs should have had an opportunity of fulfilling their duty by the defendant's reinstating the skeleton walls of the premises. There was a duty cast on the vendor (the defendant) to put the premises in such a condition that the tenants would have an opportunity of remedying their breach. On the attitude taken up by the defendant, there was no option in existence which could be exercised, because the option could only be exercised if and when the factory premises were in existence. As there was no option which could be exercised on December 20, 1926, it followed that there was no contract between the parties and the defendant's claim to enforce it must fail and the plaintiffs be entitled to a return of the deposit.

There was another ground on which the defendant's claim also failed. The whole correspondence showed that, in purporting to exercise the option, the plaintiffs were relying on the defendant's previous statements that he was going to reinstate the building. But the defendant's solicitors in their letter of December 22 repudiated any liability to undertake its reinstatement. The position, therefore, was that the plaintiffs thought that they were being promised a reinstated building and that, as he held, the defendant knew that the plaintiffs so understood. If, then, the building was not to be reinstated the very basis of the exercise of the option was gone and the case came within Smith v. Hughes (L.R., 6 Q.B., 597).

The facts were plain from the correspondence and showed that the plaintiffs had definitely dealt with the defendant to his knowledge on the presumption that they were contracting for the purchase of a reinstated building and, if so, there was no good contract because the parties were not ad idem. On that ground, also, the defendant's claim to hold the plaintiffs to their exercise of the option failed.

It had been suggested that after the defendant's solicitors wrote the letter of December 22 the plaintiffs were entitled to elect whether they should go on with the contract. But as there was no contract there could be no question of any subsequent election.

The appeal must be allowed with costs and the counterclaim dismissed, and there must be an order for payment to the plaintiffs of the deposit of £160.

Lord Justice Lawrence said that the question which arose here was by no means free from difficulty. The correspondence showed that at the date of the exercise of the option the plaintiffs thought, and the defendant knew that they thought, that the defendant was going to re-erect the factory. But immediately after it was exercised the defendant told the plaintiffs that he was not going to do so. It was in these circumstances that the plaintiffs commenced this action and claimed damages for breach of contract or alternatively a return of the deposit on the ground that the contract was void. He (his Lordship) thought that logically the first point to be considered was whether there was no contract because the parties were never ad idem. A decision on this point was on the view which he took decisive of the issue. As he had already pointed out, it was quite plain that the plaintiffs in exercising the option counted on the defendant's re-erecting the building, and that it was only on that footing that they exercised it, and it was also plain that the defendant knew this. It followed that the case fell within the principle of Smith v. Hughes (L.R., 6 Q.B., 597, at p. 607). There Mr. Justice Blackburn said: "I apprehend that if one of the parties intends to make a contract on one set of terms, and the other intends to make a contract on another set of terms, or, as it is sometimes expressed, if the parties are not ad idem, there is no contract."

If that was the true view of the position here, it seemed to be wholly irrelevant to consider the subsequent conduct of the parties; for if one thing was more clear than another it was that no fresh bargain was ever come to by the parties. Both parties insisted on their views of the contract of December 20, 1926; but if in fact there was no such contract, there could be no ratification or affirmation. This was not the case of a voidable contract, but one where no contract in fact came into existence. He proposed to found his judgment on that fact and not to deal with any of the difficult questions which might arise on the alternative argument on behalf of the plaintiffs that a contract to sell a factory could not be satisfied by selling its burnt remains, so that the plaintiffs were entitled to damages for breach of contract.

Lord Justice Russell said that he agreed that the appeal must be allowed. The correspondence between the parties satisfied him that the plaintiffs in accepting the defendant's continuing offer of sale thought that they would receive a conveyance of the reinstated premises, and, further, that the defendant knew that this was the plaintiffs' expectation. If that was so, the principle of Smith v. Hughes (L.R., 6 Q.B., 597) applied and the parties not being ad idem there was no contract. That was sufficient to dispose of the appeal.

As regards the first point taken on behalf of the plaintiffs, he inclined to the view that at the date of the exercise of the option the defendant must be taken to have been offering to sell the land with the factory buildings upon it and that the notice exercising the option was an acceptance of this offer and constituted a contract to convey the land with the factory buildings on it. That contract the defendant owing to the fire was unable or unwilling to perform; and, if so, the defendant was not carrying out his contract and was not entitled to retain the deposit of £160. Therefore, on this point also, the plaintiffs would, he thought, have been equally entitled to succeed. The plaintiffs were, however, only claiming now to be free of the contract and to have their deposit returned. He agreed that appeal should be allowed and the defendant's counterclaim dismissed and that there should be an order for repayment of the deposit.

SOWERBY AND ANOTHER v. LINDSAY (WHITELOCK AND ANOTHER, 3RD PARTIES).*

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Construction—Rates paid in excess of fixed sum in any year of tenancy—Covenant by landlords to refund—Covenant by tenant duly and punctually to pay rates—Three half-years' rates paid in single year of tenancy—Construction of landlords' covenant to refund.

The lease of a flat commencing at midsummer at a rent of £400 per annum, payable in advance at the rate of £100 on each quarter day, contained a covenant by the lessors that in case the total sum paid by the tenant in any one year of the term in respect of rates and taxes should exceed £125, the lessors would, on production of the relative receipts, refund to the tenant the difference between the total sum paid by him as aforesaid and £125. If this difference were not refunded by the lessors within 14 days of demand the tenant was to be at liberty to deduct such difference from the next instalment of rent. The lease contained a covenant by the tenant that he would duly and punctually pay and discharge all rates, taxes, duties, charges, assessments, and outgoings payable in respect of the demised premises. The tenant's right to quiet enjoyment was only made expressly conditional on the tenant's performance of his covenants.

The tenant in a year of the tenancy between midsummer and midsummer paid three half-years' rates, amounting in all to over £125, and having demanded the refund of the excess from the landlords and having failed to get payment of the same within 14 days of the demand, deducted it from his next instalment of rent.

Held, that even on the assumption that he had not duly and punctually paid these rates, the tenant, by the express terms of the lessors' covenant, was entitled to make this deduction. The tenant's covenant as to due and punctual payment of the rates was not a condition of the lessors' covenant to refund the excess paid over £125, and it did not qualify or modify that covenant.

Quaere : What is the precise meaning of a covenant in a lease "duly and punctually" to pay all rates payable in respect of the demised premises ?

This was an appeal from a decision of the Recorder of the City of London, sitting at the Mayor's and City of London Court, by which he gave judgment for the plaintiffs, Messrs. Sowerby and Another, against the defendant, Mr. John Lindsay, for £66 9s. 2d., being a quarter's rent of £100 for a flat on the fourth floor at No. 24, Park-lane, London, less certain credits to the plaintiffs amounting to £33 10s. 10d., and judgment for the defendant against the third parties for the amount payable by the defendant to the plaintiffs in respect of the claim and costs.

By a lease dated June 26, 1925, the Park-lane Flats, Ltd., demised to Captain Beaumont the said flat at a rent of £400 per annum, payable in advance at the rate of £100 on each quarter day. Clause 2 (2) of the lease was in these terms :—

"That the tenant will duly and punctually pay and discharge all rates, taxes, duties, charges, assessments, and outgoings whatsoever, whether Parliamentary, parochial, local, or of any other description, and including in particular water rate, which are now or may at any time hereafter be assessed, charged or imposed upon or payable in respect of the demised premises or the owner or occupier in respect thereof (landlords' property tax in respect of the rent first hereinbefore reserved only excepted) and will also duly and punctually pay all sums payable in respect of gas, electric light, and other luminant, if any, used on the flat as shown by the separate meter or meters belonging thereto."

By clause 4 (6) : "In case the total sum paid by the tenant in any one year of the term hereby granted in respect of rates and taxes shall exceed £125, that the lessor will on production of the relative receipts refund to the tenant the difference between the total sum paid by him as aforesaid and the said sum of £125. And that if such difference be not refunded by the lessor within 14 days of demand, then the tenant shall be at liberty to deduct such difference from the next instalment of rent payable by him hereunder."

By clause 4 (1) of the lease the right to quiet enjoyment was made conditional on the tenant's performance of his covenants.

By a deed of assignment dated December 4, 1925, the Park-lane Flats, Ltd., assigned their interest in the lease to the plaintiffs. By a deed of assignment dated May 26, 1927, Captain Beaumont assigned his tenancy under the lease to the defendant. In the year of the tenancy from June 24, 1926, to June 24, 1927, Captain Beaumont had paid three half-years' general rates and two water rates, making in all £213 11s. 8d. On completion of the assignment of the tenancy Mr. Lindsay paid over to Captain Beaumont £88 11s. 8d., the amount by which £213 11s. 8d. exceeded £125, and Messrs. Whitelock and Storr, Captain Beaumont's solicitors, gave Mr. Lindsay an undertaking by way of indemnity in respect of the said sum. The sum of £88 11s. 8d. then duly demanded from the plaintiffs having been and remaining unpaid for 14 days, Mr. Lindsay claimed to deduct the said sum from the next instalment of the rent, due on June 24, 1927. The plaintiffs thereupon sued for £100, this instalment of the rent, less certain credits of £33 10s. 10d., making £66 9s. 2d., under Order XIV. in the High Court. The defendant obtained leave to defend, claiming the right to deduct £88 11s. 8d. under clause 4 (6) of the lease, and the action was transferred to the Mayor's and City of London Court, Messrs. Whitelock and Storr being added as third parties. The learned Recorder gave judgment for the plaintiffs for £66 9s. 2d., with costs, and judgment for the defendant against the third parties for the amount payable by the defendant to the plaintiffs in respect of the claim and costs. The defendant and the third parties appealed.

Mr. C. A. Bennett, K.C., and Mr. Sandlands appeared for the appellants ; Mr. Grant, K.C., and Mr. Lavington for the respondents.

Mr. Justice Salter said that this was an appeal from a judgment of the learned Recorder for the City of London. He agreed with him that the point raised was of interest and capable of argument ; but he was unable to agree with the conclusion of the learned Recorder as to the construction of this lease. The action was brought by landlords against a tenant for the quarter's rent of a flat in Park-lane, the quarter ending at midsummer, 1927. The flat was let at £400 a year ; £100 being payable on each of the usual quarter days. The question for decision was what right, if any, the tenant had in the circumstances to make a deduction from this quarter's rent in respect of rates paid by him. The lease contained only two clauses which required to be cited. The first was sub-clause 2 of clause 2, which contained the tenant's covenants ; sub-clause 1 contained the covenant to pay the rent, and the second was in these terms. [His Lordship read the sub-clause.]

It was to be observed that those words "duly and punctually," upon which so much insistence had been made, qualified the covenant to pay rates and also the covenant to pay for gas and electric light and matters of that kind. The other relevant clause was sub-clause 6 of clause 4, which contained the landlord's covenant and was in these terms. [His Lordship read the sub-clause.]

It had not been argued that a year of tenancy did not mean a year from midsummer to midsummer; and in the year in question, from midsummer, 1926, to midsummer, 1927, the tenant had in fact made three payments in respect of rates and taxes. On July 24, 1926, he had paid £65 6s. 3d. for general rate, in respect of the period from April 1 to September 30, a period of which the first half was in the previous year of the tenancy; the second half was in the year in question. Then the tenant had made a second payment for rates on October 28, 1926, £65 6s. 3d., for the winter half of the rates from Michaelmas to Easter. Lastly, near the end of the tenancy year, on May 25, 1927, he had paid £66 9s. 2d. for the April to September half of the rates. He also paid two sums of £8 5s. each for water rate, as to which no question arose. He therefore had paid during that year of the tenancy for rates £213 11s. 8d., and the difference between that sum and the £125 mentioned in clause 4 (6) of the lease was £88 11s. 8d. The question was whether the tenant was entitled to deduct that sum from the quarter's rent sued for. The landlords had admitted the right of the tenant to deduct a smaller sum, but the only question that arose was whether the tenant was or was not entitled to deduct this sum of £88 11s. 8d. from the quarter's rent. That amount had been demanded and had not been paid within fourteen days; the tenant then claimed to make that deduction.

To make the matter clear, it was advisable to state the payments which had been made by the tenant in the previous year. The tenancy had commenced on June 24, 1925—midway in the summer half of the rates. On September 29, 1925, the tenant had paid £36 17s. 6d., being half the rates for that half-year, which had been demanded from him from June 24 to September 30. Then, for the winter quarters of 1925-26, from September 30, 1925, to March 31, 1926, he had paid on February 16, 1926, £72 10s. Then the next quarter would be from April 1 to September 30, 1926, and he made no payment in respect of that half-year, before the year of tenancy with which they were concerned began on June 24. It appeared, then, that in the first year of the tenancy the tenant paid nine months' rates only, and three months' rates were owing and unpaid at the time when the year of tenancy with which they were concerned had begun on June 24, 1926. The tenant had paid these six months' rates, as he (his Lordship) had stated, on July 24, 1926. The result of paying the summer rates after midsummer quarter day was that the tenant made three half-yearly payments of rates in the tenancy year from June, 1926, to June, 1927, instead of two. Substantially, the question that arose was whether it was a term or condition of the agreement between the parties that the tenant should pay the summer half-year's rates before the midsummer quarter day. If he was at liberty to pay the summer rates either before or after the midsummer quarter day, it was plain that he would sometimes pay one half-year's rates in his year of tenancy and sometimes he would pay three. It was said, and truly, that if this course was systematically carried out, the tenant would obtain an advantage from the landlord which he would not obtain if he always paid the summer half-year's rates within the first half of the period, that was to say, before the midsummer quarter day. On that result was based the argument that if clause 2 (2) were read with clause 4 (6) of the lease, it would appear that the parties intended to provide against this contingency. The lease had to be read as a whole. First it was said that clause 2 (2) was a condition of clause 4 (6), that was to say, that unless the rates were punctually paid—it was said that "duly" was the same as "punctually"—there was no right to make this deduction at all. With that view he did not agree. He did not think that clause 2 (2) was meant to be a condition of clause 4 (6). He (his Lordship) observed that in clause 4 (1) the right of quiet enjoyment was made conditional on the tenant's performance of his covenants, but the other clauses were not. Then it was said that clause 2 (2) must be read as explaining and qualifying clause 4 (6), and that that sub-clause must be read somewhat in this way: "In case the total sum punctually paid in respect of rates and taxes shall exceed £125," or perhaps, "In case the total sum paid in any one year of the term hereby granted in respect of the rates and taxes for that year shall exceed £125." There was no doubt what was the plain meaning of clause 4 (6), if it were read alone. In that case the tenant was entitled to make this deduction from his quarter's rent. In his Lordship's opinion, clause 2 (2) was not meant to qualify or modify the plain words of clause 4 (6). The words of that sub-clause must be read according to their plain meaning. If the payment were manipulated by the tenant and arranged so that he could obtain an advantage over the landlords of making a greater deduction than he could had he paid punctually, the landlords would have their remedy in damages for breach of clause 2 (2). Should the local authority be so inconceivably negligent as to allow the arrears of rates to mount up to such an extent that there was more than £100 to be deducted, the landlord would have, or might have, the further protection that, as the deduction must be made from the next quarter's rent, it could not exceed £100.

Upon the whole, he (his Lordship) had come to the conclusion that the Court must read the words of clause 4 (6) in their plain meaning and that therefore the tenant was entitled to make this deduction. He had assumed that as a matter of fact these payments of rates had not been punctually made. He was not at all satisfied of that. All the payments were made well within the six months' period for which they were to provide. He was not affected by the decision of Leeds and Hanley Theatre of Varieties, Limited v. Broadbent (14 The Times L.R., 157; [1898] 1 Ch., 343), which was approved by the House of Lords in Maclaine and Others v. Gatty and Another (37 The Times L.R., 139; [1921] 1 A.C., 376), where, in the circumstances of that case, punctual payment was held to be payment on the first day on which the sum was legally due. He did not think that a covenant to pay rates punctually meant anything of that kind. But even if it should appear that some of these payments of rates were not punctually made within the meaning of clause 2 (2) of this lease, he thought that by the plain words of clause 4 (6) the tenant was entitled to make the deduction that he claimed. For these reasons the appeal must be allowed and judgment entered for the defendant, with costs, and the order against the third parties in favour of the defendant would be set aside.

Mr. Justice Talbot said that he was of the same opinion. The question was how much a tenant of premises let by a lease dated June 26, 1925, was entitled to deduct from a payment of a quarter's rent under clause 4 (6) of the lease. The intention, he should imagine, of that clause, was to apportion the rates as between landlords and tenant in this way : up to £125 per annum it was intended that the rates should be borne and paid by the tenant, and that any excess over that should be borne by the landlords. That, he had very little doubt, was the intention with which that sub-clause was framed. If one knew all the facts connected with this lease and with the building of which obviously these premises formed a part, one would find that these very same words were applied to terms beginning at different times of the year, and probably it was because the clause had to be adapted to a tenancy dating from midsummer that this point, which likely was never thought of at all by the parties when they executed this lease, had arisen. Shortly, the point was this : the lease provided that if the total sum paid by the tenant in any one year of the term thereby granted in respect of rates and taxes should exceed £125, then the lessors were to refund the difference, the excess over £125, and that if that amount was not refunded the tenant might deduct it from the next instalment of rent payable. The question really was whether the sub-clause was to be read according to what it undoubtedly said, that the amount, of which the excess over £125 was recoverable, depended on the time of payment, or whether it depended on the time at which the rates in respect of which the payment was made accrued due. According to the literal meaning of the words, it unquestionably related to the former. "The total sum paid by the tenant in any one year of the term hereby granted" were words that were unambiguous, and they were not made ambiguous by the words that followed : "in respect of rates and taxes." Read literally, these words meant, and could only mean, that the payment must be made in one year of the term, that was to say, in the period between one midsummer and the next, and that that payment should be in respect of rates and taxes. The first observation to be made with regard to the suggestion that one had, by some mode of construction, to limit the sum to the amount of rates and taxes which had accrued due in one year was that, if that were so, there was no reason that he could see for confining the payment to one year at all. It would have been quite easy, and would have carried out what was intended, according to that argument, to have omitted those words confining the payment to a year altogether. It had been sought to construe these words in a sense different from the literal construction, on two grounds. The first was by reference to the lessee's covenant, clause 2 (2) of the lease, one of the sub-clauses containing the lessee's covenants, by which the lessee undertook that he would duly and punctually pay and discharge all rates and other outgoings, including water rate. It was said that the due and punctual—punctual was the word on which stress was laid—payment of the rates was a condition of the right to have a refund, and the right to deduct under clause 4 (6) the payments in respect of which the refund or deduction was claimed. He agreed entirely with the judgment that had just been delivered, that the Court would require more consideration as to what was meant by the punctual payment of rates and what was meant by an undertaking to pay rates punctually in the covenant of a lease, before deciding that these rates were not paid punctually. Taking the case put before them by counsel for the landlords, where there was a clause restraining the calling in of a mortgage, and that restraint was made in terms conditional on the punctual payment of the interest, it had been decided that in such a case "punctual" meant "punctual." (See Leeds and Hanley Theatre of Varieties, Limited v. Broadbent (14 The Times L.R., 157 ; [1898] 1 Ch., 343.) Again, as appeared from the case of Maclaine and Others v. Gatty and Another (37 The Times L.R., 139 ; [1921] 1 A.C., 376), when it was once admitted that a contract to pay on a particular day meant that you were to pay on that particular day and not otherwise, it was absurd to suppose that if the word "punctually" were added that could diminish the precision of the obligation to pay on that particular day.

These cases were quoted, as he understood, in order that they might be applied to this case, and the only way in which they could be applied to this case on the argument for the landlords was that this right conferred upon the tenant, of deduction or refund in respect of rates, was conditional in the strict sense upon the punctual payment of the rates. No doubt that would have the result that was sought, namely, that if all the rates were paid punctually—if that meant on the date of demand—the position could not arise of more than one year's rates being paid in one year of the term. In his opinion, it was quite against sound construction to import here any condition of the kind. There was no trace in this lease that these two covenants were interdependent, and in his opinion it would be altogether contrary to sound construction to import so drastic a condition as that without any indication that it was imported into the clause relating to the lessors' covenants. Further, he thought that it was an exceedingly strong argument against that suggested construction, that one found in its appropriate place, in accordance with almost universal practice, that the covenant for quiet enjoyment which occurred in the same clause was expressly made conditional on the payment of the rents reserved and the performance and observance of the covenant, and so forth. There was no such condition applied to any of the other lessors' covenants, and he could not conceive why the condition should be applied without the appropriate language. Speaking for himself, in his opinion, there was no ground at all for qualifying the word "paid" in this paragraph by the words "duly and punctually" which occurred in the earlier part of the deed. He thought that it was a much more attractive contention that one must look at what he had described as probably the broad intention of the parties, and that one must qualify the words "in respect of rates and taxes" by the addition of some such words as "accruing due in any one year of the term hereby granted." The first comment on this was the one which he had made already—that, if so, there was no reason for confining the right to sums paid in any one year, and secondly, what was perhaps even more satisfactory, that if that had been the intention or were the intention—and it might have been—it should have been expressed. Nothing in the world would have been easier than to add to the words "rates and taxes," "accruing due in any one year of the term," or "accruing due in such year," or something of that kind.

When once one began to speculate on what parties might have had in their minds apart from what they had said, one got, as had been pointed out over and over again, on to very dangerous ground, and unless it could be shown that there was some absurdity, something which no reasonable parties in that position could really have agreed to, in the words as literally construed, it was far the safest and most correct course to adhere to the actual words. As to those actual words, there appeared to him to be no ambiguity about that clause. It was quite true that the consequences could be suggested, and indeed it was not only that they could be suggested, but they would very easily result, if this right were used in a particular way ; but restricting oneself within any reasonable bounds of probability, the consequences were not very serious —he meant the advantages to the tenant ; still, they were substantial, and he entirely agreed with what had been said, that he saw no reason at all for thinking that that, if it should be a danger, would not be met by the right of the landlords to recover damages for breach of the covenant punctually to pay these rates. It might be also that they had the other remedy of forfeiture, which was specified in the lease, but as to that he would not say anything. There were also other questions which might in certain events arise, and upon which he certainly would not be prepared to express any opinion without much further consideration—namely, for example, whether the right to refund was independent of and was limited to the right to deduct, and also whether, if the sum to be deducted should, though it was very unlikely that it should, be in excess of the whole instalment from which the deduction was to be made, it would be possible to carry on, as it were, the deduction to a future instalment. Those were matters which, although he did not think they were likely to arise, might conceivably arise, but it was not necessary or desirable to express any opinion whatever upon them. In his opinion, no ground had been shown for departing from the plain meaning of the covenant, and he agreed, therefore, that the judgment of the Mayor's and City of London Court could not be supported.

Leave to appeal was given.

Ship—Practice—Collision—Taxation of costs —R.S.C., Order LXV., r. 27 (29).

A collision between the plaintiffs' barge and the defendants' steamship resulted in damage to the barge and the death of one of her crew. At the inquest on the deceased bargeman the owners of both vessels were represented. Subsequently the plaintiffs issued a writ claiming the damage occasioned by the collision, but after a final order had been made against them to file their preliminary act they discontinued their action. Liability for the collision mainly turned on the question whether the barge was exhibiting a proper light. Therefore, before the discontinuance of the plaintiffs' action the defendants' solicitors had incurred costs in taking statements from independent witnesses, in paying those witnesses for their time and trouble in coming to give their statements, and in attending before the coroner. On taxation the Assistant Registrar disallowed these items of the defendants' costs, on the ground that it was a well-settled principle of taxation that a party was only entitled as against his opponent to incur such costs or expenses as would enable him to conduct his case at the stage which the proceedings had reached, and not to incur expenses in anticipation of matters which, as events turned out, never arose. On appeal to the Judge in Chambers,

Held, that a solicitor, in incurring costs, had to have regard not only to the ultimate trial of the action but to the necessity of being in a position to give proper advice to his clients and to place adequate instructions before counsel to settle the preliminary act, by which, in an Admiralty action, a party was bound ; that the costs and expenses in question had been reasonably incurred within the meaning of Order LXV., r. 27 (29), of the Rules of the Supreme Court, and the matter must go back to the Registry.

This was a summons to review taxation.

No counsel appeared on either side.

MR. JUSTICE BATESON :—This is a summons to review taxation. I have already intimated to the parties that I would review it, and at their desire said I would give my reasons in Court.

It arises out of a collision action. The collision was between a coaster and a barge in the Thames, which took place on December 30, 1927, near Horseferry Wharf. The coaster is a regular trader, and her owners are in London. One of the two men on the barge lost his life in consequence of the collision.

On January 4, 1928, an inquest was held upon his body, at which the owners of the coaster and of the barge were represented. The main question on the collision between the parties was as to there being a proper light showing on the barge. On January 7, three days after the inquest, the owners of the barge issued their writ against the defendants. On January 16 the defendants appeared, and on January 24 the defendants filed their preliminary act. The plaintiffs ought to have filed their preliminary act seven days after the writ, but did not do so. On February 10 a final order to do so was made against the plaintiffs, and on February 11 they discontinued their action.

In the meantime, the defendants, on being sued, had naturally sought for evidence outside their own crew, so as to test whether they had a good or bad case, and be prepared to meet the plaintiffs' case.

The defendants' solicitors found that two tugs had been in the vicinity and that their masters, and the mate of one of them, could give valuable evidence. They took statements, paid the witnesses for their time and trouble in coming to give statements a not unreasonable sum, according to my experience of days before the War, and copied out the statements for counsel to settle their preliminary act. They took the statements while the facts were fresh in the minds of the witnesses. In addition they also got copies of the depositions before the coroner, and of a police report.

The learned Assistant Registrar has disallowed all those items on the principle he states at the beginning of his Answers to Objections. He says :—

"It is a well-settled principle of taxation that a party is only entitled as against his opponent to incur such costs or expenses as will enable him to conduct his case at the stage which the proceedings have reached, and not to incur expenses in anticipation of matters which, as events turn out, never arise."

I do not know where that principle comes from, and if it is limited in the way in which he has limited it in this case I think it is wrong. Order LXV., Rule 27 (29), lays down what is to be allowed, and Lord Justice Atkin in the case of Société Anonyme Pêcheries Ostendaises v. Merchants Marine Insurance Company, Ltd. (44 The Times L.R., 270, at p. 273), dealing with this rule, says : "It was intended to sum up generally the principles upon which costs are awarded, and I cannot help thinking that if that rule were really rigorously applied by everybody—and by 'rigorously applied' I mean applied in all cases, giving full effect to the width of its language—there would be far fewer complaints brought by successful litigants than are brought at the present moment, because it is a rule which is intended to give to the successful litigant a full indemnity for all costs reasonably incurred by him in relation to the action. I think it says so in terms, that it is to allow 'all such costs as shall appear to him to have been necessary or proper for the attainment of justice.' That is the whole principle on which the Taxing Master has to determine."

In my view these costs were reasonably incurred in relation to the action. Farther on, when dealing with the facts of that case, and Mr. Simey's argument, Lord Justice Atkin says : "There was one other point which was raised by Mr. Simey, and it was this, that no costs can be incurred (that is to say properly incurred at all, as I understand him, in the action) until the issues have been determined (that is to say, have been defined) ; and he says that these costs were incurred before the defendants had delivered their defence or indicated what their defence would be. All that I can say is that that goes very much too far. That would mean this, that the litigant would never be entitled to recover any costs, save the actual costs of proceedings, until the defendant had delivered his defence, because until then the issues are not defined. That again does not seem to be the right view. The question is, in every case, what is the reasonable thing to do ? —and the Taxing Master is not bound by any such limit of time as is mentioned." Mr. Roscoe, at page 429 of his book, Roscoe's Admiralty Practice, says much to the same effect. My view is that the learned Assistant Registrar has felt himself bound in this case by a limit of time. What the learned Assistant Registrar says in effect, in his reasons, is that these costs were incurred in premature preparation for the trial, and were not necessary at that stage of the proceedings. In my view the trial is not the only thing to be looked at. The solicitors, in dealing with the matter, must be in a position to give proper advice, and if they can kill an action—as they did in this case—by collecting all the evidence that is necessary, I think it is quite proper that they should do so. The plaintiffs themselves saw one of the witnesses that the defendants saw (I think they saw him before the defendants had seen him) and they paid that witness the same sum as the defendants are charging in their bill. That was, of course, before they discontinued their action. Then the learned Assistant Registrar quotes the case of The Neck, which is not reported, and the facts as to which I am told cannot now be ascertained. It was a salvage action in which the plaintiffs apparently had taken a good deal of evidence which might well not have been taken, and Lord Gorell—or Mr. Justice Barnes, as I think he was then—disallowed the costs of that evidence, saying, according to the Assistant Registrar, that they were entitled, as against the defendants, to the costs of taking such evidence only as was required for the framing of the statement of claim. That case only refers to plaintiffs, and not to defendants. It may very well be that in that case it was proper to disallow the costs.

The learned Assistant Registrar goes on to say that all that the defendants required was sufficient evidence to enable counsel to settle their preliminary act. That, again, I do not think is right. In the first place, I think this evidence was necessary to settle the preliminary act. The preliminary act in an Admiralty case embodies the party's case. He cannot change it. If it is drawn on half the evidence it very likely will land the party in difficulties. It is essential to get up a case in Admiralty at the beginning. It is of no use to get independent witnesses, as they are called, after the other party has defined his issues. He may delay that for months. I do not think that any self-respecting junior would settle a preliminary act unless he had all the evidence before him that could be obtained, if he could avoid it.

I gather that the learned Assistant Registrar thinks that that is necessary for the solicitor against his own client, and for the life of me I cannot see why it is not equally necessary against the other party. I do not consider that it is over-caution or unnecessary, and I think it is everyday practice for solicitors to get this evidence, and it agrees with such little knowledge as I have, which dates back to work in a solicitor's office some 37 odd years ago.

He has allowed in this taxation a fee to a surveyor who was called in merely to attack the bill of the plaintiffs for their damage, if that ever came to be considered. Of course, in the early stages of this particular case that would never arise. Then he goes on to discuss the payment to these witnesses, and describes it as blackmail. But in my view witnesses of the class of those from whom statements were taken in this case were not unduly paid at the figures which were put in the bill of costs. If exorbitant fees are asked for it would not be proper to pay them. In some cases payments of this sort are included in instructions for brief—whether it is done in one way or another does not seem to matter—or they are allowed as sums paid, which I think would be the better way to do it, but they are the sort of payments that are generally made. Of course, they may be included in instructions for brief. What I have said covers the question of taking the statements and copying them for counsel, and payments to the witnesses for their time, but one of the other matters that was dealt with was the report of the police officer, which I think ought to be allowed—it is a very small sum—and also the copy of the depositions before the coroner. The last was a matter which I should have thought might well have been delayed, until it was known whether or not the case was going on. The parties had attended the inquest, and, of course, a proper fee should be allowed for that, but when they had attended the inquest, and had heard all the evidence, I doubt myself whether it would be necessary (I do not think it would) to get the details in full before the case was really coming on, or reasonably known to be coming on.

I think that deals with all the questions that were raised. For these reasons I think the matter must go back to the learned Assistant Registrar to tax on the lines that I have indicated. I think that covers all the points.

Leave to appeal was granted.

ROBINSONS, LIMITED v. RICHARDS.*

Motor-cars—Tractor and trailer—No person on trailer—Brakes—Trailer brake independent of tractor brakes—Brakes operated by driver of tractor—Locomotives on Highways Act, 1896 (59 and 60 Vict., c. 36), s. 7—Motor Cars (Use and Construction) Order, 1904, Art. III. (3).

By Article III. (2) of the Motor Cars (Use and Construction) Order, 1904, every vehicle exceeding 2cwt. in weight unladen drawn by a motor-car is required to have an efficient brake, and by paragraph (3) of the same Article is required to "carry upon the vehicle a person competent to apply efficiently the brake. Provided that it shall not be necessary to comply with this condition if the brakes upon the motor-car by which the vehicle is drawn are so constructed and arranged that neither of such brakes can be used without bringing into action simultaneously the brake attached to the vehicle drawn; or if the brake of the vehicle drawn can be applied from the motor-car by a person upon the motor-car independently of the brakes of the latter."

The appellants appealed against a conviction by the Stipendiary Magistrate of the Staffordshire Potteries District for an offence under this Article. They had a motor-tractor and trailer in charge of one man. The trailer had an independent brake operated by hand by the driver of the tractor, which had also a foot brake and a hand brake, neither of which was connected with the trailer brake. The lever controlling the trailer brake was on the opposite side of the driver from the lever controlling the hand brake of the tractor. The driver could apply simultaneously the foot brake of the tractor and the trailer brake, or the two brakes of the tractor. He could not apply simultaneously the hand brake of the tractor and the trailer brake without abandoning the steering-wheel.

Held (without deciding whether the "person" on the motor-car to control the trailer brake under the second proviso to Art. III. (3) must always be a person other than the driver of the motor-car) that the Stipendiary Magistrate had not misdirected himself in holding that the driver in this case was not able "to apply efficiently" the brake of the trailer.

This was a case stated by the Stipendiary Magistrate for the District of the Staffordshire Potteries.

An information was preferred on October 26, 1927, by Alfred James Richards, Chief Superintendent of Police, of Newcastle-under-Lyme (hereinafter called the respondent), under section 7 of the Locomotives on Highways Act, 1896, against Robinsons, Limited, of Knolls House, Bury New-road, Salford (hereinafter called the appellants) for that they, on September 22, 1927, unlawfully caused to be used upon a highway a certain heavy motor-lorry, which was then drawing another vehicle, to wit a trailer, in contravention of the provisions of Article III. of the "Motor Cars (Use and Construction) Order, 1904," and Article XVI. of the "Heavy Motor Car Order, 1904," in that, although the brake required by the first-named Order to be fitted to the said trailer could be applied from the motor-lorry drawing the same (independently of the brakes of the latter) no person competent efficiently to apply such trailer brake was upon either the said motor-lorry or the trailer.

The said information was heard and determined on November 4, 1927, and the magistrate convicted the appellants and fined them £1 and ordered them to pay £3 3s. special costs.

Upon the hearing of the said information the following facts were admitted or proved:—

(a) On September 22, 1927, a police officer stopped a heavy motor-car or tractor (hereinafter referred to as the tractor) upon a highway at Chesterton, in the said county, for the purpose of examining its brakes. The tractor was drawing another vehicle (hereinafter referred to as the trailer) consisting of a furniture removal van exceeding 2cwt. in weight unladen. Both tractor and trailer were the property of the appellants and were being driven by a man in their employ, who, in accordance with their usual practice, was not accompanied by any other person.

(b) The trailer was fitted with the brakes required by Article III. (2) of the Motor Cars (Use and Construction) Order, 1904 (set out below), but carried on it no person competent to apply the same, as required under paragraph (3) of the said Article.

(c) The tractor was fitted with the two independent brakes required under Article II. (4) of the said Order, but these two brakes were not so constructed or arranged that neither could be used without bringing into action simultaneously the brake attached to the trailer. The tractor brake system was not in any way connected with that of the trailer brake.

(d) The trailer brake was so arranged that it could be operated by a person occupying the driving seat of the tractor, independently of the brakes of the latter (proviso 2, Article III. (3)), by the use of a special handle or wheel placed near to that side of the steering-wheel which was opposite to the side from which the lever of the tractor hand brake was operated. There was thus a hand-operated brake lever on either side of the steering-wheel—one for the tractor brake and the other for the trailer brake. But no person (other than the driver of the tractor) was employed anywhere upon either vehicle to operate the hand lever which controlled the trailer brake. The driver of the tractor, whilst keeping hold of the steering wheel with one hand, could, by using his other hand to apply the tractor hand brake, at the same time using his foot to apply the foot brake lever, simultaneously and efficiently apply the two independent brakes of the tractor. Also, whilst keeping one hand on the steering-wheel, he could simultaneously apply the trailer brake by its special handle and the foot brake of the tractor. But it was not possible for the tractor driver efficiently to apply the trailer brake simultaneously with the tractor hand brake without taking both hands off the steering-wheel.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(e) As a result of this arrangement the trailer brake had to be applied or released as a separate operation either before or after the hand brake of the tractor was applied, if the driver retained control of the steering-wheel.

The following enactments and regulations were referred to during the hearing of the said information :—

(a) The Locomotives on Highways Act, 1896, section 6 (power of Ministry to make regulations as to use and construction of motor vehicles) ; section 7 (penalty for breach of any regulation so made).

(b) The Motor Cars (Use and Construction) Order, 1904 : Article III.—" No person shall cause or permit a motor-car to be used on any highway for the purpose of drawing any vehicle or shall drive or have charge of a motor-car when used for such purpose unless the conditions hereinafter set forth are satisfied—namely, (1) Conditions (2), (3), (5), and (6) of Article II. of this Order shall apply as if the vehicle drawn by the motor-car was therein referred to instead of the motor-car itself.

" (2) Every vehicle exceeding 2cwt. in weight unladen, drawn by a motor-car, shall have a brake in good working order of such efficiency that its application to the vehicle shall cause two of the wheels of the vehicle on the same axle to be so held that the wheels shall be effectually prevented from revolving, or shall have the same effect in stopping the vehicle as if such wheels were so held.

" (3) The vehicle drawn by a motor-car shall, when in pursuance of the condition lastly hereinbefore set forth a brake is required to be attached thereto, carry upon the vehicle a person competent to apply efficiently the brake.

" Provided that it shall not be necessary to comply with this condition if the brakes upon the motor-car by which the vehicle is drawn are so constructed and arranged that neither of such brakes can be used without bringing into action simultaneously the brake attached to the vehicle drawn ;

" Or if the brake of the vehicle drawn can be applied from the motor-car by a person upon the motor-car independently of the brakes of the latter ;

" Or (added by Motor Cars (Use and Construction) Amendment Order, 1925), where the vehicle drawn is by reason of construction, use or otherwise such that it is impracticable for a person to be carried thereon in accordance with this condition, if such vehicle is accompanied by a person walking alongside for the sole purpose of applying the brake when necessary, and if the speed of the motor-car drawing such vehicle does not exceed three miles per hour."

" Article IV. (2). He (the driver) shall not when on the motor-car be in such a position that he cannot have control over the same. . . ."

For the respondent it was contended :—

(a) The driver of the tractor was not the " person upon the motor-car " by whom the brake of the vehicle drawn could be applied from the motor-car, independently of the brakes of the latter.

(b) The regulation in the first instance required a special person to travel on the trailer for the purpose of applying its brake (Article III. (3) (supra)). If this was impracticable, the second part of the proviso to Article III. (3) allowed the position of the lever or handle controlling the trailer brake to be shifted from the trailer to the tractor as an alternative place for the person to apply it, but it did not contemplate that person being dispensed with and the tractor driver taking his place, merely by reason of this change of position of the operating handle of the trailer brake.

(c) If the driver, as well as operating his own tractor brakes and controlling the steering wheel, was to take the place of the " person " controlling the trailer brake, the conditions of this case were specially provided for in the first part of the proviso—that is to say, the brakes of both vehicles must be so mechanically interconnected as to secure that neither of the tractor brakes can be used without bringing into action simultaneously the brake acting on the trailer. In such circumstances the trailer brake was simultaneously applied, whether the driver used either his hand brake or his foot brake.

(d) The use of the word " simultaneously " indicated an essential condition when the driver alone was permitted to control the brakes of both vehicles. This condition could not be complied with in the case of the appellants' vehicle, where the application of the respective brakes could only be successive, unless the driver abandoned control of his steering wheel, in which case, particularly in an emergency, he might be held to commit an offence under Article IV. (2) of the Order.

For the appellant it was contended :—

(a) There was nothing in the wording of the last part of the proviso to exclude the driver from being the " person " to operate the trailer brake. " A person " meant any person and not the special person required—initially—to travel on the trailer under Article III. (3), who was dispensed with when the alternative condition contained in the second part of the proviso was complied with.

(b) In the case of the appellants' vehicle all the conditions prescribed in the second part of the proviso were fully complied with, and the trailer brake could be applied by a " person " upon the tractor independently of the brakes of the tractor. The proviso must be read in its literal sense and not as importing that the special person required under Article III. (3) to travel on the trailer (or by the side of it, as permitted by the Amending Order of 1925) must be present on the tractor to control the trailer brake lever in its alternative position on that vehicle.

(c) Except in the conditions necessary to satisfy the first part of the proviso, the Article nowhere stipulated that both tractor and trailer brake should be applied simultaneously. Except by chance, this could not be the case under the initial condition of paragraph (3) when each brake was in charge of a separate person, and there was no reason why such a requirement should be imported into the second part of the proviso. The expression " simultaneously " in the first part of the proviso only referred to the required effect of the interconnected brake mechanism.

The magistrate was of opinion that Article III (3) of the Motor Cars (Use and Construction) Order, 1904, was not complied with in the circumstances under which the appellants' tractor and trailer were being used upon the highway in this case—that is to say, where there was thrown upon the driver of the tractor vehicle, in addition to the duties of applying or releasing the two independent brakes of the tractor itself and also maintaining uninterrupted control over its steering wheel, the further duty of efficiently applying or releasing the brake of the trailer vehicle by means of a separate hand brake quite independent of and not mechanically interconnected with the brake system of the tractor, so that if and when an emergency required the simultaneous application of both hand brakes the steering wheel of the tractor must necessarily be released and left without control, with possible disastrous consequences. He was further of the opinion that Article III. (3) contemplated the operation of both trailer and tractor brakes by one and the same person only when the said brakes were mechanically interconnected in the manner provided by the first part of the said proviso. He therefore convicted the appellants of a breach of Article III. (3) of the Order, and imposed the penalty above mentioned.

The question for the opinion of the Court was whether upon the above statement of facts he came to a correct determination in point of law, and if not, what should be done in the premises.

Mr. Lionel Jellinek appeared for the appellants; Mr. W. T. Monckton for the respondent.

The Lord Chief Justice.—This is a case stated by the Stipendiary Magistrate for the district of the Staffordshire Potteries. It arises in the following way. An information was preferred by the present respondent against the present appellants under section 7 of the Locomotives on Highways Act, 1896, for unlawfully causing to be used upon a highway a certain motor-lorry drawing a trailer in contravention of the provisions of Article III. of the Motor Cars (Use and Construction Order), 1904, and Article XVI. of the Heavy Motor Car Order, 1904. The information contained particulars as follows: "In that, although the brake required by the first-named Order to be fitted to the said trailer could be applied from the motor-lorry drawing the same (independently of the brakes of the latter) no person competent efficiently to apply such trailer brake was upon either the said motor-lorry or the trailer." The learned magistrate having heard the case convicted the appellants and fined them, and the question for us is whether he came to a correct determination in point of law.

Now the material facts are that the trailer was fitted with the required sort of brake, but carried on it no person competent to apply it. The tractor in its turn was fitted with two independent brakes, but they were not so constructed or arranged that neither could be used without bringing into action simultaneously the brake attached to the trailer. The tractor brake system was not in any way connected with that of the trailer brake. More than that, "the trailer brake was so arranged that it could be operated by a person occupying the driving seat of the tractor, independently of the brakes of the latter (proviso 2, Article III. (3)) by the use of a special handle or wheel placed near to that side of the steering wheel which was opposite to the side from which the lever of the tractor hand-brake was operated. There was thus a hand operated brake lever on either side of the steering wheel—one for the tractor brake and the other for the trailer brake. But no person (other than the driver of the tractor) was employed anywhere upon either vehicle to operate the hand lever which controlled the trailer brake. The driver of the tractor, whilst keeping hold of the steering wheel with one hand, could, by using his other hand to apply the tractor hand-brake, at the same time using his foot to apply the foot-brake lever, simultaneously and efficiently apply the two independent brakes of the tractor. Also, whilst keeping one hand on the steering wheel, he could simultaneously apply the trailer brake by its special handle and the foot-brake of the tractor. But it was not possible for the tractor driver efficiently to apply the trailer brake simultaneously with the tractor hand-brake without taking both hands off the steering wheel," and to sum up those facts it is found as a fact that "the trailer brake had to be applied or released as a separate operation either before or after the hand-brake of the tractor was applied, if the driver retained control of the steering wheel." In other words, as the driver sat upon the tractor he had three brakes which he might deal with: a hand-brake for the tractor and a foot-brake for the tractor and a hand-brake for the trailer. If he wished to apply simultaneously the hand-brake for the tractor and the hand-brake for the trailer it followed that he must abandon for the time being the steering wheel. The Article provides, among other things, that "the vehicle drawn by a motor-car shall . . . carry upon the vehicle a person competent to apply efficiently the brake," but that condition is subject to certain alternative exceptions stated in the proviso, and in particular there need not be a person upon the trailer if the brake of the trailer can be applied from the motor-car by a person upon the motor-car independently of the brakes of the motor-car. When one sees what it is to which this proviso relates—namely, that a person is to be on the trailer competent to apply efficiently the brake, it is clear that the words "if the brake of the vehicle drawn can be applied from the motor-car" mean, can reasonably be applied, can be applied independently from the brake system of the motor-tractor itself. The learned magistrate, having examined the provisions of the Article, came to the conclusion that it was not complied with in the circumstances because "there was thrown upon the driver of the tractor vehicle, in addition to the duties of applying or releasing the two independent brakes of the tractor itself and also maintaining uninterrupted control over its steering wheel, the further duty of efficiently applying or releasing the brake of the trailer vehicle by means of a separate hand-brake quite independent of and not mechanically interconnected with the brake system of the tractor, so that if and when an emergency required the simultaneous application of both hand-brakes, the steering wheel of the tractor must necessarily be released and left without control, with possible disastrous consequences," and he was further of the opinion that the third paragraph of Article III "contemplated the operation of both trailer and tractor brakes by one and the same person only when the said brakes were mechanically inter-connected in the manner provided by the first part of the said proviso." With regard to that second expression of opinion it is not necessary for the decision of this case, and it may well be, at any rate it is conceded, that the person referred to in the proviso as a person upon the motor-car who may operate the brake of the trailer may also be the person who drives the motor-car. That question may have to be determined hereafter; it need not be determined in the present case.

With regard to the first part of the opinion expressed by the learned stipendiary it seems to me that he has made no error in point of law. He has correctly construed these rather difficult articles and the provisions in them, and he has applied his mind with a true view of the law to the facts of the particular design, construction and method of control of these two vehicles. In these circumstances, while not assenting to the suggested view that the driver of the tractor must not be the same person upon the tractor as the person who is regarded as a possible operator of the brake of the trailer, I think that the learned magistrate was right and that this appeal fails.

MR. JUSTICE AVORY.—I agree entirely, and have nothing to add.

MR. JUSTICE ACTON.—I agree.

PIPER AND OTHERS v. MARYLEBONE LICENSING JUSTICES.*

Intoxicating Liquor—Licence—Special removal—Refusal—Appeal to quarter sessions—Finality of decision—No power to state a case—Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910 (10 Edw. VII. and 1 Geo. V., c. 24), s. 29 (5).

The licensee and owners of refreshment rooms applied to the licensing justices under the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, for a special removal of the licence. The justices refused the application, and the applicants appealed to quarter sessions, the justices being the respondents. Quarter sessions allowed the appeal, but stated a case. The applicants took a preliminary objection that by reason of s. 29 (5) of the Act quarter sessions had no power to state a case. That subsection provides that on an appeal against the refusal of a special removal "the judgment of the Court of Quarter Sessions shall be final and conclusive for all intents and purposes."

Held, that the justices had no power to state a case.

The COURT upheld a preliminary objection taken by the respondents to this appeal, Mr. Piper and the Metropolitan Railway Company, and decided that quarter sessions had no jurisdiction to state a case on a matter arising out of section 29 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910. It was said that the practice of stating a case had continued for many years.

Amos Piper, the licensee, and the Metropolitan Railway Company, the owners, applied to the Marylebone licensing justices for a special removal of the licence of the refreshment rooms at Edgware-road Station. The application was refused, and the applicants appealed to the quarter sessions of the County of London, which allowed the appeals. The justices applied for a special case and when the case came on for hearing the present respondents took the preliminary objection that quarter sessions had no jurisdiction to state a case.

Mr. du Parcq, K.C., and Mr. Christmas Humphreys appeared for Mr. Piper; Mr. du Parcq, K.C., and Mr. Sidney Lamb for the Metropolitan Railway Company; Mr. Mitchell Banks, K.C., and Mr. Harold Murphy for the justices.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—This is a case stated by the Court of General Quarter Sessions for the County of London, and, as appears by paragraph 19 of the case, it was contended, inter alia, in the Court below by the then appellants that there was no power in the Court of Quarter Sessions to state a case. The subject-matter of the appeal was the refusal of licensing justices to grant a special removal of the licence of the refreshment rooms at Edgware-road Station. The matter, therefore, was one of those referred to in section 29 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910. That section provides, by subsection (1), that:—

"Any person who thinks himself aggrieved by the refusal of the licensing justices of any licensing district to grant a renewal, transfer or special removal of a justices' licence . . . may appeal against the refusal to the Court of Quarter Sessions for the county in which the premises in respect of which the appeal is made are locally situated. . . .

By subsection (5) of that section:—

"The judgment of the Court of Quarter Sessions shall be final and conclusive for all intents and purposes."

Those words are reproduced from section 27 of the Alehouse Act, 1828. The question, then, is whether the Act providing that the judgment of quarter sessions shall be conclusive extends to prevent the statement of a case for the opinion of this Court. In my opinion, that question is concluded by the judgment of the House of Lords in Kydd v. Liverpool Watch Committee (24 The Times L.R., 772; [1908] A.C., 327). That case in the Court below (23 The Times L.R., 624; [1907] 2 K.B., 591) turned on the construction of section 11 of the Police Act, 1890. That section, providing, as it did, for an appeal to the next practicable Court of Quarter Sessions, provides also that that Court may make such order in the matter as appears to the Court just, "which order shall be final." The question was whether that finality prevented the statement of a special case. The House of Lords unanimously decided that it did. Lord Loreburn, at page 331, speaks of the language of the section:—

"Where it says, speaking of such an order, that it is to be final, I think it means there is to be an end of the business at quarter sessions, and I am fortified in the view I take by knowing that the same view commended itself to the majority of the Court of Appeal, had they felt themselves free from precedents."

An examination of the judgments in the Court of Appeal shows that three at least of the Lords Justices expressed the view to which Lord Loreburn there refers.

The phrase there was "shall be final"; the phrase here is "shall be final and conclusive for all intents and purposes."

For these reasons, whatever the practice in some cases may have been, I think that a Court of Quarter Sessions has no jurisdiction in these circumstances to state a case. That such a case is an appeal is made clear by section 25 (1) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925.

For these reasons I think that the contention of the present respondents is right.

WILLIAMS v. JONES.*

Aliens—Hotel—Registration—British subject—Statement of nationality — Duty of hotel-keeper—Aliens Order, 1920 (S.R. and O., 1920, No. 448), Art. 7 (3).

It is the duty of the keeper of a hotel, under Art. 7 (3) of the Aliens Order, 1920, to require every person staying at his hotel, whether known to him to be a British subject or not, to sign a statement of nationality. If that statement shows the guest to be an alien the keeper must then require the particulars which aliens have to furnish under the Order.

This was a case stated by justices for the County of Brecon.

At a court of summary jurisdiction at Llanwrtyd Wells on September 8, 1927, an information was preferred by William Williams (hereinafter called the appellant) under the Aliens Order, 1920, against Thomas Sidney Jones (hereinafter called the respondent), of the Belle Vue Hotel, Llanwrtyd Wells, for that he on August 14, 1927, at the parish of Llanwrtyd in the said county, then being the keeper of certain premises to which the Aliens Order, 1920, applied, to wit, the Belle Vue Hotel, did unlawfully fail to require persons staying at the said hotel to sign a statement and furnish the particulars required from them under Article 7 of the said Order, which information was dismissed.

Upon the hearing of the said information the following facts were admitted or proved :—

(1) On August 14, 1927, there were persons staying at the said hotel.

(2) Such persons were not aliens but British subjects.

(3) The respondent had not required such persons to sign a statement and furnish the particulars referred to in the said information.

(4) The appellant had been furnished with the names and addresses of the British subjects, together with the numbers of the bedrooms which they occupied in the said hotel.

On the part of the respondent it was contended :—

(1) That the Aliens Order, 1920, and in particular Article 7 thereof in its entirety, must be considered in order to arrive at the legal construction of paragraph (3) (a) and paragraph (3) (b).

(2) That the respondent was not under any legal obligation to require persons staying at his hotel who were known to be British subjects to sign the statement and furnish the particulars referred to in Article 7 of the said Order.

The justices were of opinion that the said Order was part of the emergency legislation and that the respondent's contention was correct and that the respondent was not under any legal obligation to require British subjects staying at his hotel who were known to him as British subjects to sign the statement and furnish the particulars referred to in Article 7 of the said Order.

The question upon which the opinion of the Court was desired was whether the justices, upon the above statement of facts, came to a correct determination and decision in point of law, and, if not, what should be done in the premises.

Mr. Richard O'Sullivan appeared for the appellant; Mr. J. W. J. Cremlyn for the respondent.

THE LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—This is a case stated by justices, and the question which is raised is connected with an information preferred by the present appellant under the Aliens Order, 1920, against the present respondent for that, being the keeper of certain premises to which the Aliens Order, 1920, applies, he unlawfully failed to require persons staying at the hotel to do what that Order says they must be required to do. The justices, having heard the information, dismissed it, and the question for this Court is whether in so doing they came to a correct determination in point of law.

The facts are in a very short compass. There were on August 14, 1927, certain persons staying at the respondent's hotel ; in fact those persons were not aliens but were British subjects, and in fact the respondent had not required those persons to sign the statement or furnish the particulars referred to in the information. It is quite clear from the statement of the contentions and the opinion of the justices that the case made for the defence was, and was only, that the respondent (I quote the very words of the contention) "was not under any legal obligation to require persons staying at his hotel who were known to be British subjects to sign the statement and furnish the particulars referred to in Article 7." So the present respondent contended and so the justices held. They say : "We were of opinion that the respondent's contention was correct and that the respondent was not under any legal obligation to require British subjects staying at his hotel who were known to him as British subjects to sign the statement and furnish the particulars referred to in Article 7." At some date perhaps the point will be taken that the police have struck too soon and that the keeper of the hotel has not had a reasonable opportunity of requiring the signatures referred to in the article. No such case was made here, and any allegation of that kind is utterly and completely inconsistent with the case which was made—namely, that the respondent was not under any legal obligation to require his guests to sign the register.

The question, therefore, turns on the construction of this Order. I do not think that we are concerned with the merits of the Order or the merits of continuing the Order or the merits of the drafting of the Order. It may well be, especially when one comes to paragraph 3 of Article 7, that a slight additional clearness would have been given if the two matters dealt with had been dealt with the other way round. Paragraph 3 of the article provides as follows : "It shall be the duty—(a) of every person (whether an alien or not) staying at any premises to which this article applies to sign, when so required, a statement as to his nationality, and, if an alien, to furnish and sign a statement of the particulars required under this article." There are two quite separate things contemplated : (1) (which is universal in its application) that every person, whether an alien or not, staying at any premises of the kind referred to must when required sign a statement as to his nationality, and (2) having so signed, if he is an alien, he must, when so required, furnish and sign a statement of the particulars which are described in the article. The meaning, one would have thought, is sufficiently clear. Every person, whether an alien or not, must sign a statement as to his nationality ; when that statement is signed the information, true or false, is given, and if it appears from that information that he is an alien then the keeper of the house is in a position to proceed to the second duty, which is to require the particulars that an alien has to furnish. As rendering those steps and each of them possible, the article goes on to provide in clause (b) that it shall be the duty "of the keeper of any premises to which this article applies to require any person who stays at the premises to sign the statement and furnish the particulars required from him under this article," and also to preserve such statements for two years. It seems to me that those words are to be read singula singulis reddendo with what is contained in clause (a). The statement is a statement as to the guest's nationality, the particulars are the particulars required of him if it appears that he is an alien, and it is the duty of the keeper of any premises of the kind in question to require any person who stays at his premises to sign the statement. When he has signed the statement, if it appears that he is not of British nationality, then it is the duty of the keeper of the premises to require him to furnish the particulars.

Now the argument which was made in the Court below, an argument contained among the arguments made in this Court on the part of the respondent, was that "the respondent was not under any legal obligation to require persons staying at his hotel who were known to be British subjects to sign the statement." How can the keeper of premises know whether the persons staying in the hotel are British subjects? The article does not repose upon his knowledge or supposed knowledge; it requires a document, and if that document is falsely filled up by the person filling it up certain unpleasant consequences follow. But in order that the machinery of the article may work it is necessary that every person should sign that statement as to nationality. To exempt persons who are known to the landlord to be British subjects, that is to say, to exempt persons who, as the landlord thinks, are British subjects, might, of course, reduce the whole machinery of the article to nothing. At any rate, if that is what the article meant, it is not what the article has expressed. Mr. Cremlyn has been driven to say that the words "it shall be the duty of the keeper of any premises . . . to require any person who stays at the premises to sign the statement" really mean that it shall be the duty of the keeper of the premises to require some persons who stay at the premises to sign the statement, each person being a person as to whose nationality he has a doubt. That is not what the article provides.

I think, therefore, that this appeal succeeds, and that the case ought to go back to the justices with this expression of opinion as to the true construction of the article.

MR. JUSTICE AVORY.—I have entertained some doubt about this case in consequence of the form in which this information was laid against the appellant here. It charged that "he did unlawfully fail to require persons staying at the said hotel to sign a statement and furnish the particulars required from them under Article 7 of the said Order," and the contention which was put before the justices was that the respondent was not under any legal obligation to require the persons staying at his hotel, who were known to be British subjects, to sign the statement and furnish the particulars referred to in Article 7. I think the justices in this case have probably been misled by the combination in the information and in the arguments of the two matters—namely, the statement of nationality and the particulars which have to be furnished by an alien, for it is to be observed that a British subject is under no obligation to furnish the particulars which are there mentioned, and it may very well be that the justices in looking at the combination of these two matters in the information were misled into thinking that there was no obligation on the keeper of the house to require a British subject to make a statement of his nationality. I find myself unable to differ from the judgment of my Lord as to the strict reading of paragraph 3 of Article 7 of the Aliens Order, 1920, which in terms makes it the duty of the keeper of an hotel to require any person—and I cannot doubt that that includes a British subject—to make a statement of his nationality, and if the information had stopped there, charging that the respondent had failed to require persons staying at his hotel to make a statement of their nationality, I am not satisfied that the justices would have fallen into the error into which they did fall.

I desire to reserve the question whether it is the duty of the keeper of an hotel, in a case where persons arriving are known to him to be British subjects, to make his requisition upon them on their arrival or whether he may not do it at some time subsequent to their arrival. I agree, therefore, that the case should be remitted.

MR. JUSTICE ACTON.—I agree, without any doubt or qualification whatever, with the judgment that has been delivered by my Lord.

Court of Appeal. (Scrutton, Greer, and Sankey, L.JJ.) 1928. Apr. 23.

MERCHANTS' MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED v. LIVERPOOL MARINE AND GENERAL INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Insurance (Marine)—Total loss—"Immediate consequence"—Chain of causation.

The plaintiffs, having undertaken the reinsurance of a risk under a marine policy, reinsured their own risk with the defendants, the policies being subject to the following conditions: "In the event of the vessel not being at the place of destination on the date of the expiration of the policy the insurance shall continue in force till the end of the day when the vessel arrives at her first place of destination. If the insured object is in a damaged condition at the time when the insurance expires . . . the risk shall continue for the immediate consequence of such damage until the object without unnecessary delay has been repaired or sold." On the date of the expiration of the original policy the vessel was on a voyage and had not reached her first place of destination, and after that date and before reaching such place she grounded on a reef, but got off and proceeded. When she reached her first place of destination, it was found that she was badly damaged. There were no local facilities for repair, but temporary repairs were effected to enable her to proceed on her voyage to a place where she could be repaired. She then proceeded, but began to leak badly and had to be run ashore to prevent sinking, and was subsequently sold as a wreck. The original insurers paid as for a total loss, and the plaintiffs, having paid them, claimed against the defendants.

Held, that the loss was an "immediate consequence" of the damage caused by the original stranding and as the risk continued until the vessel was repaired with no unnecessary delay the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

Decision of Rowlatt, J. (44 The Times L.R., 312), reversed.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs, the Merchants' Marine Insurance Company, Limited, from a judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt (44 The Times L.R., 312) in an action in which they claimed against the defendants, the Liverpool Marine and General Insurance Company, Limited, under a policy of reinsurance dated March 9, 1925, effected on the Norwegian steamer Maradal.

The steamer Maradal was insured against marine perils for the period from January 1 to December 31, 1925. The insurers reinsured their risk with the plaintiffs and the plaintiffs reinsured their risk with the defendants. The policies were subject to conditions of which the two following were material:—

"In the event of the vessel not being at the place of destination on the date of the expiration of the policy the insurance shall continue in force till the end of the day when the vessel arrives at her first place of destination.

"If the insured object is in a damaged condition at the time when the insurance expires . . . the risk shall continue for the immediate consequences of such damage until the object without unnecessary delay has been repaired or sold."

On December 31, 1925, the Maradal was on a voyage from the Baltic to South Africa with a cargo of timber. Her first destination was Lüderitz. On the evening of January 9, 1926, before she reached her destination, she grounded on the Angra Reef during a fog. After a short time she was refloated and went into Lüderitz, her first place of destination. It was then found that she was badly damaged. There were no facilities for repair at Lüderitz, and a diver was sent from Cape Town, and temporary repairs were effected to enable the vessel to proceed to Cape Town. She started, but, though the weather was good, she began to leak badly again, and to prevent sinking she was run ashore on Possession Island. Subsequently she was sold as a wreck for £500. The original insurers paid as for a total loss, and the plaintiffs, as reinsurers, paid the original insurers and claimed over against their reinsurers, the defendants, who refused to pay. The plaintiffs accordingly brought their action.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt held that the loss was not an "immediate consequence" of the damage caused by the original stranding, because the chain of causation was broken when the steamer reached her first place of destination, which was a place of safety, and that, therefore, the action failed.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. Raeburn, K.C., and Mr. Simey appeared for the appellants; Mr. A. T. Miller, K.C., and Mr. H. Atkins for the respondents.

Lord Justice Scrutton.—This case raises a comparatively short point and one that is unusual in an English Court in this sense, that it does not turn on the ordinary rules applied by English law as to the consequence of perils which can be recovered under a policy, but turns on the application to the facts of this case of a particular clause in Norwegian insurance, which does not exist in English law. It is a fight between two English reinsurers, the subject of insurance being a Norwegian ship which was reinsured with the plaintiffs who reinsured their risk with the defendants. The original insurance was a time policy for a year, but there was incorporated in all the policies a continuation clause in case the ship should be at sea at the expiration of the policy, so that it would not be known what had happened to her. The continuation clause in this particular case is, "In the event of the vessel not being at the place of destination on the date of the expiration of the policy"—she was not; she was on a voyage from Europe to various ports on the South African coast beginning with Lüderitz Bay and ending with Beira—"the insurance shall continue in force till the end of the day when the vessel arrives at her first place of destination." The first place of destination was Lüderitz Bay, which is on the west coast of Africa, some 500 miles north of Cape Town. Then there was a further continuation clause, which is incorporated in the policy and in the reinsurance policies, and which is expressed in section 27 of what is called the Norwegian plan, which is something like the Institute clauses in English insurance policies, a set of clauses which may be included by referring to them as the Norwegian plan; and that clause, on the applicability of which to the facts in this case the whole question in this case arises, is this: "If the insured object is in a damaged condition at the time when the insurance expires and the damage comes within the underwriters' responsibility, the risk shall continue for the immediate consequences of such damage until the object without unnecessary delay has been repaired or sold." Now that clause assumes that damage had resulted before the insurance expired from a risk insured by the policy. So far, of course, the damage would be recoverable, or the costs of repairing it. But something is added. It is assumed that there may be further damage directly resulting from the damage which has already been caused after the date when the insurance expires, i.e., after the date of arrival at the first point of destination. The further damage resulting from the original damage is to be covered by the policy until the object without unnecessary delay has been repaired. So unless you can find that the vessel has been repaired or that there has been unnecessary delay in repairing her, further damage directly caused by the original damage which results from the original perils in the policy is covered. Now that, of course, is quite a different question from considering the applicability of the maxim Causa proxima non spectatur to the damage caused by the insured peril. You begin here with damage caused by a peril; you assume that that damage may cause further damage before the vessel is repaired, and for that further damage directly caused by the original damage before the damage has been repaired the underwriters undertake to pay. Now apply that to the facts in this case. Approaching Lüderitz Bay this particular vessel, the Maradal, grounded on the Angra Reef, and, grounding, was bumped for some considerable time on a rocky reef, with the result that her No. 5 after-tank was holed very considerably; there were large holes, and I should have thought that it was almost inevitable that a heavy vessel laden with timber bumping on a reef so as to make large holes in the bottom of her double tank would have strained herself and that it was extremely probable that her structure was weakened as well in addition to the damage caused by the specific holes which were made in the double bottom. She gets off and reaches Lüderitz Bay and lies in a place where she lies safely to this extent, that the pumps can keep down the water which is leaking through various places, not clearly ascertained, between her double-bottom tank and the holds of the ship. But there she is, and what is she to do? She is on a voyage; she is insured on a voyage which the time covers, a voyage she is making to Beira. She has a lot of cargo in her for other ports. Lüderitz Bay, I am quite clear, has no facilities for the repair of a vessel damaged in this way. Is it to be said "She is now in a place of safety. If she goes on pumping she will keep safe. Let her stay there; she is in a place of safety"? A place of safety for a ship does not mean a place where she will be shut out for all time from any commercial operations, and, because she can lie safely there, that she shall lie safely there without endeavouring to proceed. Obviously the thing every one has to consider is, how she can be efficiently repaired in order that she may continue her operations as a freight-earning ship; and everybody concerned in the case, though this did not include any efficient surveyors at Lüderitz Bay, because there were not any—every one concerned in the case at Lüderitz Bay and the underwriters' representatives at Cape Town who had been in communication with the original underwriters in Norway thought that the proper thing to do after the diver had patched her holes as best he could was to take the chance of her getting through to Cape Town, which is about 500 miles off. This Court has not the advantage of being able to look at the log and see in what weather she started, but she was tried outside Lüderitz Bay under steam, and everybody took the view that she could get through to Cape Town. The diver backed his opinion by proceeding to travel with her instead of travelling in a roundabout way by road. Again, not having the log, we do not know whether the weather got worse, and there was a controversy whether the wind she met with was force 8 by the Beaufort scale or force 4 by the Beaufort scale, because it is "4" in the log, and it is not known whether that refers to the Norwegian scale or the English Beaufort scale. She gets part of the way down and then she begins to leak badly. It seems to me quite clear that the reason why she begins to leak badly is that she has been damaged by the original grounding, with her strength weakened, and that in that weakened condition she was not able to stand the strains of a sea voyage. In consequence she has to be beached at a very desolate island a little to the west of Lüderitz Bay, and there is no doubt that, being beached there, she was a constructive total loss. How does that fit in with the terms of section 27? When the insurance expired the ship was in a damaged condition. That damage came within the underwriters' responsibility because it was occasioned by perils of the sea. The risk is therefore to continue until the object without unnecessary delay has been repaired. She has not been repaired and there has been no unnecessary delay. What is the risk which is to continue? The risk which is to continue is for the immediate consequences of such damage. Was it an immediate consequence of the damage done by the stranding which was continuing and had not been repaired that she was unable to stand weather which any ordinary seaworthy ship undamaged would have stood, and had to be grounded? In my opinion it was. Now, the learned Judge has come to an opposite conclusion for this reason, that he has imported into the clause a provision which is not there. He has said the clause is to be read "till the object is in a place of safety." But that is just what the clause does not say. The clause says that the risk shall continue for the immediate consequences of such damage until the object without unnecessary delay has been repaired, and it assumes that, after the damage has been caused and before the ship has been repaired, further damage may be caused by the original damage. That seems to me just to be intended to meet the case where a ship, having been damaged, has to be brought to another port to be repaired. That provision does not cease to apply because, on the way to be repaired efficiently, the vessel is in a place where she can lie in safety so long as she is not repaired, and at a place where there are no facilities for repairing her. For these reasons I think the learned Judge came to a wrong conclusion when he thought that the place of safety before the vessel was repaired was a matter to be considered under this clause. This view of the question which we have to determine, which seems to me to be the obvious and only question, having regard to section 27, turns on considering whether or not the English decisions of Reischer v. Borwick (10 The Times L.R., 568; [1894] 2 Q.B., 548) and Leyland Shipping Company, Limited v. Norwich Union Fire Insurance Society, Limited (34 The Times L.R., 221; [1918] A.C., 350), which do not deal with the same question at all but deal with the question whether damage is a proximate result of an insured peril, which is quite a different question, apply to the facts of this present case or not. But I only say this, that whatever one may have thought, if one were brought up in the old school of considering proximate cause, was the conclusion which should have been arrived at in the case of Reischer v. Borwick (supra) and the Norwich Union case (supra), since the House of Lords has given its decision, those older views must be taken as erroneous, and the result of both cases, and particularly of the case of Reischer v. Borwick (supra), seems to me to support the view I have arrived at as to the meaning of clause 27, although I think they are not decisions on the same question.

For these reasons I think the learned Judge's view that the vessel had got to a place of safety, and therefore that liability had ceased under section 27, is erroneous. This view relieves one from expressing any final opinion about the other point argued from the point of view of the appellants, which was this. The policies contain a prövision to pay as may be paid thereon, and that the settlement of the original company shall be followed. The original company has paid and has settled, and the appellants desire to argue, as I understand, by their leader, one point, which is: here is a settlement of the original underwriters; by their junior, two points: that there is also a provision under the clause to pay as may be paid thereon. Now, on the second point, 35 years ago Mr. Justice Mathew in Chippendale v. Holt (12 The Times L.R., 50; 1 Com. Cas., 197) decided, with the assistance of the argument of Mr. Simey, who now says he was wrong, that to pay as may be paid thereon did not cover a case where the original person paying was not under any liability to pay. I think myself it would be difficult to disturb that 35 years' old decision which has been acted on repeatedly ever since, but I mention that the point has been taken in order that the House of Lords, if it ever gets there, shall have the opportunity of saying whether it will treat Chippendale v. Holt (supra) as standing in its venerable antiquity or whether it should be reversed. It is not necessary for us, in the view we take as to the main liability, to express any opinion upon it.

For these reasons I think the appeal should be allowed with costs.

LORD JUSTICE GREER.—I agree. The appellants were the plaintiffs in an action on a marine policy of reinsurance, and they claimed against the defendants under the circumstances that the other reinsurers had paid and the original insurers had paid. Mr. Justice Rowlatt, in the Court below, dismissed the action with costs, holding that they had not brought the case within the words of the policy.

The material facts may be quite shortly stated. The vessel (during the continuance of the policy by reason of the clause therein) stranded near the entrance to Lüderitz Bay. Lüderitz Bay was one of her ports of discharge. Under the terms of the policy the risk continued till she arrived at a port of discharge. There was an additional clause to the effect that "if the insured object is in a damaged condition at the time when the insurance expires and the damage comes within the underwriters' responsibility, the risk shall continue for the immediate consequence of such damage until the object without unnecessary delay has been repaired or sold." Now it is clear, as applying to this case, that the words are not "the immediate consequence of the stranding," but "the immediate consequence of such damage." The further facts that seem to me to be material for this case are these, that there is no finding by the learned Judge that the shipowners, by her master, failed to take reasonable steps at Lüderitz to do such temporary repairs as might reasonably be supposed to be sufficient to enable the vessel to get to the nearest place, that is to say, Cape Town, where she could be efficiently repaired. I do not understand it to be seriously suggested that they did in fact fail to take reasonable steps, though it was hinted at once or twice in Mr. Miller's argument. It seems to me impossible, having regard to the facts proved in this case, to find that they failed to take reasonable steps to do such temporary repairs as would enable them to continue what is for this purpose an insured voyage by going to a place where the vessel could be properly repaired. Now, the clause says that until she is repaired—that means at such a reasonable place as she ought to be repaired at—the responsibility for the immediate consequence of the damage caused by the stranding is to be covered, and she is to go there without unnecessary delay. One wonders whether, if they had waited and had brought up surveyors and more workmen and more divers from Cape Town and had done some more repairs, and then immediately the vessel had stranded at Lüderitz Bay, what the respondents would have said. I can imagine they would have said: "This was unnecessary delay on your part; you ought to have patched her up sufficiently to enable a reasonable navigator to take her to Cape Town, and as you have not done that you have been guilty of unnecessary delay. Therefore you are not covered by the policy." I think the vessel when she met with this accident was still suffering from the damage caused by the stranding, and the water coming into her, and her consequent loss was the immediate consequence of the still existing damage caused by the stranding.

I only wish to refer to one authority, and that is the case of Reischer v. Borwick (10 The Times L.R., 568; [1894] 2 Q.B., 548) which, though not a direct authority on this question, is an authority which affords some guidance how we should determine the question we have to decide in this case. Lord Justice Lopes, in giving his judgment, says this, at page 553: "It was contended that the towing the tug through the water after the collision was the proximate cause of the loss now sought to be recovered. It was, however, admitted that this was a reasonable and proper act in the circumstances." It is said that the cause of the damage in the present case was the decision to take the vessel with such repairs as she had had to Cape Town. It appears to me, and it is now admitted to be the fact, that this was a reasonable and proper act in the circumstances. I also refer to the words in Lord Justice Davey's judgment at page 553: "The failure of the attempt to mitigate or stop the damage arising from the breach in the condenser cannot in my opinion be justly described as the cause of the ultimate damage." It seems to me that, applying these words to this case, it cannot be said that the failure of the attempt to mitigate the damage when the vessel was in Lüderitz Bay can justly be described as the cause of the loss of this vessel.

I think it unnecessary to say anything about the other part of the case that may possibly be argued elsewhere. It does not arise on the view to which I have come. I agree that the appeal must be allowed with costs.

LORD JUSTICE SANKEY.—I agree.

The only question which falls for determination in this appeal is whether the plaintiffs, on the facts of the case, have brought themselves within section 27 of the Norwegian plan of insurance, which reads: "If the insured object"—a ship in this case—"is in a damaged condition at the time when the insurance expires, and the damage comes within the underwriters' responsibility, the risk shall continue for the immediate consequence of such damage until the object, without unnecessary delay, has been repaired or sold." Now, no question arises, as there might arise under a clause of this character in certain circumstances, as to whether there has been any unnecessary delay in repairing her. The vessel was injured by taking the ground somewhat severely, if you look at the general average statement, at Angra Reef when she was making for Lüderitz Bay. Everything was done that could be done to get her to Lüderitz Bay, and when she got there the master immediately communicated with Cape Town, which was about 500 miles distant, and a diver and some four or five men with their equipment arrived and patched the vessel up. Personally, I do not think the question whether the vessel had arrived at a place of safety has very much to do with the case. Personally, I also doubt whether under the circumstances it could be said that the vessel had arrived at a place of safety. The real point for determination is whether the damage which was sustained by the vessel when she took the ground at Angra Reef was the immediate cause of her loss on Possession Island. I think that it was. Fortunately, we have not got to speculate here upon the meaning of the words "proximate cause" or to add anything to the numerous words which have been used to elucidate the meaning of it, such as "efficient" or "effective cause," "real cause," "proximate cause," "direct cause," "decisive cause," "immediate cause," "causa causans," all of which have been used in one or other of the cases to which our attention has been directed. All we have to decide is whether it was the immediate consequence of the damage. I am clearly of opinion that it was.

I also should like to refer, not because I think the construction of the words is important, but because of the facts, to the case of Reischer v. Borwick (10 The Times L.R., 568 ; [1894] 2 Q.B., 548), where Lord Justice Lindley, as he then was, says at page 551 : "It appears to me, however, that an injury to a ship may fairly be said to cause its loss if, before that injury is or can be repaired, the ship is lost by reason of the existence of that injury, i.e., under circumstances which, but for that injury, would not have affected her safety." Again Lord Justice Davey says in his judgment on page 553 : "The collision"—in that case the ship came into collision with a snag—"made the hole in the condenser, and the broken condenser was a continuing source of risk and danger." Here, too, I think the damage that was sustained by the tank and in the various parts on the port side to which our attention was directed was a continuous source of danger, and so the damage which she sustained was in fact the immediate cause of the eventual beaching of the vessel.

TILLING-STEVENS MOTORS, LIMITED v. KENT COUNTY COUNCIL AND ANOTHER.*

Revenue — Mechanically propelled vehicles — Duty—Petrol-electric vehicle—Electrical propulsion—Generation of electricity by internal combustion engine on vehicle—Rate of duty —Finance Act, 1926 (16 and 17 Geo. V., c. 22), Sched. I. (5).

A vehicle propelled by electricity generated by an internal combustion engine on the vehicle is an electrically-propelled vehicle within clause 5 of the First Schedule to the Finance Act, 1926, and is therefore subject to a lower duty than a vehicle mechanically propelled otherwise than by electricity.

The plaintiffs, Tilling-Stevens Motors, Limited, engineers and motor-chassis manufacturers, with a registered office and works at Maidstone, Kent, claimed (1) that the petrol-electric vehicle chassis, No. TS. 13 2426, Registered Mark No. K.O. 1404, and similar vehicles were electrically-propelled vehicles within the meaning of clause 5 of the First Schedule to the Finance Act, 1926, and were chargeable with licence duty under section 13 of the Act as such and not as vehicles other than electrically-propelled vehicles ; and (2) that they were entitled to repayment of all licence duties paid by them in respect of such vehicles over and above the amounts properly chargeable under section 13 of the Act on electrically-propelled vehicles.

The defendants, the Kent County Council, were the licensing authority for the County of Kent under the Roads Act, 1920, and were empowered to levy and collect duties on licences for mechanically-propelled vehicles.

The defendant, the Minister of Transport, was interested under the Roads Act, 1920, because the amounts for licences collected by the Kent County Council were payable to the Exchequer and the Minister of Transport became entitled to a certain proportion of the sums so received by the Exchequer.

On April 9, 1927, the plaintiffs applied to the defendants, the Kent County Council, for a licence in respect of a petrol-electric goods vehicle as an electrically-propelled vehicle and paid to the defendants £21 5s. 3d. in respect of the licence duty, which sum was the proper amount chargeable for an electrically-propelled goods vehicle of the weight of that vehicle.

The Kent County Council refused to license the vehicle as an electrically-propelled vehicle, and the plaintiffs, under protest, applied for and obtained a licence for it as a vehicle other than an electrically-propelled vehicle. They paid the defendants, the Kent County Council, a further £21 5s. 3d. in respect thereof.

Clause 5 of the First Schedule to the Finance Act, 1926, sets out the amount payable for licences made chargeable with duty by section 13, and divides the vehicles chargeable into electrically-propelled and other than electrically-propelled vehicles, the latter being thereby made subject to a licence for which the sum payable is considerably more than that payable for a licence for electrically-propelled vehicles.

The defendants, the Kent County Council and the Minister of Transport, denied that the vehicle was an electrically-propelled vehicle within the meaning of clause 5 of the First Schedule to the Finance Act, 1926.

One of the main manufactures of the plaintiffs was a petrol-electric vehicle in which a petrol engine and electric generator generated electricity, which was used in an electric motor to propel the vehicle.

Sir Arthur Colefax, K.C., and Mr. W. Trevor Watson appeared for the plaintiffs ; the Attorney-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Mr. C. Stafford Crossman, for the Minister of Transport ; and Mr. K. E. Shelley, for the Kent County Council.

Sir Arthur Colefax, in opening, said that the electricity was generated in the vehicle by a chemical re-action. Whether the electricity was generated in the vehicle or not, however, was not the criterion whether it was an electrically-propelled vehicle. There was no mechanical connexion between the internal combustion engine and the back axle, and the vehicle owed its motive power to the electric motor. If a vehicle derived its motive power from an electric motor it was an electrically-driven vehicle.

Mr. H. A. Gill, M.A. (Cantab.), and patent agent, was called by the plaintiffs and gave evidence that the petrol-electric commercial vehicles manufactured and used by the plaintiffs were electrically-propelled vehicles for the purposes of the First Schedule to the Finance Act, 1926.

The Attorney-General said that the question was what was the meaning of "electrically-propelled." The expression was used in a popular sense, as the Schedules to the Act of 1926 were not based on scientific examination. To be electrically-propelled the primary source of energy in the vehicle must be electrical, and one could not say that because the back axle was turned by an electric motor therefore the vehicle was electrically-propelled. The source of the energy here was petrol, which was the primary motive power, through the internal combustion engine.

Mr. SHELLEY for the Kent County Council adopted the argument of the Attorney-General and added a few words.

SIR A. COLEFAX replied.

MR. JUSTICE CLAUSON, in giving judgment, said that in popular language there was in these vehicles an ordinary internal combustion engine which produced the electricity which, in the electric motor, drove the rear wheels. The wheels went round because the electric motor made them revolve. That being so, the vehicles, in the popular sense, came within the category of electrically-propelled vehicles as it was impossible to say that they were not electrically-propelled, though it was true that petrol had some work to do. The plaintiffs had established that these particular vehicles were electrically-propelled vehicles within the meaning of clause 5 of the First Schedule to the Finance Act, 1926.

PEARMAN v. CHARLTON.*

Savings Banks — Nomination — Invalidity of form — Receipt of payment by nominee — Right of administrator of nominator to recover amount—Post Office Savings Bank Regulations, 1921, regs. 65, 66, 87.

One P., who had money to his credit in the Post Office Savings Bank, signed a nomination form by which he left the money to the defendant. The name of a witness appeared on the form, but P. had not signed the form in his presence as required by reg. 66 (1) of the Post Office Savings Bank Regulations, 1921. After P.'s death, as the form appeared on the face of it to be valid, the Postmaster-General paid the money to the defendant. The plaintiff, having taken out letters of administration of P.'s estate, claimed the money from the defendant, as money received by him to the use of the plaintiff.

Held, that the form was invalid, and the position of the defendant was the same as if he had received payment under a will afterwards held invalid, and the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

His LORDSHIP gave judgment for £676 11s. in favour of the plaintiff, Mr. William Pearman, who claimed that sum as money had and received by the defendant, Mr. Frank Charlton, to the use of the plaintiff as administrator of the estate of Mr. Percy Pearman, who had been a bar steward on the P. and O. liner Bonella.

The defendant pleaded that subsequently to the death of Mr. Percy Pearman he had received from his Majesty's Postmaster-General the sum claimed, being the amount standing to the credit of Mr. Percy Pearman at the Post Office Savings Bank account, in pursuance of a nomination form in his favour signed by Mr. Percy Pearman. The defendant claimed that the nomination was good and valid. Alternatively, he claimed that the nomination constituted a good and valid donatio mortis causa.

From the evidence, it appeared that on March 28, 1925, Mr. Percy Pearman had registered with the Post Office what purported to be a nomination form by which he left the money to his credit in the Post Savings Bank to the defendant. Mr. Kelly, whose name appeared on the form as a witness, said that the form had not been signed by Mr. Percy Pearman in his presence. Mr. Percy Pearman died at sea on April 15, 1925, and letters of administration of his estate were taken out by the plaintiff on September 1, 1926. After the death of Mr. Percy Pearman the Postmaster-General, in pursuance of the terms of the nomination form, which appeared valid on the face of it, paid out to the defendant the sum claimed.

No. 65 of the Post Office Savings Bank Regulations, 1921, dated September 30, 1921, states :—

"Subject to the provisions of these Regulations, a depositor of the age of 16 years or upwards may (on and after the date upon which these Regulations come into operation) nominate any person to receive any sum due to such depositor at his decease, but a nominator may not have more than one nomination in force at any time, Provided nevertheless that the Postmaster-General may in his absolute discretion refuse to accept or register any nomination."

By No. 66 of those Regulations :—

"(1) Every such nomination shall be in writing and shall be signed by the nominator in the presence of a witness, and shall be sent by post or otherwise to the Controller of the Post Office Savings Bank during the lifetime of the nominator.

"(2) Every such nomination shall be in the prescribed form which may be obtained from the Controller of the Post Office Savings Bank."

By No. 87 :—

"When any payment is made, or act done by the Postmaster-General or any person acting under his authority in accordance with the Savings Banks Acts and the Regulations for the time being made thereunder, the Postmaster-General and such person shall not be liable in respect of any claims on the part of any person in connexion with such payment or act, but any person may nevertheless recover any sum lawfully due to him from the person to whom the Postmaster-General has paid the same."

Mr. Bensley Wells and Mr. Theodore Turner appeared for the plaintiff ; the defendant appeared in person.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT, in a considered judgment, having stated the facts, said that he could come to no other conclusion than that it was a necessary condition of the validity of this nomination that it should be signed by the nominator in the presence of a witness. It was a testamentary document, and he thought it was as necessary that it should be signed by the nominator in the presence of a witness as that the provisions for the due execution of a will should be observed. As to that, he need only cite the case of In re Gunstan—Blake v. Blake (7 P.D., 102), where it was held that to constitute a sufficient acknowledgment, within section 9 of the Wills Act, 1837, the witnesses must at the time of the acknowledgment see, or have the opportunity of seeing, the signature of the testator, and if such were not the case it was immaterial whether the signature was in fact there at the time of the attestation, or whether the testator said that the paper to be attested was his will, or that his signature was inside the paper. So in this case he must hold that this nomination was not a valid nomination under the Post Office Savings Bank Regulations, as the signature of the nominator had not been made in the presence of a witness. And that was so although the nomination form when it reached the Post Office appeared to be valid and the Postmaster-General appeared to be justified in paying the money in Mr. Percy Pearman's account to the defendant. But such payment was made under the mistaken impression that the nomination form was valid and binding.

There remained the question whether the defendant was entitled to hold the money or whether the administrator of the deceased's estate was entitled to say that it was due to him in his capacity as administrator. He had considered the cases relating to wills and the administration of estates to see what was the position of a person who had received payments under a will which was afterwards pronounced to be invalid. He had considered more especially the reasoning in Fitzpatrick v. M'Glone ([1897] 2 I.R., 542). In view of the decisions and of the words in No. 87 of the Post Office Savings Bank Regulations, 1921, "but any person may nevertheless recover any sum lawfully due to him from the person to whom the Postmaster-General has paid the same," he thought that the plaintiff was entitled to succeed. There was no ground for the defendant's alternative contention that there was here a donatio mortis causa. The defendant's costs as between solicitor and client would come out of the estate.

MANSFIELD v. ROBINSON AND OTHERS.*

Agricultural Holdings — Arbitration — Costs — Preliminary agreement between parties — Agreement not mentioned at hearing — Discretion of arbitrator—Validity of agreement —Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923 (13 and 14 Geo. V., c. 9), s. 16, Schedule II., paragraph 15.

An agreement in regard to costs between parties to a dispute under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, made before an arbitration thereunder, is valid and enforceable, despite the fact that no reference to such agreement is made at the hearing.

Prince v. Haworth (21 The Times L.R., 402 ; [1905] 2 K.B., 768) applied.

This was an appeal from a decision of his Honour Judge Chapman, sitting at the Great Grimsby County Court, who had held that an agreement made between the parties to a dispute under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, in regard to costs, before an arbitration thereunder, was void.

The plaintiff, the Rev. Alexander Mansfield, was the landlord of an agricultural holding, and in April, 1925, he gave certain of his tenants, the defendants Messrs. Eddie, Hill, Charles and Edward Robinson, notice to quit in April, 1926. Disputes arose in regard to the compensation payable to the defendants under section 12 (3) of the Act. The dispute was referred to arbitration under the Act, and in default of agreement between the parties a Mr. Gorbett was appointed arbitrator by the Minister of Agriculture. The hearing of the arbitration was fixed for April 25, 1927, and before the hearing the solicitors representing the parties, as the result of correspondence, agreed (as the County Court Judge found) that the successful party should be entitled to costs as between party and party on the High Court scale, and that taxation should be made by the District Registrar. No reference to this agreement was made at the hearing, and the arbitrator, after giving his award in favour of the landlord, added : "I award and direct that each party shall bear their own costs of and incidental to the arbitration and shall pay one moiety of my costs of this award."

On demand being made for the costs payable under the above agreement, the defendants' solicitors contended that no such agreement as alleged by the plaintiff had been concluded, and that the agreement alleged was void. An action for the recovery of £94 2s. 10d., the estimated amount of the taxed costs of the arbitration, was brought by the plaintiff. The County Court Judge found that the agreement existed as alleged by the plaintiff, but that it was void and unenforceable in law, on the ground that section 16 and paragraph 15 of Schedule II. of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, placed costs within the discretion of the arbitrator. He gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiff appealed.

By the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, section 16 (1): "Any question or difference arising out of any claim by the tenant of a holding against the landlord for compensation payable under this Act . . . and any other question which under this Act is referred to arbitration shall be determined, notwithstanding any agreement under the contract of tenancy or otherwise providing for a different method of arbitration, by a single arbitrator in accordance with the provisions set out in the second schedule to this Act."

By Schedule II., paragraph 15 : "The costs of and incidental to the arbitration and award shall be in the discretion of the arbitrator, who may direct to and by whom and in what manner these costs or any part thereof are to be paid. . . ."

Mr. P. E. Sandlands appeared for the appellant ; Mr. M. F. Healy for the respondents.

Mr. SANDLANDS submitted that section 16 of the Act was a procedure section and nothing more (Lowther v. Clifford (42 The Times L.R., 432 ; [1927] 1 K.B., 130)). Costs could not be called "a method of procedure." By Order LXV., rule 1, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, the costs of proceedings in the High Court were placed within the discretion of the trial Judge ; yet Prince v. Haworth (21 The Times L.R., 402 ; [1905] 2 K.B., 768) was a strong authority for the proposition that the Judge's discretion did not interfere with the right of the parties to make their own agreement. The same analogy applied to these arbitration proceedings under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923. Paragraph 15 of the second schedule to the Act, which gave the arbitrator discretion over costs, did not contain any negative words, such as "notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary."

Mr. HEALY contended that, though the question of costs might have been withdrawn from the arbitrator, that course was not taken here. A party who took up an award to act upon it could not be heard to say that that award was valueless. A contract to take away the right of an arbitrator to award costs could not be valid, though a contract to supplement the award by saying that the costs should be on the High Court scale might be.

He referred to Walter v. Bewicke, Moreing and Co. (90 L.T., 409) and Farquharson v. Morgan (10 The Times L.R., 240 ; [1894] 1 Q.B., 552).

Mr. Justice Salter.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the learned County Court Judge at Great Grimsby, who found for the defendants in an action to recover money alleged to be due under an agreement. The question is whether the agreement is valid and enforceable in law. The learned Judge held that it was not.

The appeal raises a question of some general importance—namely, whether the parties to an arbitration under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, can make a valid agreement between themselves governing the costs of such proposed pending arbitration notwithstanding that the statute provides that the costs of such an arbitration shall be in the discretion of the arbitrator.

The plaintiff was the landlord and the defendants were the tenants of an agricultural holding, and certain differences arose between them. The only one with which we are concerned arose under section 12 of the Act. The parties proceeded to arbitration under the Act ; in default of their agreement the Minister appointed an arbitrator and he made an award. Before the hearing the parties made an agreement which the learned Judge found to be contained in three letters which he construed. It was contended that he had misread the letters. In my view he was entitled to find, as he did find, that the whole contract was contained in the three letters and I agree with his finding as to their meaning. [His Lordship read the letters and continued.] The learned Judge found as follows : "Having considered these letters I have come to the conclusion that they constitute an agreement between the parties as follows : (i.) That the successful party to the arbitration shall be entitled to the costs of the arbitration as between party and party ; (ii.) that in any event the costs shall be taxed on the High Court scale ; (iii.) that party and party costs shall run as from April 6, 1926 ; (iv.) that the costs shall be taxed by the District Registrar. Further, I find that the plaintiff is the 'successful party' within the meaning of the agreement and is entitled to have the agreement carried out unless the defendants are correct in their contention that the agreement is null and void and of no effect in view of section 16 of the Act and paragraph 15 of the second schedule thereto." I agree with the learned Judge's reading of those letters.

The arbitrator determined the dispute between the parties, which related to a question whether the tenants had been guilty of bad farming. The landlord was the successful party. With regard to costs the arbitrator said : "I award and direct that each party shall bear their own costs of and incidental to the arbitration and shall pay one moiety of my costs of this award which are as follows." Each party did pay one moiety. This action is now brought by the plaintiff upon the agreement contained in those letters to recover, subject to taxation, the costs which, in the event which has happened, were agreed to be paid by the defendants to the plaintiff, and the only question that arises is, as stated by the learned County Court Judge, whether that is an enforceable agreement.

One asks : Why is it not an enforceable agreement ? In my view it is not contrary to public policy ; there is nothing, as I think, illegal or immoral about it. It is said that it is rendered unenforceable by virtue of the provisions of section 16 of the Act, and of paragraphs 15 and 16 of the second schedule thereto.

Before I come to those points I may say in passing it might perhaps have been argued that this was not an arbitration under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, at all.

In the case of Lowther v. Clifford (42 The Times L.R., 432; [1927] 1 K.B., 130) section 16 was considered in the Court of Appeal and Lord Justice Scrutton expressed the view that that section was only a procedure section which provided that those matters of dispute for which arbitration had been provided earlier in the Act should be dealt with by arbitration according to the procedure laid down in section 16. It appears that the actual dispute now in question between the parties was not a dispute for which arbitration had been provided in the earlier sections, and it might therefore be questionable whether this was in truth an arbitration under the Act at all, but it was dealt with as such an arbitration and I do not base my decision on that ground.

The question is whether it is allowable for parties to an arbitration of this kind to make their own agreement in regard to costs. The arbitrator under the Act is not in the strict sense of the term an arbitrator, that is to say, he is not a person to whom the parties voluntarily refer a dispute and who derives his authority from their consent. They can select him but he is imposed upon them by the law and not by their own wishes. In the case of an arbitration in the proper sense of the word there could be, I imagine, no question that the parties in submitting their dispute to an agreed arbitrator, notwithstanding the terms of the Arbitration Act, 1889, which gives him a discretion in regard to costs, could make such agreement as they pleased about costs, but it is said that they cannot do so in this case where the arbitrator is imposed upon them.

I am unable to distinguish the position of such a so-called arbitrator from that of a Judge in this respect. It is true that this statute says, in prescribing the procedure for arbitrations, that the costs shall be in the discretion of the arbitrator, who may, if he thinks fit, give directions about costs, but I imagine that he is not bound to give any directions about costs. Mr. Healy admitted that if the arbitrator had given no directions about costs this would have been a valid and enforceable agreement, but he says that as the arbitrator has given a direction the agreement cannot be enforced. In fact the agreement was never mentioned to the arbitrator at the hearing.

As to the discretion of a Judge in regard to costs, which is given by Order LXV., rule 1, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, it is, I think, common practice that parties constantly make their own agreements in regard to the costs of proceedings in the High Court and County Courts and such agreements are perfectly valid and enforceable. I am not able to see why the same principle should not apply to an agreement of this kind.

The authorities seem to me to support the view which I am expressing. The learned Judge seems to have been impressed by the case of Gray v. Lord Ashburton ([1917] A.C., 26), but in that case all that the House of Lords decided was that the discretion of an arbitrator under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908, was not fettered or limited in the same way as the discretion of a Judge is in some cases, but was entirely unlimited. I am not able to see anything in that case which is inconsistent with the view that I am expressing. The case of Prince v. Haworth (21 The Times L.R., 402 ; [1905] 2 K.B., 768) is, as it seems to me, a very strong authority in favour of the appellant. In that case the plaintiff had propounded a will in a probate action and Haworth had propounded an earlier will. Haworth represented the interests of an infant. During the course of the proceedings a contract was made between the plaintiff, and Haworth, and the infant. It was agreed that, whichever of the two wills was upheld, the costs of the plaintiff and of the defendant and of the infant should be paid out of the estate, whether the Court so ordered or not. The Court pronounced in favour of the earlier will, that is, the will propounded by Haworth, and, on application made, refused to sanction the contract on behalf of the infant, and directed that the plaintiff should pay the costs of Haworth and the infant in the probate action. Notwithstanding that order the plaintiff sued to recover his costs against Haworth, and it was held that the contract was not illegal and the defendant was personally liable upon it.

Mr. Justice Lawrance said : "If all the parties to this agreement had been sui juris, can anybody doubt that they might have made it ? Either party might then have charged or mortgaged his interest, such as it was, in the fund ; he might even have conveyed it absolutely either to the party on the other side or to anybody else. There is a broad distinction between an agreement which tends to divert the course of justice and prevent it reaching its proper goal, and an agreement which merely regulates the rights of the parties after the course of justice has reached its proper goal. It is clear that an agreement of the latter kind is not, merely as such, void ; if it were, every judgment of a Court of justice would operate as a restraint on alienation of the property recovered. Then is there any special prohibition against a successful claimant to a fund or estate agreeing to pay out of the fund or estate, if and when recovered by him, the costs of the unsuccessful claimant ? It is said that Order LXV., rule 14*a*, makes such an agreement invalid. That rule provides that the costs occasioned by any unsuccessful claim or unsuccessful resistance to any claim to any property shall not be paid out of an estate unless the Judge otherwise orders. But that is merely a rule of practice, indicating what order shall, under ordinary circumstances, be made in proceedings before the Court ; it does not in any way affect the conduct of the parties after the order of the Court has been made. In other words, it is quite consistent with the Judge's order directing the costs to be paid by the parties that one party shall agree to pay the other party his costs, and pay them out of what fund he pleases. I come, therefore, to the conclusion that if the parties to this agreement were all of age there would be nothing to prevent them from making this agreement."

Mr. Healy relied in the course of his argument on the case of Walter v. Bewicke, Moreing and Co. (90 L.T., 409). That was a case in which there had been certain interlocutory proceedings and orders made therein in regard to costs, that they should be paid by one party to the other in any event and so forth. The action was subsequently settled upon the terms endorsed on counsel's briefs, "Record withdrawn. No costs on either side." It was held (dismissing the appeal), that after the settlement of the action the defendants were entitled to taxation and payment of their costs of the interlocutory proceedings which the plaintiff had been ordered to pay. The Court in that case merely had to construe the agreement which the parties had made and to decide what costs it covered and what costs it did not, but, in the course of giving judgment, Lord Collins, Master of the Rolls, said : "It appears to me that there is no ground whatever for this appeal. During the progress of the action orders were made that the plaintiff should pay costs to the defendants, in some cases 'in any event.' Those orders cannot be got rid of unless the parties have clearly agreed that those costs shall not be paid." It is therefore quite clear that the learned Master of the Rolls was of opinion that notwithstanding the orders which had been made the parties could, if they liked, by agreement have overridden those orders.

With regard to Farquharson v. Morgan (10 The Times L.R., 240 ; [1894] 1 Q.B., 552), to which we were referred, it appears to me there is nothing to assist us in that case. That was a case of prohibition. There was an error in law on the face of the award, and the Court of Appeal decided that they had no power to refuse prohibition.

As the matter that is relied upon here is the provision in section 16 of the Act giving discretion to the arbitrator in the matter of costs, I think it well to refer again and more fully to the observations of Lord Justice Scrutton in Lowther v. Clifford (supra, at p. 143). In the course of a review of the statute the learned Lord Justice says : "So far, the Act has been establishing a series of rights to compensation which did not exist at common law, and the amount of which, with matters incidental thereto, has already been expressly directed to be referred to arbitration. One does not see, therefore, why it was necessary to refer them again to arbitration by section 16 ; but one can see why, if it was not intended to proceed under the Arbitration Act, section 16 was wanted to provide the method of arbitration, and of appeal, if any, therefrom. Section 16 does refer the matters it deals with to the arbitration of a single arbitrator according to the provisions of the second schedule, and does exclude the operation of the Arbitration Act, 1889, and does provide an appeal by way of special case to the County Court, and thence to the Court of Appeal. This forces on one's attention the possible construction that the questions and differences dealt with are only those on rights created by the Act and already by the Act referred to arbitration, and that the section is a procedure section providing how questions by other sections of the Act referred to arbitration are to be decided—namely, by a single arbitrator according to the second schedule. The framework of the section would then be 'Any question or difference (as described in detail) which under this Act is referred to arbitration shall be determined by a single arbitrator,' and so on."

The result in my view is that the learned Judge was in error in holding that this was a void and unenforceable agreement. I can see no reason on principle and I can see nothing in authority to guide one to that conclusion. I think that these parties were quite entitled to make this agreement, and it is an enforceable agreement. The appeal must be allowed, and judgment entered accordingly.

Mr. Justice Talbot.—I am of the same opinion, and I have very little to add.

The parties to this proceeding being in difference whether any compensation was payable by the plaintiff to the defendants in respect of one of the matters dealt with by the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, came, before the arbitration was heard, in pursuance of the statute, to an agreement. The question has been raised here and was raised in the County Court what that agreement meant, but, looking, as we are bound to look, at the three letters in which the learned Judge found as a fact the agreement was contained, I confess I can see no ambiguity or obscurity in the agreement at all. I find it very difficult to believe that both the professional gentlemen, the solicitors for the parties, who made this agreement in writing, were not fully aware of what was being agreed.

The agreement, putting it very shortly, was that whatever the issue of the arbitration was, that is to say, whichever party won, and whether or not the arbitrator made any order in regard to costs, or whatever order he did make, the unsuccessful party should pay the costs of the successful party on the High Court scale as between party and party, to be taxed on that footing by the District Registrar. If I had any doubt at all what that agreement means, I think my mind would be completely set at rest by knowing that the fact was that, in pursuance of it, and in reliance on it, both parties when they came before the arbitrator addressed no argument whatever to him on the subject of costs. Now that is a rational and businesslike agreement; the parties, in regard to costs, know exactly where they are and the position as between them is settled upon what in 19 cases out of 20 is a fair and reasonable basis—namely, that the party who succeeds on the issue between them should have his costs paid by the party who fails.

Those who made this agreement knew, no doubt, perfectly well that agreements with regard to costs are constantly made in all forms of proceedings before the hearing takes place, and they knew also what the statute said with regard to costs and they contracted undoubtedly having both those matters in view.

It appears to me to require something very definite indeed in the Act of Parliament to lead us to the conclusion to which the learned County Court Judge, in his very clear judgment, came, that this agreement is unenforceable in law. The argument is, and the ground upon which he decided is, that under the Act and in the schedule to the Act which deals with this matter the costs of and incidental to the arbitration and award are placed in the discretion of the arbitrator and he is given power, in what I may almost call common form, to direct, if he thinks fit, by whom and in what manner the costs are to be paid. There are provisions for taxation and there are provisions relating to what he is to take into consideration in awarding costs, and as has been decided in the House of Lords his discretion is, in point of fact, practically unlimited.

It appears to me, in the absence of any words even tending to suggest that that is the result of it, it is impossible to say that because of the discretion conferred upon the arbitrator and the incidental powers given to him for the exercise of that discretion it is beyond the powers of the parties to come to such an agreement as this. It is true, no doubt, that in the great majority of cases where parties have made an agreement in regard to costs they inform the tribunal of it so as to save the tribunal the trouble of going into the question, but assuming that it is within the competence of the parties to make an agreement I cannot conceive how they can be under any legal obligation to communicate their agreement to the arbitrator. I cannot help thinking, having read the evidence, which appears to have been uncontradicted, before the learned County Court Judge, that it is tolerably clear why both parties, while the event was yet uncertain, thought it far more satisfactory to make this agreement, which could not do substantial injustice, instead of leaving the matter to the uncontrolled discretion of the arbitrator. It was tolerably evident that the arbitrator, no doubt from motives which are perfectly intelligible, and perfectly proper in one sense, might make an order which the successful party might consider very unfair to him, and make such order not because of anything special in the circumstances of this particular case but because of some general practice which is not uncommon amongst lay arbitrators.

I think that the defendants have altogether failed to show there is anything illegal in this agreement or anything which violates the terms of the statute.

I have nothing to add to what has already been said in the judgment which has been delivered with regard to the case generally or with regard to the authorities which have been cited. I entirely agree with all that has been said. I agree, therefore, with the conclusion that the judgment of the learned Judge in the County Court cannot stand, and this appeal must be allowed.

IN RE BLACKWELL—BLACKWELL v. BLACKWELL.*

Will—Legacy—Secret trust—Parol evidence—Admissibility—Acceptance of trust—Validity.

A testator made a codicil bequeathing £12,000 to five of his friends upon trust "for the purposes indicated" by him to them. One of the five friends prepared the codicil, upon the testator's oral instructions, and on the same day made a note of the terms of the trust in a written memorandum; those terms were communicated to all the other trustees and they accepted the trust. The testator's residuary legatees contended that parol evidence could not be given to explain the trust, as this was in fact an infringement of the provisions of the Wills Act, 1837, by which all testamentary documents must be in writing. Eve, J., held that by the decision in In re Fleetwood—Sidgreaves v. Brewer (15 Ch.D., 594) such evidence was admissible, and that the trust was valid.

Held, on appeal, that the decision upon that particular point in In re Fleetwood (supra) had been affirmed by the Court of Appeal in In re Huxtable—Huxtable v. Crawfurd ([1902] 2 Ch., 793). The evidence was therefore admissible and the appeal failed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Eve. The late J. D. Blackwell, by his will dated January 1, 1925, gave his residue in trust for his widow and son. There were four codicils to his will, and by the fourth he bequeathed the sum of £12,000 to five friends upon trust "for the purposes indicated" by the testator to them, and, being physically, though not mentally, unfit at the time he executed the codicil by making his mark. The codicil had been prepared upon the testator's oral instructions by one of the five trustees, Mr. W. P. Cowley, and the same day Mr. Cowley wrote out and signed a memorandum of the details of the trust as follows: "Income of £12,000 to be given to" (then followed a lady's name and full address) "or applied at discretion of trustees for the benefit of herself and her son" (his full name followed). "At any time trustees may pay over £8,000 capital either to her or her son or both of them. In such event £4,000 is to go back to the testator's trustees on same trusts as his residuary estate." Notice of the effect of the trusts was given by the testator to the other four trustees, and they declared their willingness to act. The testator died on June 3, 1925.

His widow and son brought this action. By their statement of claim it was alleged that no trusts of the legacy of £12,000 were ever indicated to the five trustees or any of them in writing or orally before the death of the testator. The plaintiffs had received in 1926 a copy of the memorandum, but asserted that they could not get any further information as to any directions given by the testator, and submitted that if any such had been given they were void for uncertainty or inconsistency. The plaintiffs accordingly claimed a declaration that the trusts of the £12,000 were invalid. The defendants, the five trustees and the persons entitled to benefit under the trusts of £12,000, contended that the trusts were declared in detail to one trustee and in outline to all the others, and should be carried out. Witnesses gave evidence on either side. The plaintiffs submitted that parol evidence was not admissible to vary the terms of a written will. Mr. Justice Eve held that the codicil, the memorandum, and the evidence of the five trustees established a valid trust, the only question being as to whether such evidence were admissible. He thought that its admissibility was established by In re Fleetwood—Sidgreaves v. Brewer (15 Ch.D., 594) and dismissed the action. The plaintiffs appealed.

Sir Thomas Hughes, K.C., and Mr. J. M. Easton, for the plaintiffs, contended that if parol evidence of the terms of a will and codicil were admitted it would be going behind the express provisions of the Wills Act, 1837, by which every testamentary disposition must be in writing. In re Fleetwood (supra) was not binding upon the present Court. Even if the principle of that case were right, the evidence must be clear and unambiguous, but the evidence in the present case was not. In re Gardner—Huey v. Cunnington (36 The Times L.R., 784; [1920] 2 Ch., 523) was a case of clear evidence to vary the terms of a will. Counsel referred to In re Huxtable—Huxtable v. Crawfurd ([1902] 2 Ch., 793), In re Hetley—Hetley v. Hetley ([1902] 2 Ch., 866), and McCormick v. Grogan (L.R., 4 H.L., 82).

Mr. Gavin Simonds, K.C., and Mr. John Bennett, for the five trustees, and Mr. C. A. Bennett, K.C., and Mr. Raymond Jennings, for the beneficiaries under the trusts of £12,000, were not called upon to argue.

The Master of the Rolls, after stating the facts, said that by the terms of section 9 of the Wills Act, 1837, "No will shall be valid unless it shall be in writing and executed in manner hereinafter mentioned." The Court must therefore consider carefully whether if it were necessary to supplement the codicil it would be possible to look at the memorandum made by Mr. Cowley. The codicil itself did not identify the two beneficiaries, and if the Court looked at the parol evidence of what was contained in the memorandum it was in effect supplementing the codicil, and that in spite of the terms of section 9. In support of that view it was argued that in the case of McCormick v. Grogan (L.R., 4 H.L., 82) it had been said that when secret instructions had been given to a legatee, and those instructions had been communicated to him by the testator, the Court, in order to avoid fraud, would enforce those instructions; but that that only applied in very exceptional cases, and in cases where a fraud was to be avoided. In McCormick's case (supra) Lord Hatherley said, at page 89: "But this doctrine evidently requires to be carefully restricted within proper limits. It is in itself a doctrine which involves a wide departure from the policy which induced the Legislature to pass the Statute of Frauds, and it is only in clear cases of fraud that this doctrine has been applied—cases in which the Court has been persuaded that there has been a fraudulent inducement held out on the part of the apparent beneficiary in order to lead the testator to confide to him the duty which he so undertook to perform." Lord Westbury also said that it was in cases of fraud that the Court would allow parol evidence to be given. The appellants in the present case contended that if the Court were to look at the memorandum, or, to put it in another way, were to allow the parol evidence of Mr. Cowley to be received, it would be enlarging the principle so laid down by the House of Lords, particularly as in the present case no fraud was alleged.

There was, however, a case in which parol evidence had been admitted, and that was In re Fleetwood—Sidgreaves v. Brewer (15 Ch. D., 594). That decision, given in 1880, had stood for 48 years. It was said that it had been criticized, but Mr. Justice Eve had followed it in the present case, and the effect of this appeal was really to bring the question of the validity of the decision in In re Fleetwood (supra) before the Court of Appeal. In his (Lord Hanworth's) opinion, however, the Court was concluded in its decision by what was said by the Court of Appeal in In re Huxtable—Huxtable v. Crawfurd ([1902] 2 Ch., 793). There parol evidence was tendered which left a legacy restricted in its purpose and scope. Mr. Justice Farwell thought that he was bound to follow In re Fleetwood (supra), and accepted the evidence. In re Huxtable (supra) went to the Court of Appeal, and Lord Justice Vaughan Williams said ([1902] 2 Ch. at p. 795): "I cannot doubt that the affidavit of Mr. Crawfurd is admissible in evidence, but it is admissible only for the purpose of proving matters which are not defined by the will." Lord Justice Stirling said (at p. 797): "In my opinion, that affidavit is admissible only for the purpose of ascertaining what are the charitable purposes which are referred to in the will, and no further." Lord Justice Cozens-Hardy also said that the affidavit might be referred to for that purpose. It seemed clear from the report of the case that the Court had before it the decision of Mr. Justice Farwell, who would not have admitted the evidence except for the authority of In re Fleetwood (supra), and it appeared to him (the Master of the Rolls) that the Court of Appeal must also have determined to follow the authority of In re Fleetwood (supra) in admitting the evidence which restricted the legacy given to charitable purposes.

To him (Lord Hanworth) it appeared, therefore, impossible for the present Court not to hold that it was bound by In re Huxtable (supra), which had in effect upheld In re Fleetwood (supra). A strong case might be put before the House of Lords on the basis of the Wills Act, 1837, and what was said in McCormick v. Grogan (supra); but inasmuch as the decision in In re Fleetwood (supra) had stood for 48 years, it would appear to be a serious inroad upon practice and existing law if the case were upset and rejected. This appeal must therefore be dismissed with costs.

LORD JUSTICE LAWRENCE said that, in his judgment, the decision of the Court of Appeal in In re Huxtable ([1902] 2 Ch., 793) was a direct affirmation of the principle laid down in In re Fleetwood (15 Ch. D., 594), and none the less so because that case was not in terms mentioned in the judgments of the members of the Court. The judgment of Mr. Justice Farwell, founded on the admissibility of the evidence because of the decision in In re Fleetwood (supra), was before the Court of Appeal, and that Court in express terms decided that so much of the evidence as did not contradict the terms of the will was admissible, and made a declaration based on such evidence.

Cases had been referred to in which the soundness of the decision in In re Fleetwood (supra) was said to have been criticized, but those cases, in his (Lord Justice Lawrence's) view, did not afford any ground for holding that the principle of In re Fleetwood (supra) was not binding upon the present Court after the decision in In re Huxtable (supra). He agreed that the appeal failed.

LORD JUSTICE RUSSELL agreed, and said that he was quite satisfied that in In re Huxtable ([1902] 2 Ch., 793) the Court of Appeal had deliberately adopted the principle which appeared in In re Fleetwood (15 Ch. D., 594).

K.B. Div. (Salter and Talbot, JJ.) 1928. Apr. 25.

GRINHAM AND ANOTHER v. DAVIES.*

Negligence—Practice—Personal injuries—Defendant insured—Statement of that fact to the jury—Discharge of jury—Discretion of Judge.

On the trial by a Judge and jury of an action for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by negligence the jury should not be informed by or on behalf of the plaintiff that the defendant is insured. If this rule is violated, the Judge has a discretion to order the jury to be discharged.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from an order of his Honour Judge Cluer, who had directed a jury summoned to the Shoreditch County Court for the trial of a street accident case to be discharged and the case to be tried by a fresh jury on the ground that it had been intimated to the jury by counsel for the plaintiffs that the defendant was insured.

Mr. J. Watson Moyses appeared for the appellants; Serjeant Sullivan, K.C., and Mr. B. D. A. Leverson for the respondent.

MR. MOYSES stated that the Judge had discharged the jury because the first few words of a letter, which referred to a company, had been read by him (Mr. Moyses), and because the jury could thereby easily draw the inference that the defendant was insured. In his recollection, however, he had not read the letter in question. He did not deny that, if the fact that the defendant was insured had been mentioned to the jury, it was within the discretion of the Judge to discharge them. He submitted, however, that in this case nothing had occurred which justified the Judge in adopting that course.

MR. LEVERSON stated that he was in the Court below, and that, to the best of his recollection, some portion of the letter in question had been read by Mr. Moyses, but he did not believe that there had been any specific reference to an insurance company.

MR. JUSTICE SALTER asked Serjeant Sullivan if there was any reported case where a Judge had discharged a jury on the ground in question.

SERJEANT SULLIVAN referred to Gowar v. Hales ([1928] 1 K.B., 191), in which it was stated that in an unreported case, tried before the Lord Chief Justice and a jury, that course had been taken. That was a case of Ellis v. Mayhew, Limited, tried on March 24, 1926.

MR. JUSTICE SALTER stated that he had seen the Associate's note of Ellis v. Mayhew, Limited, which was begun with a special jury. In a letter read by counsel for the plaintiff in the course of the opening of that case the word "assured" occurred. The Lord Chief Justice pointed out that the letter should not be read because the jury would infer that the parties were insured. Counsel for the defendants then applied that the case should be withdrawn from the jury and tried before another jury. In the absence of authority the application was refused by the Lord Chief Justice, who suggested that the jury might be discharged from the case and that he might try the case alone. Both counsel consented to that course, and the case proceeded as a "non-jury by consent."

In giving judgment MR. JUSTICE SALTER said: This is an appeal from the Shoreditch County Court which raises a question of some practical importance in these days, when the Courts are full of cases of claims for damages for personal injuries in connexion with driving. Indeed, it may be said that cases of this sort are the staple litigation of to-day. The present case is one of that kind, and arises from a street accident. The defendant was in fact insured, and in the course of opening the case counsel for the plaintiffs either did or did not convey to the jury the information that the defendant was insured; but the learned Judge understood him to convey that information, and ordered that the jury should be discharged, and that the matter should be tried before a fresh jury, the costs thrown away at that hearing to be the defendant's. From that order the plaintiffs appeal, and the questions are whether this information was in fact conveyed to the jury, and if it was, whether this Court ought to set aside the order of the county court Judge.

It is convenient to consider the latter question first. It is, in my opinion, a settled rule of practice in cases of this kind that the jury shall not be informed by or on behalf of the plaintiff that the defendant is insured. The rule is, of course, not universal, but it is well established in cases of this kind, and is obviously fair, inasmuch as one knows that in such cases the jury are, naturally enough, much more prone to find for the plaintiff if they know that the amount of their award will be paid by an insurance company and not by a private person. The rule is often difficult to carry out, for it is often difficult for counsel for the plaintiff to avoid letting the jury know this fact; and if he does so the circumstances will no doubt be considered by the Judge in deciding what course he should adopt. But there is no doubt whatever of the existence of the rule, and it is an important one. If the rule is violated, it is no doubt a matter of discretion for the Judge what course he will take. The result of the violation of the rule is that the jury, unintentionally it may be, but in fact none the less, are prejudiced, and the Judge must take such course as he thinks proper. There can be no doubt at all that the Judge has a discretion to order the jury to be discharged, if he thinks that the circumstances of the case render that course the proper one. A Judge has that power, not only by virtue of the rules of practice, but also in virtue of the much wider rule that it is the duty of a Judge to see fair play between the parties and to prevent any unfair appeal to the prejudices of the jury.

There are four authorities to which reference ought to be made. The first is Wright v. Hearson ([1916] W.N., 216). That was a case in which the defendant, who was being sued for damages for personal injuries caused by his motor-car, was asked in cross-examination, "Are you insured?" The defendant did not answer the question. The jury having found a verdict for the plaintiff, the defendant appealed. Mr. Justice Avory said: "It is admitted that the counsel who represented the plaintiff in the county court asked the defendant in cross-examination if he was insured. I wish to say emphatically that that was a most improper and most irregular question to put. It appears, however, that the question was not answered. The Judge seems to have said that it had nothing to do with the case, and to have added that every prudent and sensible man was insured. But although the putting of the question might create prejudice in the minds of the jury, yet, having regard to the fact that it was not answered, and that, as we must assume, the county court Judge said something to remove, as far as he could, its effect upon the minds of the jury, I do not think we can say that the jury was in fact prejudiced." Mr. Justice Rowlatt, after stating the facts, said: "That was an irregular question to put, and its effect was not removed by the fact that it was not answered. It was irregular and was calculated to prejudice the defendant with the jury. It should be stated emphatically that counsel are not entitled to do such a thing in order to prejudice the minds of the jury. It is the duty of counsel to know and observe the rules governing what they may and what they may not do in the conduct of cases; they may not disregard these rules and trust to not being checked in time. In proportion as counsel voluntarily observe these rules so will their standing and reputation grow. When this question was put to the jury the Judge might justifiably have discharged the jury and made the plaintiff pay the costs. The Judge did not take that course in this case, but those who make suggestions such as that now complained of must face the possibility of such an order being made."

The next case is Askew v. Grimmer (43 The Times L.R., 354). In that case the fact that the defendant was insured had been disclosed, and Mr. Justice Branson said that "he thought that it was the practice not to tell juries that an insurance company was involved, and that it was, perhaps, an error of judgment to have done so now. But, in view of the discussion, he felt sure that the jury would realize that it would be most unfair to the defendant to treat him as being insured, because if he had said what was alleged it might turn out that he was not insured at all. The most convenient course would be that the trial should proceed, and if he (his Lordship) were wrong, the Court of Appeal could then correct the matter."

The third case is Ellis v. Mayhew, Limited (unreported), tried on March 24, 1926, before the Lord Chief Justice and a special jury. The Associate's note is as follows: "In the course of the opening counsel for the plaintiff read the correspondence. In one letter read to the Court and jury the word 'assured' occurred. The Lord Chief Justice pointed out that this should not be read, as the jury would now infer that the parties were insured. Counsel for the defendants then made application to withdraw the case from the jury sworn and to allow the case to go before another jury. In the absence of authority, this application was refused by the Lord Chief Justice, who made the suggestion that the jury might be discharged from the case, and that he might try the case alone. Both counsel consented to this course, and the jury were discharged from the case and paid their fees, and the case proceeded as a 'non-jury by consent.'"

Lastly, there is the case of Gowar v. Hales ([1928] 1 K.B., 191). There the question was whether the insurance company which had issued a motorist's insurance policy should be brought in as a third party at the hearing of an action for damages by the injured party against the motorist, and the Court of Appeal was of opinion that no such order should be made. The appellant had relied on the three cases to which I have referred, and it was held that, as the fact of the insurance ought not to be made known to the jury, it must be wrong to join the insurance company as a third party. Lord Justice Scrutton there says: "But if it was not a question of an action against a motorist but a question whether an insurance company should pay a person who was damaged by a motor, it was found extremely difficult to get fair hearings from juries, with the result that it has been established as a rule of practice at the Bar which the Judges enforce, that in an action against a motorist the jury ought not to be told that the defendant is insured. Whether the way of enforcing it is, as has been done in one case cited to us [Ellis v. Mayhew, Limited—but vide supra], to discharge the jury when the fact has been told them, or whether it is, as in the case before Mr. Justice Branson [Askew v. Grimmer (supra)], to say it is an error of judgment on the part of the counsel who has mentioned it, but that the Judge should endeavour to put it right by his summing-up, it is not necessary to decide here. There was this undoubted rule of practice on which the Judges acted; and to have a rule of practice that a jury should not be informed that the defendant is insured, and for the Judge at the same time to bring in the insurance company to take part in the trial of the action as the Judge shall direct and be bound by the result of the trial, seems to me to be entirely inconsistent." The result is that, so far as we are aware, there is no case in which a Judge has taken the course which the county court Judge has taken here, but, speaking for myself, I have no doubt that it was within his discretion to take that course, and that discretion is not subject to appeal.

That still leaves for consideration the question whether in this case anything was said to the jury which would lead them to know that the defendant was insured. We have a report from the county court Judge in the following terms: "In opening the case, after referring to the accident, plaintiffs' counsel stated to the jury that the defendant had made an offer to settle the matter, and proceeded to read a letter, dated February 21, 1927. The reading of the first few words of the letter disclosed that it referred to a company, and it was obvious that this could only be an insurance company. By this the jury could easily draw the inference that the defendant was insured, and having regard to the regular practice and to Gowar v. Hales (supra), which I had just read, I discharged the jury and adjourned the case to be tried by a fresh jury. Costs of the day to the defendant." [His Lordship read the letter, and continued.] It would not be necessary for that purpose to read much of the letter. Mr. Moyses' recollection is that no part of the letter was read, and that in fact nothing was said by him from which the jury could infer that the defendant was insured. We have been shown a short report of the case in the Morning Post of the following day. Upon that material we have to say whether we are satisfied that the county court Judge was in error on a matter of fact before him. The recollection of Mr. Leverson is that Mr. Moyses did commence to read the letter. On the whole, we are clearly of opinion that, the onus being on the appellant, we cannot say that it has been satisfactorily shown that the report of the county court Judge is mistaken in fact. We think that the jury, no doubt unintentionally, were informed that the defendant was insured.

For these reasons I think that this appeal fails.

Mr. Justice Talbot.—I am of the same opinion. It is no doubt an established rule of practice in cases of this kind that the fact that a defendant is insured must not be disclosed to the jury. The rule is one which is generally observed by the Bar, and one which it is the duty of the Courts to enforce. Whether it is an expedient rule appears to me to be a very doubtful matter. I doubt very much whether it works for justice. In the first place, no jury in these days can avoid knowing that in the very great majority of such cases the defendant is insured, and no one can say whether or not they give effect to their suspicion in any particular case. It is, in my opinion, better that the jury should have the advantage of the addresses of counsel on the point, and of the express direction of the Court that the matter is one to which they should pay no attention.

Secondly, I think it causes injustice in quite a different direction. In cases of this kind the damages are more often inadequate than excessive, and quite frequently where a defendant does not appear to be very affluent, and where a heavy award of damages is justified on the facts, a jury do not award the proper sum which they would award if they knew that the defendant was insured. If the whole matter were disclosed it would be much better, because then the attention of the jury would be explicitly directed to the fact that in considering damages the one matter which they ought to take into account is what the injury to the plaintiff has been.

These considerations are, however, quite irrelevant to this case, because the rule does exist, and as long as it exists must be enforced. We have no right to inquire whether the county court Judge acted judiciously in the circumstances. It is clear that one way of enforcing the rule is to discharge the jury at the expense of the party whose advocate has violated it. That is sufficiently established by authority, for example, by the judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt in Wright v. Hearson ([1916] W.N., 216). Counsel for the appellants here admits that if he had read the letter as it stands and disclosed the existence of the insurance company, the county court Judge would have been justified in discharging the jury. The whole question is whether the Judge is correct in saying that what was read by counsel had in fact the effect of disclosing to the jury what would have been disclosed if the letter had been read in its entirety, and whether what the Judge tells us is accurate. I have no doubt that, if a portion of the letter was read as alleged, it would not fail to convey to the jury the information of which complaint is made. The matter is one on which it is impossible for us to say that the county court Judge formed a wrong opinion, and, if what he says is correct, he had obviously the same power to discharge the jury as if the letter had been read in extenso. In the circumstances it is impossible for us to interfere, and I agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

OTTOMAN BANK v. JEBARA.*

Sale of Goods—War—Goods sold to Turkish customers—Delivery of goods to customers after outbreak of war—Payment received in piastres by seller's agents—Claim by seller against his agents for sterling—Treaty of Lausanne, 1923, Art. 84—Treaty of Peace (Turkey) Order, 1924.

The defendant bank, a Turkish subject, was at the outbreak of war between this country and Turkey holder of sight bills drawn in sterling for the purchase price of goods consigned by the plaintiff from Manchester for his customers in Beirut which had arrived in Beirut before the outbreak of war and were subsequently delivered by the bank to the purchasers against payment to the bank in piastres. At the conclusion of the war the defendant bank claimed to be entitled to pay to the plaintiff an amount in sterling which represented the then depreciated value of the piastres which they had received in exchange for the goods. The plaintiff, on the other hand, claimed to be entitled to be paid the sterling amounts of the bills at sight.

Held, that since the completion of the execution of the contracts, as between the plaintiff and his customers, required no intercourse between a British subject and the enemy, the contracts were not abrogated by the outbreak of war, and the plaintiff was entitled to recover from the defendant bank the amount of the bills in sterling.

Appeal from decision of the Court of Appeal (43 The Times L.R., 369 ; [1927] 2 K.B., 254) allowed.

This was an appeal by the Ottoman Bank from a decision of the Court of Appeal (43 The Times L.R., 369 ; [1927] 2 K.B., 254) varying a decision of Mr. Justice Rowlatt.

The respondent purchased goods in Manchester for export to customers in Beirut and other places in the East and entrusted to the appellants, the Ottoman Bank, in respect of each consignment, the bills of lading and invoices for such goods, together with bills of exchange in sterling for the price thereof. The appellants had no authority to part with the respondent's goods unless the appellants were in a position to pay him the sterling value of the relevant bills of exchange. In practice the appellants frequently received from the drawees Turkish currency as the price of providing for them the necessary sterling to discharge the bills.

During the War with Turkey the Beirut branch of the appellant bank collected from the drawees sums in piastres equivalent at the dates of payment to the sums in sterling mentioned in the drafts, releasing the goods against such payments, but owing to the War it was impossible to remit money to England. After the War the Turkish currency had enormously depreciated, and consequently the sum in sterling which the piastres collected in Beirut would produce was much less than the sums represented by the drafts.

The respondent demanded the total sterling sum as shown on the drafts, and by this action he claimed the sterling value of the bills of exchange collected by the appellants as moneys received by the appellants to the respondent's use. Alternatively, he alleged that, if the War rendered the agreement between the appellants and the respondent impossible of performance, the appellants had wrongly parted with the respondent's goods, and he claimed damages for their conversion.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt decided in favour of the respondent on the first claim, and the Court of Appeal (Lord Justice Bankes, Lord Justice Scrutton, and Lord Justice Atkin) on the alternative claim.

After the judgment of the Court of Appeal had been delivered the respondent intimated to the appellants that all that he wanted was to be paid in sterling, as Mr. Justice Rowlatt had decided, but the appellants declined that offer and insisted on appealing to the House of Lords.

The facts are fully stated in the judgment of Lord Dunedin.

The Hon. Geoffrey Lawrence, K.C., Mr. D. B. Somervell, and Mr. I. W. G. Barry appeared for the appellants ; Mr. Cyril Atkinson, K.C., and Sir Cassie Holden for the respondent.

VISCOUNT DUNEDIN.—My Lords : This is an action brought at the instance of a Manchester merchant against the Ottoman Bank for the proceeds of certain bills of exchange collected by the bank. The course of dealing out of which the question arose was as follows :—The respondent, who is a domiciled Englishman residing in Manchester, was in use to buy Manchester goods for despatch to correspondents in Syria. He drew bills on these correspondents and handed the bills to the appellants' branch in Manchester along with the bills of lading of the goods which had been shipped. Upon this the bank made an advance of 80 per cent. on the amount of the bill. The bills and the bills of lading were then sent to Beirut. On the arrival of the goods at Beirut the Syrian correspondent on whom the bill was drawn paid the bill and received the bill of lading or, if the goods had already been removed from the ship, then the goods themselves, and the Manchester branch then, on advice of the Beirut branch, credited the respondent with the amount of the bill. War was declared between England and Turkey on November 5, 1914. At that date several consignments of goods had arrived, but the documents of title and the bills were still in the hands of the bank at Beirut. The persons for whom the goods were destined came forward and paid the bills and got the goods. The payments were actually made in Turkish currency, but the calculation of the amount of that currency needful for the sum expressed on the face of the bills was made on the rate of exchange with London. A remittance from Beirut to London direct was impossible, and no sum has as yet been credited to the respondent in respect of the bills. The respondent raised an action for the amount on the face of the bills. The appellants refused to pay, but offered the amount represented by the number of Turkish piastres actually received calculated on the exchange of the day. The action depended before Mr. Justice Rowlatt, who gave judgment for the respondent. He held that in the circumstances above mentioned the appellants had in law been paid in sterling and must repay in sterling. On appeal the Court of Appeal recalled that judgment. They held that the true view of the case was that the effect of the war was to preclude the appellants at the Beirut branch from dealing with the goods at all ; that in handing the goods to the Syrian merchant they acted without authority and not as agents of necessity ; and that consequently they were liable as for conversion ; and the Court of Appeal directed an inquiry as to what the damages for that conversion would be. An appeal from that judgment has been taken to your Lordships' House.

All the bills were in the same form ; so one may be taken as a specimen. It is in this form. It is dated Manchester. "Please pay to our order value cheque on London the sum of one hundred and sixty-three pounds eleven shillings sterling. Value received. Shipping documents attached to be given up upon payment." It is addressed to Messrs. Gandour Frères, Beirut. It is signed Jebara and is endorsed "Pay to the order of the Imperial Ottoman Bank."

The first question to be considered is what is the proper meaning of this document. The bill is expressed for a sum in English currency, or, in other words, in sterling, and the ordinary result is that only payment in sterling will be a proper payment in respect of the bill. But the appellants argue that the words "Value cheque on London" alter what would otherwise be the effect of the bill. They say that these words mean that proper payment of the bill could only be made by tendering a cheque on London ; that this was admittedly not done and that consequently their only liability arose not from the terms of the bill but from the fact that they had got Turkish piastres for the goods. These Turkish piastres they say they are willing to return just as if they had put them in a box and kept them there. As a matter of fact they did not keep them in a box, they traded with them ; but in the view which I take of the bill I need not explore this subject further.

My Lords, I do not agree with this view of what the words "Value cheque on London" meant. I think they meant no more than this, that it must be quite understood that the payment which obviously would not be made in Beirut in actual English currency must be so calculated as to represent what a cheque on London for the amount on the bill would cost. That the words are pleonastic may be admitted, but what an absurd result is reached by the interpretation the other way. The Syrian merchant comes forward to take up the bill and get the goods. The bank itself would sell a cheque on London, the price of such a cheque for the sum in the bill would be calculated on the exchange of the day, and just because the merchant pays in piastres the same sum, instead of asking for a cheque and then handing back the cheque as soon as received, it is to be held that he has not properly taken up the bill. My view is this, that as the bank in Beirut accepted the payment in lawful money from the Syrian merchant and handed over the goods it constituted itself, as in a question with the drawer, debtor for the sterling amount on the face of the bill.

This is really the view of Mr. Justice Rowlatt though expressed in somewhat different words.

My Lords, I am not able to take the view which commended itself to the Court of Appeal. Their judgment is rested on this, that the bank in Beirut had no right to deal with the goods, the right to deal with them depending on the mandate which the respondent had given to the bank in Manchester to collect the proceeds of the bill, and that mandate having been as a contract abrogated by the War. But it is not every contract that is abrogated by the War, it is only a contract which is still executory and which for its execution requires intercourse between the British subject and the enemy. Now this contract had been partially carried out, the bills had been endorsed and the bank had received them and the endorsed bills of lading. From that a subsidiary contract arose, i.e., the contract that on payment of the bills the shipping documents should be handed over. Now to execute that no intercourse between an English subject and the enemy was necessary. The bank was a Turkish subject and the Syrian merchant was a Turkish subject. The bank therefore was, in my view, perfectly entitled to do what it did ; nay more, it might have been forced to do it by the Syrian merchant on his producing proof that he was the real consignee of the goods and proffering payment of the bill. That, in my view, shuts out any idea of conversion.

It is true that the part of the original contract which provided for a remittance of the proceeds could not be carried out. But that fact did not abrogate what had already been done, i.e., the endorsations and what followed thereon. The liability of the bank, in my view, rests not on the original mandate but on the fact that being entrusted with the goods it parted with them on payment of the bill, and thus we come come back again to the original question what acceptance of the payment really meant, with that I have already dealt. The bank constituted itself a debtor in sterling and therefore in sterling it must pay.

Another point was raised by the appellants which did not commend itself to either Court but which as it was strenuously argued before your Lordships must be mentioned. Article 84 of the Treaty of Lausanne between Great Britain and Turkey which by the Order in Council of August 12, 1924, has the force of law is as follows :—

"The High Contracting Parties are in agreement in recognizing that debts which were payable before the War or which became payable during the War under contracts entered into before the War, and which remained unpaid owing to the War, must be settled and paid, in accordance with the provisions of the contracts, in the currency agreed upon, at the rate current in its country of origin.

"Without prejudice to the provisions of the Annex to Section II. of this part, it is agreed that where payments to be made under a pre-War contract are represented by sums collected during the War in whole or in part in a currency other than that mentioned in the said contract, such payments can be made by handing over the sums actually collected, in the currency in which they were collected. This provision shall not affect settlements inconsistent with the foregoing provisions arrived at by voluntary agreement between the parties before the coming into force of the present Treaty."

I am of opinion for the reasons already stated that the sum now due was not collected in piastres. The bank at Beirut was not the agent of the respondent to collect piastres but for the reasons already given became a debtor by its own act in a sterling sum. Here again I take the same view as Mr. Justice Rowlatt.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be recalled and the judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt be restored, the respondent to have his costs before this House and in the Courts below. I move accordingly.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.—My Lords : I am so thoroughly satisfied with the judgment pronounced by Mr. Justice Rowlatt that I should have been well content humbly to adopt it as my own on the appeal in this case.

But the able and sustained arguments on both sides and the judgments in the Court of Appeal make it suitable that I should state in a few words how the case strikes me.

The transaction, to begin with, was entirely English ; it was between the respondent, as an Englishman, and a branch of the appellant bank in Manchester. The bill in question is a sample of several of the same character, which were granted in the course of similar business.

The respondent bought Manchester goods for Beirut, where he had correspondents to whom he despatched those goods. He drew a bill of exchange upon them in the terms to be noted and handed to the bank this bill for collection in Beirut. He also handed to the bank the bills of lading for the goods which had been shipped. The situation accordingly was plain to the effect that upon the bill being paid the corresponding bills of lading for the goods would be handed over by the bank as the counterpart. The transaction was unquestionably an English transaction for payment in England in English sterling money and delivery of the bills of lading for goods shipped in England.

War broke out between Turkey and England on November 5, 1914. Subsequently to the War, however, the business was continued by the appellant bank at its branch at Beirut. The goods had gone to Beirut ; the bills of lading had gone to the Ottoman Bank at Beirut ; the person to make the payment under the bill was the Beirut merchant. In short, the scene of the completion of the transaction was in Turkey. The duties to be performed were that, upon payment of what in the bill of exchange is called "Value cheque on London," he was entitled to the delivery to him of the bills of lading and, of course, of the goods. The transaction was interpreted in this sense in Beirut. The merchant presented himself at the bank, paid the equivalent of the sterling price in the official number of piastres, which had been regularly fixed and was known to the commercial public. This amount was accepted in piastres and the bank thereupon proceeded not only to enter the sterling amount in its own books, but to fill up a document called a "bordereau," under which it purported to hold to the credit of its Manchester branch a sum of sterling equal to the amount of the bill of exchange. This bordereau was on February 4, 1919, actually sent from Beirut to the Manchester branch of the appellants' bank. They were, accordingly, in this position as advised from Beirut by the bank that the respondent was entitled to be credited with that sum of sterling money.

The position of the bank, however, now is that the respondent is only to be credited with the value of piastres at the greatly fallen price at which they subsequently stood; and the simple question in the case is, was the transaction in Beirut a transaction in which "value cheque on London" had been paid, that is to say, the equivalent of sterling money? In my opinion the case is substantially concluded upon facts by the evidence of Mr. Naville, formerly in the employment of the defendant bank and manager of the branch at Beirut up to July 15, 1915. This is the record:—

"(Q.) Have you any doubt whatever that the bank acted in the same way precisely as they always acted?—(A.) To the best of my knowledge, I should think they did.

"(Q.) When they come to estimate—say that they have got a bill sterling—how do they estimate how much money they are going to make this man pay?—(A.) The man would have the moneys that he brings to the counter at the rate at which you can get a cheque in London or Paris.

"Mr. Justice Rowlatt.—Therefore, they did not ask for more, and they would not take less because he had got to pay for it at the rate?—(A.) The sterling rate of London.

"Mr. Cyril Atkinson.—And you understand that, as the result of what he is paying you, you are going to credit Manchester with so much sterling?—(A.) Yes.

"(Q.) And you fix the price which you want to enable you to do that?—(A.) The Ottoman Bank in Beirut fixes on Monday morning an official price, which is distributed and is absolutely official, and the bank provide for any normal amount, and any balance that is wanted they buy in the market.

"Mr. Justice Rowlatt.—The long and short of it is that the drawee paid in sterling but you could not remit it?—(A.) That is so; that is the whole thing in a nutshell."

It is perfectly true that after the outbreak of War the Beirut branch of the Ottoman Bank could not make any remittances of money to any English national, which would include its agent in Manchester. But it is to be observed that there was no bar whatsoever to the acceptance in sterling or in the full market equivalent of the day of a cheque upon London from another Turkish subject, namely, the customer in Beirut. Both bank and customer were Turkish subjects there; and the legitimacy of the payment to the bank in Beirut is, therefore, beyond question, there being no international quality about that part of the transaction.

In Turkey the bill of exchange was retired in full by a payment which, although in piastres, was acknowledged by the bank not only to the customer but to their own English branch to have been full payment for the goods. In my view, it is a mere juggle on the part of the appellants to suggest that these goods were got on a payment which meant something less or something different in result from full payment in English sterling. The piastres that passed were passed into the hands of the bank itself at the bank's official valuation of the equivalent of sterling. When they have now fallen in value it does not seem to me to be open to the bank to plead that the transaction, so far as regards the English merchant, was not fully completed by delivery of the goods by the bank on the one hand and full payment of the bill by the merchant on the other.

There are in the case other elements which would confirm this view, as I hold it to be established that not only were the amounts of Turkish currency in all cases fixed by the appellants themselves as the price of providing the sterling credit, but that it was open to the bank to have converted the Turkish currency into Swiss or United States currency. That they did not do so was simply because, as I hold, they thought themselves then fully paid at the Turkish piastres rate of the day. In my view they were right in so thinking; and they have been paid in "value cheque on London."

Prohibitions against doing business with English or other enemy nationals cannot apply to a case of a payment made between two Turkish nationals and goods delivered on the head of that payment, documents and goods passing from one Turkish national in Beirut to another. The appellants' Manchester branch was given credit for the sum of sterling money which they have been advised by the bank itself is the proper sum to credit on this particular account.

In this view all questions of conversion or of agency by necessity drop out of the case. There remains, however, Article 84 of the Treaty of Lausanne between Great Britain and Turkey of date August 12, 1924. The appellants desire to utilize the words of that article as justifying them in payment of the currency agreed upon at the rate of the currency in its country of origin. I do not think the currency agreed upon in this transaction was piastres and, therefore, in my view the reference to the Treaty fails, but upon this subject I desire to agree expressly with the language of my noble and learned friend, Lord Dunedin.

In the Court of Appeal the case was decided on the footing of wrongful conversion and the result would probably be that the sum to be awarded after inquiry on that ground—the value of the goods having greatly increased—would be in amount more onerous to the bank, but as your Lordships hold that this was made and concluded and credited as a sterling transaction such inquiries are out of place.

It should be added that the House was informed at the Bar that on the judgment of the Court of Appeal being delivered intimation was made by letter to the appellants that all that the respondent wanted was to be credited and paid in sterling, as per the judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt. This offer was declined and the appeal was brought to this House. In these circumstances the respondent should have his costs of the entire cause, including this appeal.

I think the judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt fully and correctly covered the case and that his judgment should be restored.

LORD PHILLIMORE.—My Lords : The plaintiff in this case is an Armenian carrying on business in Manchester. The defendant bank carries on business in Great Britain, Turkey, Syria, and elsewhere, having one of its head offices in London and branch offices, among others, at Manchester and at Beirut in Syria.

The plaintiff before the War was in the habit of buying Manchester goods and transmitting them to correspondents in Syria. Business was conducted in the following manner : the plaintiff took a bill of lading making the goods deliverable to the bank ; he also drew a bill upon his particular correspondent for whom the goods were destined and endorsed it to the bank ; he took the bill of lading and the bill of exchange and other shipping documents to the Manchester branch of the bank and obtained an advance of 80 per cent. on the value of the bill.

When the goods reached Beirut, if the Syrian correspondent had come forward in time and paid the bank, he took delivery. If not, the bank took delivery ex ship, and the correspondent, when he came along, took delivery from the bank.

The form of the bill of exchange required payment to be made of the value as if payment were made in London : the words ran—"Please pay to our order value cheque on London the sum of £ ."

The practice of the bank—a perfectly reasonable one in time of peace—was to take payment in Turkish piastres (the current coin of Syria), and then to credit in account the head office in London with the sum in sterling. The head office then paid to the plaintiff the balance due to him.

When the War broke out, several consignments were in transit, or at any rate had not been delivered to the correspondents. As each came along, however, the bank handed the goods to him on receiving that sum in piastres, which at the moment was equivalent to sterling in London.

There being war between the two countries, Turkish law did not permit money to be remitted to Great Britain, but for the purpose of ascertaining a correspondency between the sterling sum in London and Turkish piastres in Beirut, it was possible to calculate the exchange through the neutral country of Switzerland. By the time when Syria ceased to be in possession of the enemy, and thenceforward till the war came to an end and thereafter, the value of the piastre greatly depreciated.

The defendant bank then offered to pay the plaintiff a number of piastres equal to those which the bank had received when it handed over the several parcels of goods or—which came to the same thing—the sterling value of the depreciated piastres.

The plaintiff refused to accept this and brought the present action for the sterling value of the several consignments, amounting in all to £3,161 6s. 6d., and he also claimed interest from a certain date.

Alternatively he claimed to treat the delivery of the several parcels as having become wrongful during the war, and damages for the conversion.

The defendant bank pleaded the Turkish law precluding it from making payment to any person in Great Britain during the war, said that any previous agreement had become illegal or alternatively impossible of performance, that it had acted reasonably in parting with the goods, as otherwise there would have been charges for storage and insurance, and the goods might have deteriorated and were liable to confiscation if they were held still to belong to the plaintiff ; and it said that it acted reasonably and in a businesslike way in collecting from the various recipients the equivalent of the sterling value ; and it pleaded section 84 of the Treaty of Lausanne and said that under that section its liability was limited to paying now the sums as collected in Turkish currency.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt gave judgment for the plaintiff for the sum sued for. He did not think it was a case of conversion or of giving damages for conversion ; but he thought that, however the branch of the defendant bank in Syria collected the price of the several parcels, the defendant bank rendered itself accountable for the value in sterling in London, and that, though this could not be paid while the war suspended all payments, it did become payable when the war came to an end.

There might have been some question as to whether the duty to pay first arose when the war came to an end, or whether it did not arise earlier when the Allies came into possession of Syria, but the plaintiff only asked for interest from March 31, 1919, and that date appears to have been accepted by the defendant bank, and judgment was accordingly given for interest as from that date.

The defendant bank appealed to the Court of Appeal. In this Court the learned Lord Justices thought that Mr. Justice Rowlatt had put his judgment on a wrong footing, that the plaintiff would have failed if that were the only ground, but that the true view was that the defendant bank never should have delivered the parcels to the several recipients, and that the bank was therefore liable in damages for wrongful conversion, and they directed an inquiry as to damages.

This view of the case would operate more hardly upon the defendant bank than the judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt, and the bank has accordingly appealed to your Lordships' House claiming that neither judgment is right, and that it is only liable for that which it has always offered, the present value of a sum in piastres equal to that which it had received.

The respondent in his printed case supported both judgments, but his solicitors had previously written to the bank's solicitors saying that he would be satisfied if he could hold the judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt.

My Lords, your Lordships at an early stage of the argument came to the conclusion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal, so far as it differed from that of Mr. Justice Rowlatt, could not be supported.

As each recipient came along in time of peace, the branch of the bank at Beirut was entitled to deliver to him his parcel of goods provided that the bank made itself debtor to the plaintiff for the proper sum in sterling in London. After the war had begun there was nothing unlawful in two parties, both subjects of the Ottoman Empire, dealing with each other. So far therefore there was nothing wrong in the bank delivering parcels to the several recipients. As between the branch bank in Beirut considered as a Turkish subject and the plaintiff as a British subject, all dealings were suspended during the war, and therefore the bank was not bound to carry out the plaintiff's mandate. But the plaintiff could not complain that his mandate was carried out. Indeed he may be presumed to have desired it. Provided that the proper payment was made in the proper manner, no harm was done ; and the bank either in fact took proper payment in the proper manner or must be deemed to have done so. Indeed it not merely admits but contends that it did so. The plaintiff's case therefore must rest upon the judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt.

As far as the plaintiff was concerned, though he had framed his case in such a way as to claim the alternative relief given by the Court of Appeal, he was content, as already stated, with the judgment given by Mr. Justice Rowlatt. It was the bank which by appealing from this judgment brought upon itself the more severe order of the Court of Appeal.

My Lords, I think that Mr. Justice Rowlatt was right. The bank escapes from a judgment for wrongful conversion of the goods upon the supposition that it took in return for them that which it was bound to take, a credit on London—a credit unavailable at the moment because things were put to sleep by the war, and therefore not producing interest during the war, but becoming available when the war came to a close. That which it could easily do through its machinery by the simple process of debiting the Syrian branch and crediting the London head office, it had, as soon as the war was over, to do; and therefore it is liable both for principal and for interest from the agreed date.

For the same reason the article in the Treaty of Lausanne on which the bank relied does not protect it. The bank cannot say that it collected the money "in a currency other than that mentioned in the contract" because the only way in which it can show that it performed its duty is by accepting the position that it took or procured or produced a London cheque.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt should be restored. As to the further costs from the date of his judgment, those of going unnecessarily to the Court of Appeal ought to be paid by the bank.

With regard to the costs of the appeal to your Lordships' House, this appeal was no doubt necessary, but it was necessary because the bank had brought an order to the Court of Appeal upon itself, and the bank was informed that the respondent would be content with the judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt. It ought therefore to pay these costs also.

LORD CARSON.—My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading and considering the speech of my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack, with which I entirely agree, and I do not desire to add anything.

LORD BLANESBURGH.—My Lords: I find myself in entire agreement with the rest of your Lordships as to the proper result of this appeal. In reaching that conclusion, however, I have had a special difficulty of my own to overcome. To me it has appeared that the very unusual terms in which the bills of exchange employed in these transactions were invariably couched had and were intended to have a meaning and effect sufficient to invest the appellants' argument on section 84 of the Treaty of Lausanne with a cogency which, had it not been neutralized by other considerations, might have carried their appeal.

As I read it, the effect of the expression "value cheque on London" found in each of these English bills of exchange addressed to a drawee resident and carrying on business in Turkey was to make it incumbent upon the appellants' branch at Beirut as their only duty to receive from the drawee in Turkish currency the sum which the bank accepted as the equivalent in value of the sum in sterling mentioned in the bill. This is, I think, the effect of the words whether they are merely construed according to their natural meaning in the setting in which they are found or whether they are interpreted with due regard to the invariable course of dealing between the parties in these transactions and to the business requirements or convenience of one or other of them. It was not, I think, supposed by anybody that payment for the bill in any other than Turkish currency would ever be made or asked for. Tender by the Turkish acceptor of a cheque on London, good, bad, or indifferent, for the amount in sterling named in the bill would not, in my view, have been such a payment as, in their natural signification, is connoted by the words used. Such a payment gives no effect to the word "value," which strikes me as the governing word in the phrase. It would, moreover, have failed to be a payment which in a business sense would have subserved either the interest or convenience of any of the parties concerned. And it is not without significance in this connexion to note that an allegation originally made by the respondent's statement of claim that it was the duty of the appellants' branch at Beirut to transmit to the respondent cheques on London so collected was, before the trial, at the respondent's own instance, struck out.

My Lords, in each transaction there were three parties concerned whose interests had presumably to be adjusted in carrying it to completion. There was, first of all, the respondent, entitled as the result of his arrangement with his Beirut correspondent to receive in England, if he so required, his agreed price in sterling for goods supplied. There were, next, the appellants, entitled normally in respect of their advances to the respondent to 80 per cent. of the sterling amount named in the bill, and interested, moreover, as exchange bankers to secure for themselves the ordinary profit on any exchange transaction involved. There was, lastly, the Turkish correspondent of the respondent, drawee of the bill, who, while in account liable to the respondent in sterling for the agreed price of the goods supplied, had for his own convenience to be enabled to discharge that liability by a payment made in Beirut in local currency.

Only by an arrangement under which the appellants' branch at Beirut collected from the respondent's Turkish correspondent the amount in Turkish currency which the appellants were ready to accept as the equivalent in value of the sum in sterling mentioned in the bill could either the convenience or the interests of the parties as so described have been met. But by it all were subserved. As the exchange rate accepted was the rate published by themselves, the appellants thereby secured their own profit on the transaction viewing it as one of exchange, and they were also thereby left at liberty, so far as their own share of the proceeds of the bill was concerned, either to retain these in Turkey or otherwise dispose of them as their occasions, for the moment, dictated. In other words, so far as it touched the appellants' own interests, collection in Turkish currency was of the essence. That it was in accord also with the interest and convenience of the Turkish acceptor seems obvious; nor was it otherwise than to the interest of the respondent, for it might well have been, on occasion, highly useful for him to have his share of the currency proceeds applied or retained in Turkey on his account.

Accordingly, my Lords, if that were all, I should myself, on this interpretation of these bills of exchange, have difficulty in resisting the case made by the appellants on section 84 of the Treaty of Lausanne. The currency "mentioned" in the contract is, I think, sterling, and the collection, although conventionally so made, has in fact been made in Turkish currency. But, in the circumstances, this is not, I think, enough for the appellants. It is, I think, clear that as between the appellants and the respondent the collection in Turkish currency actually made was only authorized, and, as between the respondent's Turkish correspondent and the appellants' Beirut branch, payment in Turkish currency was only made, on the terms that thereupon and without any variation by reason of any subsequent alteration in the rate of exchange, whether up or down, the appellants became accountable to the respondent in sterling for the precise sum representing his final share of the sterling value of the bill. And in my view the effect of this additional term in the transaction was to make section 84 of the Treaty inapplicable to the present case. In the result, therefore, I agree that the order of Mr. Justice Rowlatt should be restored.

My Lords, I am satisfied that there was in this case no wrongful conversion by the appellants, and I am relieved to find that the respondent's alternative claim on that footing, a claim really unconscionable, cannot, for the reasons given by your Lordships who have preceded me, be supported, and in ordinary circumstances it would, I think, have been proper that the costs of litigating that issue should have fallen upon him. But the respondent has throughout been ready to accept the order of Mr. Justice Rowlatt, and as the appeals of the bank to the Court of Appeal and to this House have been brought really in order to obtain a reversal of that order, I agree in the view that although the appellants have now succeeded in displacing the order of the Court of Appeal they should bear the costs of both appeals, as the final result has been only to restore an order with which from its date the respondent was well content.

BROOKE v. BOOL.*

Negligence—Gas explosion—Search for escape of gas by two persons—Agency—Control of proceedings—Joint tortious enterprise.

The landlord of a shop where the tenant carried on business lived on adjoining premises communicating internally with the shop. The tenant had requested the landlord to visit the shop occasionally at night to see that everything was secure. The landlord and a lodger of his entered the shop one night, believing that there was an escape of gas. In the shop was a gas-pipe running down from the ceiling to the floor. The landlord lit a burner at the lower end of the pipe, and nothing untoward occurred. The lodger, who was a much younger man than the landlord, then got on to the counter of the shop and began to examine the upper part of the pipe with a naked light. An explosion followed, and the tenant's goods on the premises were damaged. In an action by the tenant against the landlord,

Held, that the landlord was liable on the grounds (1) that the lodger was his agent, (2) that the landlord was in control of the proceedings, and (3) that the proceedings constituted a joint tortious enterprise.

The Koursk (40 The Times L.R., 399 ; [1924] P., 140) applied.

Held, further (per Talbot, J.), that the landlord was liable also on the ground that, having undertaken the examination, he was under a duty to take reasonable care to avoid damage resulting from it, and could not escape liability by getting another person to make the examination or part of it for him, whether that person was an agent or contractor or a mere voluntary helper.

The plaintiff, Mrs. Elizabeth Brooke, was the tenant of a shop and basement at 86, Warwick-square, W. The defendant, Mr. Bool, was her landlord and occupied adjoining premises, communicating internally with the plaintiff's shop. Owing to burglaries that had taken place the plaintiff requested the defendant to visit the shop at night from time to time in order to see that everything was secure. During the night of May 3, 1927, a lodger of the defendant, named Morris, informed the defendant that he thought he could smell an escape of gas in the shop next door. The defendant got up and went through into the plaintiff's shop, followed by Morris. In the shop there was a gas pipe running down from the ceiling and terminating in a burner which was accessible from the floor, and also a gas stove. In order to examine the upper part of the pipe it was necessary to get up on to a counter. The defendant applied a naked light to the lower part of the pipe, but found there was no escape there ; and then Morris, who was a much younger man than the defendant, got up on to the counter and proceeded to examine the upper part of the pipe, also with a naked light, in the same way as the defendant had examined the lower part. A violent explosion followed, resulting in serious personal injuries to Morris, and damage to the plaintiff's goods on the premises. The plaintiff brought an action for the damage to her goods against the defendant, alleging that the damage had been caused by negligence on the part of the defendant.

The county court Judge gave judgment in the following terms: "I find that the explosion was caused by the negligent act of Morris and was not caused directly or indirectly by any negligence on the part of the defendant. I accept as accurate the evidence of the defendant. I think that the plaintiff is a perfectly honest witness, but I reject her evidence wherever it contradicts or qualifies the evidence of the defendant. That being so, I am of opinion that there is no evidence that would entitle me to draw the inference that Morris was the agent of the defendant in doing the negligent act that he did, or to find that the defendant is responsible on the ground of joint enterprise or joint negligence, or on any other grounds, for the negligent act of Morris, I have very grave doubts as to whether my opinion is correct. If the Divisional Court should say that there is any evidence entitling me in law to draw that inference, or to find that the defendant is responsible on any ground for the negligent act of Morris I should draw such inference and I should find the defendant responsible. Judgment for defendant with costs."

The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. A. Cairns appeared for the appellant; Mr. G. M. Welsford for the respondent.

The following considered judgment was delivered by MR. JUSTICE SALTER.—This is an appeal from the learned Judge of the Westminster County Court, who gave judgment with considerable doubt in favour of the defendant. The plaintiff appeals.

The defendant, accompanied by another man named Morris, went on to premises in the occupation of the plaintiff and there searched for a suspected escape of gas with naked lights. The result was an explosion, and the question is whether the defendant is in law responsible in damages to the plaintiff, whose goods were injured by the explosion. The learned Judge found himself unable to find for the plaintiff, but said that, if in the opinion of this Court he was entitled in law to find for the plaintiff, he should be taken to have found for her so far as matters of fact were concerned. [His Lordship then stated the facts in detail, and continued]: The evidence of the plaintiff and the defendant was in conflict at many points. The learned Judge preferred on those points the evidence of the defendant, and I shall, therefore, read the evidence of the defendant and take it that those are the facts which the Judge accepted. The evidence is as follows: "I am owner of premises. I have never had occasion to complain of escaping gas. Occasionally plaintiff left gas burning after she left the shop for the night. Once or twice she had done it. I turned it out at least once and on neither occasion said anything to plaintiff. Plaintiff did complain to me that some of her goods had been stolen but I had no proof of it. I went occasionally into the shop at night after she had left. May 3. I did not go into the shop before I went to bed. I was in bed about 10.30 p.m. In consequence of what Morris said I went into the shop. I went into the shop followed by Morris. I had no light in my hand. I smelt no gas, though I stood for a minute. There was a gas burner. I took a box of matches and turned on the gas burner and lit it. Nothing happened, and I turned out the gas burner. The gas burner had certainly been turned off before plaintiff had left. I did not try the gas stove. I tried nothing but the gas burner. Nobody tried the gas stove. Morris stood watching me. He stood still, doing nothing but watch me. Morris got up on the counter and had some matches of his own. Morris struck a light and then explosion. I did not lend him any matches. I did not tell him to get on the counter; he had not struck any matches before.

". . . I welcomed Morris' help to assist in finding out cause of gas escape and to put it right. I think Morris was wrong in doing what he did."

Cross examined.—I said to Morris, "Perhaps there is an escape higher up." Morris is about 40; I am 78. It was desirable (to see if there was an escape higher up) that someone should get on a chair by the counter. Morris got on the counter. I thought he was going to see if there was an escape higher up. I wanted to find out whether there was an escape higher up. I thought to myself, "Let him find out." I did not say, "Do not get on the counter." Getting on the counter was the only way. After he got on the counter he struck a match. I think he struck it on a matchbox. I said nothing to him. It was all over in a second. I suppose that Morris intended to find out whether there was a leak, and, if so, to put it out. We both wished to do the same. I turned on the gas bracket. It lighted, then I put it out. We both intended to stop the leak, if any.

In my opinion, there are three grounds on which it was competent in law for the learned Judge to find that the defendant was responsible for what was obviously a grossly reckless act on the part of Morris—namely, holding a naked light near to a place where he suspected an escape of gas. First, I think that there was evidence of agency. The defendant desired to examine this pipe, and examined it himself so far as he could in a most reckless and dangerous way with a naked light. He then desired to examine the upper part of it. Now the defendant was an old man of nearly 80 years of age, and he had in his company a much younger man. I think that there was ample evidence that the defendant impliedly invited and instructed Morris to get up on to the counter and complete the examination, when it was not convenient for him to continue it himself, and that Morris did what he did on the instructions of the defendant. The maxim Qui facit per alium facit per se applies, and on that first ground I think that there was evidence on which the Judge could have found the defendant responsible.

Secondly, he could have been held responsible on the score of the control which he exercised over the proceedings. It is necessary to bear in mind the difference between the position of the defendant and that of Morris. The defendant was on the premises lawfully, at the request of the plaintiff, whereas Morris was a trespasser, unless the defendant had a right to invite him there to help. There was ample evidence on which the Judge could find that the invitation by the plaintiff to the defendant to keep a watch over the premises extended to the right to bring in someone to help him on an occasion of that kind. In my opinion, Morris was there by the permission and invitation of the defendant, since otherwise he would have been a trespasser, and the defendant was in control of the enterprise. There are two cases sufficiently in point for me to refer to them: Wheatley v. Patrick (2 M. and W., 650) and Samson v. Aitchison (28 The Times L.R., 559; [1912] A.C., 844). Both were cases of street accidents arising from negligent driving, and in both cases the defendant was in personal control of the vehicle that caused the damage and was riding in it. In both cases the person driving negligently was driving by permission of the defendant, but was not the defendant's agent, and in both cases the defendant was held responsible in damages to the person injured by the driver. The principle laid down in those cases applied here, and the defendant, having the right to control Morris and having invited Morris to do what he did, was responsible for the consequences.

Thirdly, I think that there was here a joint enterprise on the part of the defendant and Morris, and that the act which was the immediate cause of the explosion was their joint act done in pursuance of a concerted enterprise. A case in which the question of joint tortfeasors was much discussed was The Koursk (40 The Times L.R., 399; [1924] P., 140). There there had been a collision between vessels called the Clan Chisholm and the Koursk in consequence of separate and independent acts of negligence on the part of those controlling each vessel, and in direct consequence of that collision and without any intervening act of negligence the Clan Chisholm ran into and sank the plaintiffs' vessel. The plaintiffs, having recovered judgment against the owners of the Clan Chisholm (who limited their liability), then brought an action against the owners of the Koursk. It was set up on behalf of the owners of the Koursk that the owners of the Clan Chisholm and the owners of the Koursk were joint tortfeasors, and that the judgment recovered against the former barred any subsequent judgment against the latter. In that case the Court of Appeal considered the law in regard to joint torts and joint tortfeasors, and there are two passages in the judgment of Lord Justice Scrutton to which I desire to refer. The first occurs at page 155, where the Lord Justice is discussing the true meaning of joint tortfeasors, and is as follows: "The substantial question in the present case is: What is meant by 'joint tortfeasors'? and one way of answering it is: 'Is the cause of action against them the same?' Certain classes of persons seem clearly to be 'joint tortfeasors': the agent who commits a tort within the scope of his employment for his principal, and the principal; the servant who commits a tort in course of his employment, and his master; two persons who agree on common action, in the course of which, and to further which, one of them commits a tort. These seem clearly joint tortfeasors; there is one tort committed by one of them on behalf of, or in concert with, another."

This case falls within the third class to which the learned Lord Justice refers. Here the defendant and Morris went into the room, obviously proceeding by tacit agreement to examine this pipe and both employing the same negligent means. I think that what Morris did negligently was done by him in concert with the defendant and in pursuance of their common enterprise. The other passage to which I wish to refer occurs on page 156 of the report. Lord Justice Scrutton there says: "I am of opinion that the definition in Clerk and Lindsell on Torts, 7th ed., page 59, is much nearer the correct view: 'Persons are said to be joint tortfeasors when their respective shares in the commission of the tort are done in furtherance of a common design. . . . But mere similarity of design on the part of independent actors, causing independent damage, is not enough: there must be concerted action towards a common end.'" That appears to me precisely to describe this case, and on that third ground also I think that the county court Judge was fully entitled in law to find for the plaintiffs.

Inasmuch, therefore, as the Judge says that he is to be taken to have found all the facts in favour of the plaintiff, I think that the appeal must be allowed, and that the judgment entered for the defendant must be set aside, and judgment entered for the plaintiff.

The following judgment was read by MR. JUSTICE TALBOT: I am of the same opinion, and I do not differ from the judgment just delivered or from any part of it. There is, I think, another principle on which the liability of the defendant can be satisfactorily based. The evidence in this case shows that the defendant was, by arrangement with the plaintiff, in charge of the shop occupied by her during business hours, in the sense that he had the right, and possibly on occasions, the duty, to enter it and see that it was safe and to do anything which needed to be done there at once in order to make it safe. Morris, on the other hand, had no right to enter the shop; and accordingly when he noticed a smell of gas which he thought came from the shop he went to the defendant for leave to go in and investigate. Thereupon the defendant got up, went with Morris into the shop, and there proceeded for the protection, both of the plaintiff's premises and of his own, to ascertain by means of lighted matches whether gas was escaping. It is obvious that to examine a place in which an escape of gas is suspected is highly dangerous, unless proper care is taken, and that one of the necessary precautions against disaster is to avoid the use of a naked light.

In my opinion, the defendant having undertaken this examination was under a duty to take reasonable care to avoid damage resulting from it to the shop and its contents; and, if so, he could not escape liability for the consequences of failure to discharge this duty by getting (as he did) someone to make the examination, or part of it, for him, whether that person was an agent or a servant or a contractor or a mere voluntary helper. This is the principle of such cases as Bower v. Peate (1 Q.B.D., 321); Black v. Christchurch Finance Co., Limited ([1894] A.C., 48); Hughes v. Percival (8 App. Cas., 443); Hardaker v. Idle District Council (12 The Times L.R., 207; [1896] 1 Q.B., 335). See also the judgment in Dalton v. Angus (6 App. Cas., 740, at p. 829). The principle is that if a man does work on or near another's property which involves danger to that property unless proper care is taken, he is liable to the owner of the property for damage resulting to it from the failure to take proper care, and is equally liable if, instead of doing the work himself, he procures another, whether an agent, servant, or another, to do it for him. A like principle applies to work done in or near a highway involving damage to those who use it; see, for example, Holliday v. National Telephone Company (15 The Times L.R., 483; [1899] 2 Q.B., 392).

It appears to me, therefore, that the defendant is liable to the plaintiff for damage caused to her property by the negligence of Morris, who, by the defendant's authority, continued the examination of the premises which the defendant had undertaken and begun. It is, I think, a reasonable inference from the evidence that the defendant thought that Morris would use lighted matches just as he himself had been doing, but it is quite immaterial. It was the defendant's duty to take care that the dangerous operation which he had undertaken was done safely; and he is as much liable for the carelessness of Morris in doing part of the work as he would have been if he had done it himself in the same way.

IN RE A BANKRUPTCY NOTICE
(No. 292 OF 1928).*

Bankruptcy—Married woman—Carrying on a business—Series of speculative transactions—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (4 and 5 Geo. V., c. 59), s. 125 (1).

A series of speculative transactions by a married woman, if they involve the making of genuine commercial contracts extending over a long period of time, may amount to carrying on a "business" within s. 125 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, so as to make her subject to the bankruptcy laws.

This was an appeal from a decision of a Registrar in Bankruptcy raising the question whether the appellant, a married woman, had carried on a business so as to be amenable to the conditions of section 125 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914.

The facts, as found by the Master of the Rolls in his judgment, were that the appellant had for some three years been engaged in a series of transactions in francs, pesetas, kroner, and dollars through the medium of Messrs. Ironmonger and Co., a firm of foreign bankers. As the result of some 280 such transactions there had been profits and losses, but, ultimately, heavy losses.

A recent decision of the Court of Appeal, Ironmonger and Co. v. Dyne (44 The Times L.R., 497), held that the appellant was liable to Messrs. Ironmonger and Co. for differences in respect of those contracts to the amount of nearly £39,000, and that, the contracts being real commercial contracts, it was not open to the appellant to rely upon the Gaming Acts as a defence.

Messrs. Ironmonger and Co. having issued a bankruptcy notice against the appellant under the provisions of section 125 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, which directs that "Every married woman who carries on a trade or business . . . shall be subject to the bankruptcy laws . . . ," the appellant resisted the notice on the ground that she had not been carrying on any trade or business.

The Registrar decided that the notice must issue, and the appellant accordingly appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Mr. W. N. Stable, for the appellant, contended that, although the Court had decided that the appellant's transactions were commercial contracts, yet she herself had carried them on as speculations pure and simple. She had never taken delivery of any currency, and had simply gone in for what was well known as "gambling in differences."

Mr. St. John Field, for Messrs. Ironmonger and Co., was not called on to argue.

The Master of the Rolls (Lord Hanworth) said that it was not necessary to discuss the exact meaning of the words "trade" or "business." In the case of In re a Debtor (No. 3 of 1926) ([1927] 1 Ch., 97), he had called attention to the fact that in recent statutes the word "business" had been added to "trade" to enlarge the sphere of responsibility of a married woman. He could not agree that the transactions here must be treated as speculations and nothing more.

In Cooper v. Stubbs (41 The Times L.R., 614; [1925] 2 K.B., 753) he had said that the speculative nature of a transaction might be one of the material facts to be considered; but, although speculative, a transaction might none the less be a real business transaction. The simple consideration of the matter led to this: that when the Court found a series of operations involving the making of a number of genuine commercial contracts extending over a long period of time, that series of transactions might well be said to be the carrying on of a business. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

Lord Justice Lawrence and Lord Justice Russell delivered judgments to the same effect.

LLOYDS BANK, LIMITED v. CHARTERED BANK OF INDIA, AUSTRALIA, AND CHINA.*

Bankers—Crossed cheques—Protection of collecting banker—No title in customer—Receipt of payment by banker without negligence—Failure of banker to discharge burden of proof—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict., c. 61), s. 82.

One L., who was the chief accountant at a branch of the plaintiff bank, and who had authority to sign cheques on their behalf, fraudulently drew upon another bank crossed cheques, signed by himself and by another official of the branch, and payable to the defendant bank, and, by letters written on the plaintiffs' office paper, he instructed the defendant bank to credit the proceeds to the joint account of himself and his wife at the defendant bank. The defendant bank collected the amounts of the cheques and credited them to the account, and L.'s practice was to draw the amounts out quickly after paying them in, and observation of the account would have shown that L. was engaged in extensive speculations through stockbrokers. In an action for damages for conversion of the cheques the defendants relied on the provisions contained in s. 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882.

Held, that although the cheques were payable to the defendants themselves they had received payment "for a customer" within the meaning of the section and had done so in good faith, but that they had not discharged the burden of proving the absence of negligence on their part, and the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

Decision of MacKinnon, J. (44 The Times L.R., 165), affirmed with a variation.

This was an appeal by the defendants from the decision of Mr. Justice MacKinnon (44 The Times L.R., 165) in an action in which Lloyds Bank, Limited, sued to recover from the defendants, the Chartered Bank of India, Australia and China, damages for the conversion of certain cheques. Alternatively, they claimed the amount represented by the cheques as money had and received.

The claim related to 19 crossed cheques drawn by one Lawson, who was chief accountant at the Bombay branch of the plaintiffs' bank and had authority to sign cheques on their behalf. The cheques were drawn at various times from March, 1922, to January, 1924, and were for sums in rupees which were equivalent in all to between £17,000 and £18,000. The cheques, which were signed by Lawson, and also by another official of the plaintiffs' Bombay branch, were drawn on the Imperial Bank of India, and were payable to the defendant bank. The proceeds of them, which were collected by the defendants, were, on Lawson's instructions, credited to a joint account which Lawson and his wife kept at the defendants' bank.

All the cheques were drawn without the knowledge of, and in fraud of, the plaintiffs. Lawson was an officer of the bank whose payments for salary and allowances amounted to less than £1,500 a year. The defendants put in various defences, and relied in particular on section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, and the equivalent section, 131, of the Indian Negotiable Instruments Act, 1881.

Mr. Justice MacKinnon held that, although the cheques were payable to the defendants themselves, they had received payment "for a customer" within the meaning of the section and had done so in good faith, but that as they had not discharged the burden of proving the absence of negligence on their part the plaintiffs were entitled to recover. He further held that, as Lawson had paid a certain amount of the money so obtained by him by fraud into his account with the plaintiffs' bank and that money had gone back into the coffers of the plaintiffs, their claim for conversion would be reduced pro tanto.

The defendants appealed, and there was a cross-appeal by the plaintiffs.

Mr. Jowitt, K.C., and Mr. James Wylie appeared for the appellants; Mr. Stuart Bevan, K.C., and Mr. Le Quesne, K.C., for the respondents.

The following considered judgments were delivered:—

Lord Justice Scrutton.—This appeal in a case where one bank sues another for conversion of cheques, drawn by an employee of the plaintiff bank in fraud of his employer, on the bank of the plaintiffs, and collected by the defendant bank, raises a number of difficult questions.

The plaintiff bank, Lloyds Bank, Limited, are the successors of Messrs. Cox, whose business they took over. No point was taken as to the change of parties, and I deal with the case as if Lloyds Bank were interested throughout the whole relevant period. They banked with the Imperial Bank of India, and their cheques must be signed by two of their officials. One of those officials was one Lawson, their accountant, who had over him in the bank three superior officials, a manager and two sub-managers. Lawson had an account in the joint names of himself and wife at the Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China, the defendant bank. From March, 1922, to January, 1924, Lawson carried on a complicated system of fraud involving some 19 fraudulent cheques. He signed, and by fraud procured another authorized official to sign, 19 cheques on the Imperial Bank of India made payable to the defendant bank. He sent them to the defendant bank for collection on his behalf; the instructions to collect in that way being contained in a paying-in slip, or more generally in an accompanying letter, requesting the defendant bank to place the accompanying cheque to the credit of his joint account, and signed by Lawson only. The letter was on the bank's letter paper with a printed heading, "From Cox and Co.," the word "From" being sometimes struck out. The defendant bank collected the cheque, which was duly honoured by the Imperial Bank of India, and placed it to Lawson's account. As appears from the account itself, it was generally in small credit till the arrival of each fraudulent cheque, the funds collected from which were promptly drawn out, frequently in favour of stockbrokers. These fraudulent cheques were not discovered for a long time by reason of a complicated series of fraudulent entries, which it is unnecessary to trace in detail, partly also by the neglect by the plaintiff bank of a series of elementary precautions. Lawson was the only person who checked the plaintiff bank's pass-book when returned daily, and the auditor only troubled himself with totals and not with items. When the first fraudulent cheque was discovered the other 18 were traced in a day or so.

Under these circumstances the plaintiff bank sued the defendant bank for conversion of the cheques. Conversion primarily is conversion of chattels, and the relation of bank to customer is that of debtor and creditor. There might be thought to be some difficulty, as there are no specific coins in a bank which are the property of any specific customer, in treating the payment by a bank of part of its debt to the customer to a person not authorized to receive it as conversion of chattels; but a series of decisions binding on this Court, culminating in Morison v. London County and Westminster Bank, Limited (30 The Times L.R., 481; [1914] 3 K.B., 356) and A. L. Underwood, Limited v. Bank of Liverpool and Martins (40 The Times L.R., 302; [1924] 1 K.B., 775), have surmounted the difficulty by treating the conversion as of the chattel, the piece of paper, the cheque under which the money was collected, and the value of the chattel converted as the money received under it. (See the explanation of Lord Justice Phillimore in Morison's case (supra, at p. 378). The plaintiffs' case as to conversion was rested on these authorities and the trial Judge adopted it.

The defendant bank attempted to answer this case in various ways. Their counsel said, as I understood his argument, that each cheque was "issued" on behalf of the plaintiff bank, by two agents who had ostensible authority to issue it, to the defendant bank, which was entitled to rely on the ostensible authority; it was perfectly true that one of those agents, as between the bank and himself, had no authority to issue such a cheque for his own benefit, but to outsiders he was acting within his ostensible authority, and unless they had notice of his fraud, or until the principal, learning of his fraud, avoided the transaction, they were protected in their dealings with the apparently regular cheque. This position was said to be justified by the authorities referred to in the judgments in Reckitt v. Barnett, Pembroke and Slater, Limited (44 The Times L.R., 428) and in Lloyd v. Grace, Smith, and Co. (28 The Times L.R., 547; [1912] A.C., 716) and Hambro v. Burnand and Others (20 The Times L.R., 398; [1904] 2 K.B., 10).

In my view it is established that a third party, dealing in good faith with an agent acting within his ostensible authority, is not prejudiced by the fact that, as between the principal and his agent, the agent is using his authority in such a way that the principal can rightly complain that the agent is using his authority for his own benefit and not for that of his principal. Probably the plaintiff bank could not successfully sue the Imperial Bank of India for honouring these cheques signed by persons who had ostensible authority to sign, because in fact one of them was using his ostensible authority for his own benefit. But it is otherwise where the third party has notice of irregularity putting him on inquiry as to whether the ostensible authority is being exceeded. Now in the present case a subordinate official of a bank is steadily paying cheques of a bank by which he is employed, made payable to the collecting bank into his own account at that collecting bank. They are not cheques which on their face have any relation to Lawson except that he is one of the officers signing; and their amounts are such that they cannot be payments of salary. The only authority to use cheques for Lawson's benefit which on their face have no connexion with Lawson is a signature by Lawson himself. It appears to me that as in Underwood's case (supra) these facts put the defendant bank on inquiry. It is very important, in my view, to maintain safeguards against employees' dealing with their master's property without authority. If the cheque had come forward without the accompanying authority of Lawson I do not think the defendant bank would have committed conversion by collecting the proceeds and asking for further instructions. The learned Judge below has taken the view that the cheque was never issued and therefore the payee had no rights. By section 2 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, "issue" is defined as "the first delivery of a bill or note, complete in form, to a person who takes it as a holder"; and "holder" means "the payee or indorsee of a bill or note who is in possession of it, or the bearer thereof." But the House of Lords has decided in R. E. Jones, Limited v. Waring and Gillow, Limited (42 The Times L.R., 644; [1926] A.C., 670) that the original payee of a cheque is not a holder in due course. The Indian Negotiable Instruments Act, 1881, however, to which the Judge was not referred on this point, includes by section 9 in the definition of "holder in due course" the payee of a cheque. It does not define "issue," but does in section 14 define negotiation, so as to make the payee under a cheque transferred to him a holder by negotiation. It seems to me that each cheque taken by itself was "issued," being signed and dealt with by persons having ostensible authority to sign and issue it, but the accompanying memorandum, signed by Lawson alone, and its directions gave notice of irregularity, which destroyed the "holding in due course." I prefer this view to that of the learned Judge as to "no issue." It seems to me that the position is rather that of an issue with notice of irregularity than an issue under a voidable title—good till avoided. In Corporation Agencies, Limited v. Home Bank of Canada ([1927] A.C., 318) the cheques drawn in fraud were treated by the Privy Council as drawn with ostensible authority, and the distinction between that case and John and Others v. Dodwell and Co., Limited (34 The Times L.R., 261; [1918] A.C., 563) was made to turn on no notice or notice. I think in this case there was notice, as in Underwood's case (supra). There being conversion not waived but relied upon, the plaintiffs could not sue for money had and received, and they so stated to us and to the defendants, by letter, after judgment was reserved. The fact of the notice also prevents the defendants from treating themselves as holders in due course of the second cheque, which they credited to their customer's account before collection; this fact also prevents the defendants from claiming the protection of the Indian Act, section 131, as they did not collect for a customer, having already credited him with the amount.

The defendants next relied on section 131 of the Indian Negotiable Instruments Act, 1881, which takes the place of section 82 of the English Act and gives protection to a banker who, in good faith, and without negligence, collects for a customer a crossed cheque. The Indian Act uses the language "In case the title to the cheque proves defective," which is the language of section 12 of the English Crossed Cheques Act of 1876. The English Act of 1882 expands this to "The customer has no title or a defective title." It was argued that the Indian Act only applied to cases of an ostensible but defeasible title, and not to cases of no title. I do not know why the language was altered. I noticed that in Matthiessen v. London and County Bank (5 C.P.D., 7) Mr. Justice Lindley uses the language "has a bad title." But as it seems to me in the present case the bank had a title as holder under the Indian Act, defective through notice. I do not think the difference in the Acts is material. It was also said that the Acts could not protect the bank, as they were the true owners, being payees, and could not owe a duty to themselves. As they were payees with notice of irregularity in the accompanying memorandum, I do not think they were "true owners."

There remains the question which gave the learned Judge a great deal of trouble, whether the defendant bank showed that they collected without negligence. Negligence involves duty, and as the collecting bank, apart from statute, owed no duty to the owner of the cheque, the duty must be one created by the statute itself. I accept the measure of duty stated by Lord Dunedin in Commissioners of Taxation v. English, Scottish, and Australian Bank (36 The Times L.R., 305; [1920] A.C., 683, at p. 688), where he says: "Mr. Justice Isaacs says: 'Apart from the well-established rule that whether or not the evidence establishes that a person acts without negligence is a question of fact, the legal principles found in Morison v. London County and Westminster Bank (supra), and relevant to the present, are (1), that the question should in strictness be determined separately with regard to each cheque; (2), that the test of negligence is whether the transaction of paying in any given cheque was so out of the ordinary course that it ought to have aroused doubts in the banker's mind, and caused them to make enquiry.' If there be inserted after the words 'given cheque' the words 'coupled with the circumstances antecedent and present,' their Lordships think this is an accurate statement of the law." Lord Dunedin adds to it the qualification, which I entirely accept, that to require a thorough inquiry into the history of each cheque would render banking business impracticable, and that therefore there must be something markedly irregular in the transaction. The learned Judge finds, after careful consideration, that the defendant bank failed to prove absence of negligence. He rests his judgment on the payment by Lawson of large cheques of his bank into his private account, and failure to make inquiries of the manager of the plaintiff bank as to the regularity of the transactions. I agree in this finding, and would add that I think examination of Lawson's account (and I am sure that general examination of the accounts of every customer takes place from time to time in all well-managed banks) should, I think, have put the defendant bank on inquiry as to the source from which these heavy payments to stockbrokers were being made, in the case of an account generally in low water, except for these payments in, immediately reduced by payments out.

The only remaining defence was that the defendant bank was "lulled to sleep" by the failure of the plaintiff bank to detect these frauds. The learned Judge has dismissed this on the ground that no one from the defendant bank came to say he was "lulled to sleep"; their attitude was that they remembered nothing about the matter. This is enough to dispose of the matter, but though a similar defence succeeded in Morison's case (supra), I am not at all satisfied as to the grounds of such a decision. It does not seem consistent with the decisions in Bank of Ireland v. Trustees of Evans' Charities in Ireland (5 H.L. Cas., 389), and Swan v. North British Australasian Co. (10 Jur., N.S., 102), that negligence, to act as an estoppel, must be the proximate cause of the loss. If my butler for a year has been selling my vintage wines cheaply to a small wine merchant, I do not understand how my negligence in not periodically checking my wine book will be an answer to my action against the wine merchant for conversion. However, the ground of the learned Judge's decision is enough to dispose of this point. This, I think, substantially exhausts the points taken on the appeal, which must be dismissed with costs.

The plaintiffs had a cross-appeal which originally raised four matters. Of these a claim in respect to salvage from Lawson's property has been arranged ; a claim for interest on the amount recovered was abandoned ; a claim to treat the sum as awarded on a claim for moneys had and received (in which case consideration of exchange would make the amount larger) was abandoned, if the plaintiffs succeeded in conversion, by letter after the hearing before us, on the ground that if the plaintiffs did not waive the tort, but succeeded on conversion, they could not claim in assumpsit. There remained a contention that the Judge was wrong in allowing the defendants to reduce the sum awarded against them by the items set out in paragraph 10 (a) of the amended claim, being sums which Lawson was said to have paid back to the plaintiffs out of the amount converted by him, so that the plaintiffs had not, in fact, suffered the damage alleged. It seems to me clear that damages in conversion may be reduced by the return of the chattel converted ; and that where there has been a series of conversions of the same chattel, the return of the chattel by one of the wrongdoers may be used to reduce the damages against each wrongdoer. But when you come to the conversion of a cheque, it is not at all clear how the fact that one of the persons converting has after conversion paid to the plaintiffs, not the cheque converted, but some currency, not necessarily the currency derived from the cheque converted, can be treated without more as a reduction of the damages for the original conversion. The servant of a tradesman converts a cheque of his employer through a bank, and at a later period comes into his employer's shop and buys for £10 a chattel sold by the employer. Can the bank claim to reduce damages for conversion by £10, because the employer has received £10 from the original wrongdoer ? Will proof that the £10 came out of the proceeds of the cheque converted make any difference ? There are authorities beginning with Blackburn Building Society v. Cunliffe, Brooks and Co. (22 Ch.D., 61), the latest application of which is by Mr. Justice Wright in B. Liggett (Liverpool), Limited v. Barclays Bank, Limited (43 The Times L.R., 449 ; [1928] 1 K.B., 48), which support the view that, if the person converting without authority can show that he used the proceeds in discharging debts of the plaintiff, that fact may reduce to that extent the sum claimed from the wrongdoer. But whether any particular payment to the plaintiff by one of the wrongdoers reduces the damages for conversion must depend on the facts of each case, and cannot be settled by mere proof of receipt without more. In Underwood's case (supra) the Court of Appeal, therefore, ordered an inquiry as to the circumstances of each payment ; the parties, however, settled the matter. Mr. Justice Wright ordered a similar inquiry in Liggett's case (supra). I take, as a sample, in the present case, the first five payments alleged in paragraph 10 (a) of the claim, which are closely connected with the first fraudulent cheque in this case. This cheque was one for 15,000 rupees, dated March 31, 1922. Against it five cheques were drawn, which all, in various ways, came to the plaintiffs. They amounted to 15,617 rupees, and changed Lawson's account with the defendants from a credit of 232 rupees to a debit of 385 rupees. Obviously, therefore, to allow the defendants to deduct 15,617 rupees, as has been done, is to give them the advantage to the extent of 617 rupees of payments which were not derived from the first cheque converted. It seems also to assume that any chance which the owner of the property converted had of appropriating property of the wrongdoer, to meet his claim, though the owner did not know of the conversion, may be used to reduce the damages payable by any wrongdoer. Next, these five cheques, which the defendants claim to be allowed to deduct from the damages, were the following: (1) A cheque for 2,250 rupees paid by Lawson into his account at the plaintiff bank, turning his account, which was then 2,075 rupees in debit, into 175 rupees in credit. I do not see how Lawson could claim this as reducing his damages, as he promptly proceeded to draw against it till his account was again 900 rupees overdrawn. If he could not so use it, I do not see how the defendants could so use it, unless they showed some duty to them, on the part of the plaintiff bank, to discover Lawson's frauds, and I do not see any justification for inferring such a duty. (2) Two cheques for 7,917 and 4,750 rupees respectively, paid by Lawson to the plaintiff bank, to purchase two telegraphic transfers to London. Lawson was buying these apparently to meet two drafts on London which he had obtained from Cox and Co., for 7,649 rupees on February 20, and 4,663 rupees on March 13, 1922. Our attention was not called to the details of these transactions, but it looks as if the plaintiff bank gave value for these cheques, and if so, to allow the defendant bank to take credit for the whole sum would be to inflict a double penalty on the plaintiff bank. Lastly, there were two cheques for 350 rupees paid to the plaintiff bank, not into Lawson's account. Our attention was not called to any explanation of these amounts, and I do not see any justification for the defendant bank, without more, claiming to debit the plaintiff bank with them. No evidence was given that any of the sums in paragraph 10 (a) went to pay debts of the plaintiff bank, which might bring the matter within such authorities as Bannatyne v. MacIver ([1906] 1 K.B., 103) and Reid v. Rigby and Co. (10 The Times L.R., 418 ; [1894] 2 Q.B., 40). In my opinion the mere proof of receipt of moneys from the wrongdoer, which, if the owner of the property converted had known of the conversion, he might have appropriated against his loss by conversion, does not, in the absence of knowledge of the conversion, justify the deduction claimed.

The cross-appeal, therefore, succeeds on this point, and the judgment for the plaintiffs should be increased to £17,044 15s. 2d.

The appeal must be dismissed with costs, and the plaintiffs must have the costs of the cross-appeal.

Lord Justice Sankey.—In February of 1923 the plaintiffs took over the business carried on by Messrs. Cox and Co. as bankers in England, India, and elsewhere, and in the remainder of this judgment I propose to refer to Messrs. Cox and Co. and Lloyds Bank, Limited, as the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs alleged that on various dates between March 30, 1922, and January 21, 1924, one Lawson, the chief accountant of their Bombay branch, with another official, drew cheques to the number of 19 on the Imperial Bank of India, with which the plaintiffs had an account. The said Lawson drew the cheques in favour of the defendants, and delivered them to the defendants, the first cheque with a paying-in slip, and each of the others with a memorandum containing instructions by Lawson to the defendants to put the said cheques or the proceeds thereof to the credit of Lawson's joint account in the Bombay branch of the defendants. The plaintiffs further alleged, as indeed was the fact, that Lawson acted in fraud, and without the authority, of the plaintiffs, and that the defendants wrongfully converted the said cheques by collecting the same from the Imperial Bank of India and putting the proceeds to the credit of the said joint account, whereby the plaintiffs suffered damage.

The plaintiffs claimed a sum of £17,044 15s. 2d., and, alternatively, a rather larger sum on a count for money had and received.

The defendants contended : (1) that they were not guilty of conversion ; (2) that they are protected by the Negotiable Instruments Act, 1881, as modified up to September 1, 1909, of the Indian Code of Law, which reads as follows : "A banker who has in good faith and without negligence received payment for a customer of a cheque crossed generally or specially to himself shall not, in case the title to the cheque proves defective, incur any liability to the true owner of the cheque by reason only of having received such payment." They further contended that they acted in good faith, which is not disputed, and without negligence in the circumstances, and upon that issue is joined. The learned Judge accepted the plaintiffs' contention, but said that they were liable to give credit in respect of certain amounts, being part of the proceeds of the above-mentioned cheques which had found their way back into Lawson's account with the plaintiffs, and in the result he gave judgment for £12,470. From that judgment the defendants appeal, and the plaintiffs have a cross-appeal in respect of the credits allowed.

The plaintiffs had in their employment at all material times the said Lawson, who had for ten years been in the position of chief accountant. He had, besides his duties of looking after the accounts, full powers under a power of attorney to sign cheques, and to commit the plaintiffs by his signature (clauses 2, 3, 6, 7, 10, and 12). His salary was at the rate of 1,200 rupees a month, which was credited to him in a current account which he had with the plaintiff bank. He had also a banking account with the plaintiffs in London, and, thirdly, he had a current account with the defendant bank, originally in his own name, but later on as a joint account in the name of himself and his wife. The plaintiffs had an account with the Imperial Bank of India. Lawson was a rogue who has since been convicted and sentenced to a long term of imprisonment, and the above-mentioned nineteen cheques were fraudulently obtained and used by him, the first fraud being in respect of a cheque of March 31, 1922, and the last fraud in respect of a cheque of January 22, 1924. Before he began the frauds he had a considerable number of honest dealings, by means of which money was transferred from the plaintiff bank to his own account with the defendants by means of pay slips. These sums ranged from the small amount of 687 rupees to the large one of 7,649 rupees. It is necessary to mention this fact because one of the considerations urged by the defendants is that, before the fraudulent transactions, Lawson had with them considerable transactions which were admittedly honest.

The nineteen cheques drawn upon the Imperial Bank of India, which are the subject of this action, required to be signed by two signatories in order to make them valid cheques drawn by the plaintiffs. Lawson was entitled to sign a cheque, and various other persons were entitled to be one of the two joint signatories required. These cheques are in the form : "Pay the Chartered Bank of India, Australia and China"—that is, the defendants—"or order," and they are crossed. They are drawn upon the plaintiffs' account with the Imperial Bank of India. Every one is signed by Lawson, and also signed by some second signatory. The fact is that they were fraudulently prepared by Lawson, who fraudulently got the other officials to sign them because he intended to use them, not for the proper purposes of the plaintiffs' business, but for his own fraudulent purposes, and for his own improper enrichment. Every one of these cheques was, in fact, paid in by Lawson to his joint account with the defendants, it was collected by the defendants from the Imperial Bank of India, and was credited by them to Lawson's joint account. The first cheque was apparently handed in over the counter ; but all the others were sent by Lawson with a covering letter, addressed to the defendants, the effect of which was as follows : "Dear Sirs,—Please place the amount of the enclosed cheque for 1,100 rupees to the credit of my joint account and oblige, Yours truly, T. D. Lawson." These personal letters from Lawson to the defendants were in each case written upon the office paper of the plaintiffs. No particular ingenuity appears to have been exercised in the perpetration of the fraud. When Lawson was in need of money, presumably to meet his losses in speculation, he issued a cheque duly signed on behalf of the plaintiffs, drawn on the Imperial Bank of India, but passed no entries until the last day of the month, when to reconcile the Imperial Bank account he debited the plaintiffs' Bombay account with their Calcutta Agency account in the books at Bombay on account of a payment to a local firm. A cheque on the Imperial Bank was made out in favour of the firm for the said payment, but the cheque was subsequently destroyed. It was Lawson's duty as accountant to check the books each day and to reconcile the Imperial Bank account, and to send to the head office a reconciliation at the end of each month. The day following the above entries they were reversed until the end of the month, when the operation was completed. There was no examination of vouchers by a senior officer, but each member of the staff went through the vouchers daily to verify his own signature. It was not the custom to exchange continuation of both inward and outward accounts with the Calcutta branch, or the fraud might have been discovered sooner. The plaintiff bank were undoubtedly negligent. Mr. Buckler, their district manager, who investigated the fraud, writes on March 27, 1924 : "I cannot think that had Bombay had an adequate staff, or trained men, Lawson would have been able to defraud the bank over a period of 23 months without detection." The same officer says in his report on April 2 : "The methods employed by Lawson disclosed very grave defects in the system at the Bombay office, or, to put it bluntly, an entire lack of system, and a complete reliance on one man who was allowed not only to make out vouchers, draw cheques, and obtain a second signature to the cheques without the slightest query, but also to check up and reconcile the accounts on which he was operating. The position of an accountant in a big office must carry a considerable amount of weight, particularly with the junior staff, but it is almost incredible that so many members of the staff should have gone on so long without querying a system by which they signed cheques blindly, or raising some protest on their own responsibility in doing so. To all intents and purposes Bombay has been a one signature branch, for the second signature is added merely on the strength of the first, and in order to conform to the rule of two signatures." A considerable body of evidence was given to explain the system by which the frauds were committed, and by which the transactions were carried out by officials, both of the plaintiff bank and of the defendant bank, but only one expert banker was called, namely, Mr. Allen, who had a large experience of Indian banking, and he was called for the plaintiffs.

I come now to the points raised, and the questions which arise are : (1) Were the defendants guilty of conversion of the cheques in question ? (2) Are they protected by the Indian Act above referred to, by reason that they have in good faith and without negligence received payment for a customer of the cheques in question ? Several points emerge for decision here which are applicable to both questions. As to (1) whether the defendants were guilty of conversion, the defendants put their argument as follows : (1) There was no conversion because we had a voidable title to the cheques in question which had not been avoided before we dealt with them by collecting the money and placing it to Lawson's account. (2) This also applies to the case made against us under the count for money had and received. The plaintiffs informed the Court that if they were successful in their case for conversion they did not desire to rely on the count for money had and received. The defendants refer to the case of Tate v. Wilts and Dorset Bank ([1899] Journal of the Institute of Bankers, vol. 20, p. 376), which they say is conclusive in their favour, and urge that, in the circumstances, they have no need to rely upon their statutory defence. Their reasoning is that this is a case where a negotiable instrument was issued by the plaintiffs who were induced, it is true, to do so by the fraud of Lawson ; but still they did issue a negotiable instrument, and it carried with it all the rights of third parties to deal with it, and the plaintiffs cannot claim to impair these third parties' rights by reason of the fact that they were induced to do what they did by the fraud of their servant. Even if Tate's case (supra) can be held to be good law since the decision in Morison's case (30 The Times L.R., 481 ; [1914] 3 K.B., 356), the facts there were entirely different, and it is not applicable to the present circumstances. The cheque there was issued, and meant to be issued, by Tate himself, and was made payable to the order of Dixon, who had a voidable title. The Court held that the banker who has collected an uncrossed cheque for a customer is protected where that customer holds under a voidable title. The learned Judge decided against this point upon the ground that the plaintiffs did not issue the document, but that the document was issued by Lawson, a fraudulent servant, as part of his fraud. There is some ground for taking this view to be found in Morison's case (supra). The fraudulent person there was a man of the name of Abbott, who issued the cheques, purporting to do so under authority which was given him by the plaintiff Morison. Lord Reading, C.J., said, at page 364 : "The cheques were at all times, until issued [i.e., by Abbott], the property of the plaintiff. They never were the property of Abbott, who had no title to them." Lord Justice Buckley said, at page 375, that the plaintiff was the true owner of the cheques in question ; and Lord Justice Phillimore, at page 378, said that the cheques were the plaintiff's instruments until he chose, or until Abbott on his behalf chose, to issue them to some outside person. There is, however, this distinction to be drawn between the present case and Morison's case (supra). In Morison's case (supra) Abbott had no authority to draw the cheques, and so the defendants' title to such cheques was defective, as Abbott issued them to the defendants in fraud of the plaintiff. In the present case Lawson had actual authority to draw cheques. I should prefer to state the point as to whether the defendants were guilty of conversion in the following way. It must be admitted that, upon a proper construction of the power of attorney, Lawson had actual authority to be one of the signatories of the cheques in question, as indeed in each case the other signatory had. Mr. Curling, the manager of the defendants' Bombay branch, admitted that Lawson had this authority jointly with another person. (See question 47 of his evidence taken on commission.) But he had no authority to send the cheque, with the private memorandum above referred to, requesting the defendants to put it to his joint account, and in doing so he was guilty of conversion, and so were the defendants who carried out his instructions. As Lord Ellenborough said in McCombie v. Davies (6 East, 538, at p. 540) : "A man is guilty of a conversion who takes my property by assignment from another who has no authority to dispose of it ; for what is that but assisting that other in carrying his wrongful act into effect ? " Both upon this ground and upon the ground taken by the learned Judge in the Court below, I am clearly of opinion that the defendants were guilty of conversion of the plaintiffs' cheques. Indeed, Morison's case (supra) is a direct authority for this proposition.

As to point 2, which is probably the most important one, are the defendants protected by the section of the Indian Act above referred to ? That depends upon whether they were guilty of negligence in these transactions. Both this section and the corresponding section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, have given great trouble to the Court. What is negligence under the circumstances ? The difficulty is that the statute does not speak of any corresponding duty, but leaves that to be inferred. I think the duty of the defendants to the true owner of the cheque was (1) to exercise the same care and forethought with regard to the cheque paid in by the customer as a reasonable man would bring to bear on similar business of his own (see Sir John Paget on Banking, 4th Edition, page 274), and (2) to provide a reasonable and competent staff to carry out this duty.

There are numerous tests which have been applied in the Courts from time to time suggesting what may or may not be negligence. For example, a bank may be negligent in not making inquiries as to a customer on opening an account—Ladbroke v. Todd (30 The Times L.R., 433), Commissioners of Taxation v. English, Scottish, and Australian Bank (36 The Times L.R., 305 ; [1920] A.C., 683)—and there may be negligence in not noticing the account of the customer from time to time and considering whether it is a proper or a suspicious one. See Morison's case (supra). In this case the plaintiffs formulate their charges of negligence in the following way. They say : (1) Lawson, an employee of the plaintiffs, was transferring large sums of money from the plaintiff bank to the defendant bank. Why ?

If he had an account at the plaintiff bank only, the money would be accessible there. (2) Heavy payments were made directly afterwards to persons some of whom the defendants knew to be stockbrokers. (3) The methods by which the transfers were made were uncommon transactions ; they were not made by a cheque drawn by Lawson on his own account with the plaintiffs, but by cheque purported to be drawn by the plaintiffs on the Imperial Bank of India in favour of the defendants. (4) They were accompanied by a memorandum signed by Lawson in person instructing the defendants to put the cheque in question to the credit of his joint account. (5) One signatory to the cheque was always Lawson himself, and the cheque was, as stated above, accompanied by the personal memorandum from Lawson himself, which was on the plaintiffs' printed form but was not signed by two, as the cheque was. The defendants seek to avoid this by referring to the pay slips above mentioned, which were admittedly honest transactions, and to this the plaintiffs reply : True, they were honest transactions, but the pay slips are equivalent to cheques drawn by Lawson on his own account with the plaintiffs. They are quite different from the fraudulent cheques, which have nothing to do with Lawson's own account. It would be difficult for a lawyer to come to a conclusion merely upon the argument of counsel, but here in this case there is evidence upon which the Court can act. For example, Mr. Curling, the defendants' manager at Bombay, at page 23 of Document 8, said : "I feel that the Chartered Bank should have queried receiving cheques in their own favour, and not in favour of Lawson, when drawn by Cox and Co. and/or Lloyds Bank on their account at the Imperial Bank ; I also feel that their attention should have been more closely drawn to that, owing to the fact that one of the signatories on every cheque was Lawson ; I feel, further, that the Chartered Bank must have known that Lawson was an employee of Cox and Co., and Lloyds Bank in turn owing to the fact that the memoranda which Lawson sent covering the cheques for his credit were all on paper bearing the title of Cox and Co. or Lloyds Bank," and Mr. Lane, the deputy manager of the Bombay branch, said in the same document, at page 121, as follows : "I consider that the defendants were negligent not once but many times in accepting instructions from a private individual regarding the disposal of a cheque made payable to themselves which was not signed by the individual giving instructions." And at page 129 he further says : "I have said in my evidence that if I was giving a confidential opinion I should see that the account was never overdrawn and describe the account as a satisfactory account, and seeing that there were considerable sums of money passing through, I would describe it as 'means fair,' but if I had any reason for suspicion I should have examined the items in the account and if I did that I should find that constant differences were being paid to share brokers in Bombay, which would give any bank man the feeling that this man was speculating." Mr. Lenney, of the defendants, at question 655 of Document 9, excused the bank by referring to the above-mentioned honest transactions, but the independent witness already referred to, Mr. Allen, said, on page 81 of Document 6a, in answer to the question, "Ought it to have gone through ? " " (A.)—Oh no. If I like to put a young man in a position where he should exercise discretion and he is not capable of doing it I cannot shield behind him, I am afraid. (Q.)—If that young man, with such knowledge of his business as he should have had, had stopped and looked at the cheque, and looked at the paying-in slip, and examined both documents, ought he to have let it go through ? (A.)—Oh no. He should have queried it to his manager." With reference to the last answer of Mr. Allen, the admission is made in the correspondence by Mr. Buckler on March 27, where he says : "I cannot think that had Bombay had an adequate staff of trained men Lawson would have been able to defraud the bank over a period of 23 months without detection." Mr. Justice Bailhache in Ross v. London County Westminster and Parr's Bank, Limited (35 The Times L.R., 315 ; [1919] 1 K.B., 678, at p. 685), says : "I must, however, attribute to the cashiers and clerks of the defendants the degree of intelligence and care ordinarily required of persons in their position to fit them for the discharge of their duties. It is therefore necessary to consider whether a bank cashier of ordinary intelligence and care on having these cheques presented to him by a private customer of the bank would be informed by the terms of the cheques themselves that it was open to doubt whether the customer had a good title to them." Lord Dunedin says, in Commissioners of Taxation v. English, Scottish, and Australian Bank (supra), approving the words of Mr. Justice Isaacs in the High Court of Australia : " 'Apart from the well-established rule that whether or not the evidence establishes that a person acts without negligence is a question of fact, the legal principles found in Morison v. London County and Westminster Bank, Limited (supra) and relevant to the present are : (1) That the question should in strictness be determined separately with regard to each cheque ; (2) that the test of negligence is whether the transaction of paying in any given cheque was so out of the ordinary course that it ought to have aroused doubts in the bankers' mind, and caused them to make inquiry.' If there be inserted after the words 'given cheque' the words 'coupled with the circumstances antecedent and present' their Lordships think this is an accurate statement of the law."

The items of negligence to which I am disposed to attach the greatest importance are : (1) The fact that the defendants knew that Lawson was an employee of the plaintiffs and was transferring these large sums of money from the plaintiff bank to the defendant bank, and (2) the methods by which the transfer was made.

In my view, a bank cannot be held to be liable for negligence merely because they have not subjected an account to a microscopic examination. It is not to be expected that the officials of banks should also be amateur detectives. It is not easy, nor is it desirable, to define the degree of negligence which would render them liable. Many factors have to be taken into consideration, the customer, the account, and the surrounding circumstances. But, whilst it is difficult to draw the line, the problem upon which side of the line a particular case falls does not present such difficulties. Having regard to the uncommon nature of the cheques in question, having regard to the fact that Lawson was an employee of the plaintiffs, as was well known by the defendants, and having regard to the heavy payments made at crucial times to persons known to be brokers, I cannot come to any other conclusion but that the defendants were negligent in this case.

In the case of Bissell and Co. v. Fox Brothers and Co. (51 L.T., 663), Mr. Justice Denman said, at page 666, in reference to section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, which is similar to the words in the Indian Code, "It is clear, I think, that the negligence contemplated in section 82 must mean the neglect of such reasonable precautions as ought to be taken with reference to the interests, not of the customer who purports to have the authority, but of the principal whose authority he purports to have, the section being framed wholly with reference to the liability of the banker to the 'true owner' of the cheque and not with reference to his liability to his customer." That statement was approved on appeal (1 The Times L.R., 452 ; 53 L.T., 193), and is, I think, followed by Mr. Justice Kennedy in Hannan's Lake View Central, Limited v. Armstrong and Co. (16 The Times L.R., 236), although in Ladbroke v. Todd (supra), Mr. Justice Bailhache, at page 261, puts it rather differently. Who, then, is the true owner of the cheque to whom the bank owes the duty ? The defendants' contention was that they were the true owners, and the duty in such circumstances was one which they owed to themselves only, and therefore they could not be guilty of negligence towards the plaintiffs. In my wiew, this is wholly inapplicable. The plaintiffs were the true owners of the cheques in question. (See the judgment of Lord Justice Buckley in Morison's case (supra), at p. 375.) It is not necessary, in my view, to discuss all the points raised, having regard to the conclusion to which I have come on the main points. It is only necessary to refer to the second cheque of July 10, 1922, which was credited to Lawson before it was cleared. In my view, the defendants have no defence to that, as they did not receive payment for the customer within the meaning of the section and they were not collecting it for their customer. I think under the Indian Code, the original payee of a cheque can be a holder in due course, the Indian Act differing from the English Act in this respect, under which Viscount Cave, Lord Chancellor, in R. E. Jones, Limited v. Waring and Gillow, Limited (42 The Times L.R., 644 ; [1926] A.C., 670, at p. 680), held that the original payee of a cheque was not a holder in due course, and I do not think the principles laid down by the majority of the Court in Reckitt's case (44 The Times L.R., 428) assist the defendants. There was ample material which should have aroused the defendants' suspicions and put them on inquiry with regard to this cheque. The defendants contended that, even if they were negligent, they were entitled to say that after a time they were, as it is put in Morison's case (supra), "lulled to sleep" (see per Lord Justice Buckley, at p. 377) by the plaintiffs' failure to take proper precautions, and, therefore, they ought not to be held liable in this case, where the plaintiffs were themselves so negligent. This doctrine of lulling to sleep, as it was called during the course of the argument, must depend either upon estoppel or upon ratification, and, having regard to the facts of the present case, I do not think that the doctrine is applicable or that it can be said that anything which the plaintiffs did ratified the defendants' actions or created an estoppel preventing the plaintiffs from succeeding in this action. Giving the best consideration I can to this matter, I have reached the conclusion that the charges of negligence set up by the plaintiffs have been made out and the defendants cannot rely on the Indian Act as a defence.

In the result, I think the appeal of the defendants must be dismissed, and there remains to be considered the cross-appeal of the plaintiffs. The facts here may be stated shortly. It is said that some of the proceeds of the fraudulent cheques found their way back into Lawson's account at the plaintiff bank, and that, therefore, credit must be given in this action for the amount of those cheques. The number of the cheques is twenty-four, amounting to £4,574 0s. 10d., and the particulars will be found in paragraph 10 (a) of the defence. It is clear on the authorities that the damages for conversion of a cheque are the face value of it. The law has always regarded very jealously the conversion of a man's property by another, Edmondson v. Nuttall (17 C.B., N.S., 280). But where the defendant in an action for conversion is able to prove that the plaintiff has got back part of the proceeds of the property wrongfully converted, he is pro tanto excused. See Hiort v. London and North Western Railway Co. (4 Ex.D., 188). Bannatyne v. MacIver ([1906] 1 K.B., 103), where the defendant was entitled to take credit for the sums which he had used for paying the legal debts of the plaintiffs, and Reversion Fund and Insurance Company, Limited v. Maison Cosway, Limited ([1913] 1 K.B., 364), where Bannatyne v. MacIver (supra) was commented upon, are distinguishable.

The defendants have not satisfied me that the plaintiffs did get back any of the proceeds of the cheques. Part of the proceeds were paid for or into Lawson's account when it was in debit and therefore went to pay the debt of Lawson. Part of them went into Lawson's account when it was in credit and were used by him for his own purposes. It is impossible to say that any part of the proceeds of the fraudulent cheques was received by the plaintiffs.

In my view, therefore, credit cannot be given for them and the cross-appeal should be allowed with costs.

Mr. Justice Tomlin.—Upon the facts of this case I think that, though each of the fraudulent cheques was on its face signed in accordance with the apparent authority, no one of them passed from Lloyds Bank (in which expression I include Cox's Bank and their successors in title) into the possession of the Chartered Bank under any authority from Lloyds Bank either actual or apparent. Each cheque was signed by Lawson in furtherance of his fraudulent purpose, and by the other signatory for some other purpose in respect of which he was deceived by Lawson. Having been signed the cheque was never passed officially out of the custody of Lloyds Bank to the Chartered Bank. Lawson acting in his private capacity was the sole channel of communication between the two banks, and the only instruction to the Chartered Bank was, in one case, a pay-in slip, and, in the other cases, a written memo, signed by Lawson in his personal capacity and purporting to direct that the proceeds of the relative cheque should be placed to the credit of the joint account of Lawson and his wife with the Chartered Bank.

Now it is not admissible, in my opinion, in these circumstances to separate the signing of the cheque from the acts whereby the cheque and the instructions for dealing with it passed into the hands of the Chartered Bank. The transaction must, I think, in each case be regarded as a whole for the purpose of determining where the property in the cheque lay, and, upon the facts which I have mentioned, it remained in my judgment with Lloyds Bank. If this be the true view, I think that the Chartered Bank are liable for conversion in respect of the 19 cheques unless they can escape by bringing themselves within the protection of section 131 of the Indian statute, the Negotiable Instruments Act, 1881, and I may add here, in regard to the second cheque, that I agree with the learned Judge below that the Chartered Bank are in no better position because they advanced money to Lawson against this cheque before it was cleared.

Now I cannot doubt that the protection, which section 131 affords to a banker, by necessary implication imposes upon the banker, as a condition of the benefit conferred, a duty of care towards some one or more of the persons who may be affected by his action. It may be difficult to define in general terms applicable to every case the person to whom the duty is owed or the ambit of the duty itself, but, if the section applies here, I think there was upon the Chartered Bank a prima facie duty towards Lloyds Bank as the apparent drawers of the cheque, and that the Chartered Bank might have expressed to themselves that duty in some such terms as these : "Here is a cheque of Lloyds Bank drawn on their account at the Imperial Bank to our order although we have no claim against Lloyds Bank requiring to be satisfied out of it. It has come to our hands, not from Lloyds Bank acting through any of its authorized officials, but from a person who, though an official of the bank, is acting in his personal capacity only, and who, though one of the signatories of the cheque, is claiming the money for his own benefit. In this state of affairs we must treat the cheque as still belonging to Lloyds Bank until an official direction is obtained."

The first question is, does the section apply at all ? It is said it does not because (1) Lawson had no title to the cheque, and (2) because the Chartered Bank being the payees did not collect the cheque for a customer. Upon the construction of the section I do not think that its operation is confined to cases where there is some title though a defective one, but extends to cases where there is no title at all. Further, having regard to the decision in Morison v. London County and Westminster Bank, Limited (30 The Times L.R., 481 ; [1914] 3 K.B., 356), where one of the cheques was drawn to the order of the collecting bank, I do not think that it would be possible to hold that in the present case the Chartered Bank did not collect for a customer. To do so would be to put upon the Indian section, which is substantially identical with section 82 of the English Act, a meaning different from that attributed to the latter section by this Court. The section therefore, in my opinion, applies, and the next question is whether the Chartered Bank have established that they acted in good faith and, having regard to the duty resting on them, without negligence. In view of what the Bank actually did, I do not think that they can establish that they acted without negligence, though admittedly acting in good faith, unless they can justify their conduct either (1) by reference to some recognized banking practice, or (2) by reason of some special circumstances in the case. The learned Judge below has not found, nor do I think the evidence established, the existence of any special banking practice to justify the course taken by the Chartered Bank. The Chartered Bank, however, rely upon certain special circumstances which, they say, relieve them of the charge of negligence.

The point may be put shortly in this way. Before the first fraudulent cheque was presented, that is, before March 31, 1922, Lloyds Bank had been from time to time paying considerable sums of money to Lawson by means of pay slips signed by Lawson on behalf of Lloyds Bank. These pay slips Lawson passed to the Chartered Bank for collection for the credit of his joint account, and in two instances the pay slips had been drawn in favour of the Chartered Bank and had come to the Chartered Bank from Lawson in his personal capacity with a private memorandum of Lawson instructing the Chartered Bank to credit the proceeds to the joint account. These were all legitimate payments, and it is said that, having regard to them, any suspicion which the first fraudulent cheque ought otherwise to have aroused might reasonably have been allayed, and that there was still less ground for suspicion in the case of the second fraudulent cheque which was received some four months after the first, with a pay slip transaction intervening between them, and that when it was found that no question arose on the pay slip transactions or on the first two cheques a fortiori there was no reason to treat as suspicious the subsequent cheques. I do not think that this contention can be supported. The pay slip transactions differed in at least two material respects from the cheque transactions. They were for substantially smaller amounts, and the money receivable in respect of them was payable directly by Lloyds Bank. When the first fraudulent cheque was received it was a transaction of a novel and, in my opinion, of a suspicious character, and I do not think that the prior pay slip transactions justified the omission of any precaution which ought otherwise to have been taken. If the first cheque transaction was suspicious, I think that each repetition of the transaction was calculated to aggravate rather than to allay suspicion. There can be no presumption that every fraud must be discovered or that discovery must be made within any given time, and, except upon the basis of some such presumption, I am unable to see why the Chartered Bank should have been entitled to assume that the absence of complaint in respect of any one transaction established the regularity of that or any subsequent transaction. In my judgment nothing short of estoppel or ratification would assist the Chartered Bank, and upon the facts I do not think that either estoppel or ratification is made out. I think therefore that the appeal fails and should be dismissed with costs.

There remains the question on the cross-appeal, whether the money paid by Lawson to Lloyds Bank ought to be treated as having diminished the damages for conversion. When Lawson was credited in his account with the Chartered Bank with the proceeds of the fraudulent cheques, he from time to time drew upon the credit balances thus created cheques either in favour of Lloyds Bank or in his own favour and used these cheques either (1) to discharge his indebtedness to Lloyds Bank in respect of overdrafts on his account with them or other liabilities of his own to Lloyds Bank, or (2) to supplement the balances to the credit of his account with Lloyds Bank and thus enable him to continue his drawings upon them. These sums the learned Judge has allowed as a deduction from the damages for conversion. I do not think that they ought to have been so allowed. The principle of such cases as Bannatyne v. MacIver ([1906] 1 K.B., 103) has, in my opinion, no application to the facts of the present case. No part of the money wrongfully obtained from Lloyds Bank was ever paid to them or applied for their benefit as their money. The payments made by Lawson were made as out of his own money to discharge his own debts to Lloyds Bank, or to create as between them and him the relation of banker and customer, and to enable him to draw, as he did in fact draw, for further sums upon them. The damage to Lloyds Bank was not diminished by these payments. The only effect of deducting them would be either to increase the claim of Lloyds Bank against Lawson, or to leave Lloyds Bank without any right to recover the amount of them from any one at all.

I think, therefore, that the judgment below was wrong in this respect, and that the cross-appeal on this head should succeed with costs.

MARSLAND v. TAGGART.*

Justices—Case stated—Death of justice after hearing in police court—Case signed by two surviving justices—Validity—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857 (20 and 21 Vict., c. 43), s. 2.

The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857, s. 2, provides: "After the hearing and determination by a justice or justices of the peace of any information or complaint which he or they have power to determine in a summary way . . . either party to the proceeding before the said justice or justices may, if dissatisfied with the said determination, as being erroneous in point of law, apply in writing . . . to the said justice or justices to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and the grounds of such determination, for the opinion thereon of one of the superior courts of law. . . ."

The effect of this section is not to oust the jurisdiction of the High Court to entertain an appeal by case stated where the case is signed by only two of the three justices who heard the complaint in the police court, the reason for the absence of the signature of the third justice being that he has died between the determination of the complaint and the statement of the case.

A preliminary objection taken to the hearing of this case stated by Derbyshire justices raised the question whether the absence from the case of the signature of one of the justices who had died after the hearing of the matter in the police court deprived the High Court of jurisdiction to entertain the appeal.

On May 30, 1927, Joseph Marsland, the appellant and surveyor for the Mellor parish of the rural district council of Hayfield, Derbyshire, preferred a complaint against Aaron Taggart, the respondent, under section 19, subsection 2, of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1907, alleging that certain necessary repairs to a street known as Shiloh-road, in the parish of Mellor, of which the respondent was a frontager, and which was not a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, had been executed by the Hayfield rural district council after the respondent had failed to do them. The appellant claimed £22 3s., the cost of the repairs.

The complaint came before Derbyshire justices sitting at New Mills on June 29, 1927. The hearing was adjourned until August 3 and then until August 24 when the claim was dismissed with costs. Three justices—Mr. Reekie, Mr. Chell and Mr. Wainwright—heard the complaint. On August 30 the appellant applied to the justices to state and sign a case for the opinion of the High Court. On September 23 Mr. Wainwright died and the case, which was stated on November 18, was signed only by Mr. Reekie and Mr. Chell.

Mr. Scholefield, K.C., and Mr. Ridgeway Bennett appeared for the appellant; Mr. Montgomery, K.C., and Mr. R. W. Leach for the respondent.

When the case was called on, Mr. Leach took the preliminary objection that in view of the terms of section 2 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857, the fact that only two of the three justices who had heard the complaint had signed the case ousted the jurisdiction of the Court to deal with the matter.

After argument the following judgments were delivered:—

The Lord Chief Justice.—The objection which is taken here is that the Court has no jurisdiction to hear this appeal by way of case stated because the case is signed by only two of the three justices who heard the complaint, the third having died between the date of the justices' decision and the date of the statement of the case. There is no doubt that in ordinary circumstances all the justices who have heard an information or complaint are required to state and sign a special case. As was said by Lord Alverstone, C.J., in Barker v. Hodgson (68 J.P., 310): "I attach considerable importance to the signatures of all the justices being affixed to a case, especially of the minority, in a case like this where there has been a difference of opinion." That judgment was concurred in by Mr. Justice Darling and Mr. Justice Channell. But in that case the reason why some of the justices had refrained from signing the case was that they dissented from the decision of the Court. The present case raises no such question. Nothing depends on the volition of any individual. The signature is absent because the signatory is dead.

On the matters so raised the case which appears to be relevant is Kean v. Robinson ([1910] 2 I.R., 306). There a case, the draft of which had been agreed on behalf of the parties, had been approved and signed by one of three justices who had heard the complaint. The second justice had also approved the case, but he had died without signing it, while the third justice had died without having either approved or signed it. The question arose whether the King's Bench Division in Ireland had jurisdiction in those circumstances to hear the case, and the majority of the Court decided that it had. One, at any rate, of the grounds of that decision was concisely stated by Mr. Justice Madden when he said ([1910] 2 I.R., at p. 319): "An authority which affords a satisfactory basis for my judgment is Reg. v. Leicestershire Justices (15 Q.B., 88). In that case the sending of notice of appeal was, by the statute, a condition precedent to the right of appeal. The person upon whom the notice should have been served was dead at the time of posting the notice. It was held—I quote from the judgment of Mr. Justice Patteson—'that, as the duty of the appellant to give such notice was cast upon him by the law, not by his own voluntary contract, he is excused from performing that duty by its becoming impossible by the act of God.'" Those words of Mr. Justice Patteson were also cited with approval by Lord O'Brien, C.J., who said ([1910] 2 I.R., at p. 321): "This is the language of Mr. Justice Patteson, stating what is now the well-established law. It draws the familiar distinction between a duty created by law and a duty created by voluntary contract, when a party can introduce any stipulation he likes." Those observations were made as illustrating the principles Actus Dei nemini injuriam facit and Lex non cogit ad impossibilia.

Kean v. Robinson (supra) went to the Court of Appeal in Ireland ([1910] 2 I.R., at p. 323), where the Court ordered the case to be struck out because the decision of the King's Bench Division, which had been said to have no jurisdiction, was final. In my opinion, similar considerations apply here. As the reason of the absence of the signature is the death of the justice who would otherwise have signed it this Court has jurisdiction to proceed with this matter.

MR. JUSTICE AVORY agreed.

MR. JUSTICE SHEARMAN said that he was of the same opinion. Justices came and went, but justice itself should endure. He saw no sense in an objection which meant that when the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857, provided that an aggrieved party might apply to the justices to state and sign a case, justice should come to an end because one of the justices who had heard the complaint or information happened to die. That sort of objection ought to be as extinct as the thumbscrew.

The Court proceeded to hear and to allow the appeal on its merits, but the decision does not call for report.

PICKUP v. DENTAL BOARD OF THE UNITED KINGDOM.*

Dentists—Register—Erasure of name—Conviction — "Felony or misdemeanour" — Offence triable summarily—Dentists Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict., c. 33), s. 13—Dentists Act, 1921 (11 and 12 Geo. V., c. 21), s. 8.

The power given to the General Medical Council by s. 13 of the Dentists Act, 1878, as amended by s. 8 of the Dentists Act, 1921, to erase from the Dental Register the name of any dentist who has been convicted of "felony or misdemeanour," includes a power of erasure in the case of an offence triable summarily and not upon indictment.

This was an appeal under section 9 of the Dentists Act, 1921, from an order of the General Medical Council that the name of Mr. James Pickup should be erased from the Dentists' Register on the ground that he had been convicted of misdemeanours within the meaning of section 13 of the Dentists Act, 1878. Under that section, as amended by section 8 of the Dentists Act, 1921, it is the duty of the Dental Board to hold an inquiry in cases where it is alleged that a registered dentist is liable to have his name erased from the register under that section, and on the report of the Board the General Medical Council may order the name to be erased. The section provides:—

"Where a person registered in the dentists' register has, either before or after the passing of this Act, and either before or after he is so registered, been convicted either in her Majesty's Dominions or elsewhere of an offence which, if committed in England, would be a felony or misdemeanour, or been guilty of any infamous or disgraceful conduct in a professional respect, that person shall be liable to have his name erased from the register. . . .

"Provided that the name of a person shall not be erased under this section . . . on account of a conviction for an offence which, though within the provisions of this section, does not, either from the trivial nature of the offence or from the circumstances under which it was committed, disqualify a person for practising dentistry. . . ."

Mr. Maurice Healy appeared for the appellant; Mr. Cecil Whiteley, K.C., and Mr. D. C. Bartley for the Dental Board.

THE LORD CHIEF JUSTICE (Lord Hewart), in giving judgment, said that the question of substance raised by the appeal was what was the true meaning of the expression "misdemeanour" in section 13 of the Dentists Act, 1878. The scheme and method of that section were quite clear. [His Lordship read it.] It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the word "misdemeanour" in that section meant "misdemeanour triable on indictment." In his opinion that contention could not be supported. His Lordship referred to a passage in the judgment of Lord Alverstone, C.J., in Du Cros v. Lambourne (23 The Times L.R., 3; [1907] 1 K.B., 40, at p. 44).

When one looked at the words of the section which they had to construe, he thought that it was clear that the meaning of "misdemeanour" was not confined to "indictable misdemeanour." It seemed from the proviso that it was contemplated that the offences might be of a trivial nature, and that because of their trivial nature the person convicted might be allowed to retain his name on the register. It seemed to be contemplated that the conditions of the section might be fulfilled and the liability to erasure incurred for offences which, by their trivial nature, made the application of the proviso proper. He thought, therefore, that the appeal should be dismissed.

Poor Law—Relief by way of loan—Information against person relieved — Jurisdiction of magistrate—Poor Law Act, 1927 (17 and 18 Geo. V., c. 14), s. 46 (1).

A court of summary jurisdiction is not "a court for the recovery of small debts" within s. 46 (1) of the Poor Law Act, 1927.

This was a case stated by the stipendiary magistrate for the Division of Caerphilly Higher, Glamorgan. The appellant, on behalf of the guardians of the Merthyr Tydfil Union, preferred an information against the respondent alleging that the appellant had given to the respondent relief by way of loan amounting to £23 6s. The respondent admitted the relief, but objected to the jurisdiction of the magistrate on the ground that a court of summary jurisdiction could not make an order against a debtor for the recovery of a civil debt except under statutory authority, and that there was no such authority applicable to relief by way of loan.

* Reported by J. W. HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The appellant contended that such relief might be recovered in a court of summary jurisdiction by virtue of section 8 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1848, which was re-enacted in section 46 (1) of the Poor Law Act, 1927, which provides :—

"Any relief granted by way of loan to any person may be recovered in the county court or other court for the recovery of small debts for the district wherein the poor law union or the greater part thereof is comprised, on the plaint of the Board of Guardians."

The respondent replied that that section only applied to a county court or some other civil court for the recovery of small debts analogous thereto.

The stipendiary magistrate held that he had no jurisdiction to make an order under section 46 (1), and that an application should have been made under subsections (2) and (3) for recovery of the amount through the respondent's employer.

Mr. Vaughan Williams, K.C., and Mr. Wilfrid Lewis appeared for the appellant; Mr. Artemus Jones, K.C., and Mr. J. MacMillan for the respondent.

The Lord Chief Justice (Lord Hewart), in giving judgment, said that it was a little important to observe the contention of the appellant in the court below. It was one contention, in plain language, and was set out in the case as follows :—

"For the appellant it was contended that such relief may be recovered in a court of summary jurisdiction by virtue of section 8 of the Poor Law Act of 1848, which has been re-enacted in section 46, subsection 1, of the Poor Law Act, 1927."

The magistrate, having before him the objection taken by the respondent and the reply thereto, decided that the application should not have been made under section 46 (1), but under the later subsections, which contemplated a different procedure with the presence of the employer. He decided that he had no jurisdiction and dismissed the information.

It was quite obvious on reading the case that the contest before the magistrate was : What was the true meaning of section 46 (1) ? It was clear that the appellant's argument was that the magistrate's court was a court for the recovery of small debts. The magistrate rejected that argument, and was right in so doing. It was really sufficient to decide the case on that ground.

But they had listened to a long and interesting argument on another contention, exactly the opposite of that in the case—namely, an argument that, because the information was preferred before October 1, 1927, a right survived from the Poor Relief Act, 1819, section 29, to proceed in a court of summary jurisdiction, notwithstanding all the intervening legislation.

That was a point not taken below, it was the opposite of the point taken below, and it was not open to the appellant on the facts of the case. If it had been open it was clear that the Poor Law Act, 1927, was a consolidating statute, the object of which, inter alia, was to get rid of the remnants of the Act of 1819. He said "the remnants" of the Act of 1819, because section 29 was repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1873, and the appellant's argument involved the proposition that the jurisdiction remained after the repeal of the section creating it. It would be pessimi exempli to allow a point to be taken which was not only not in the case, but was the direct opposite of the point taken in the case.

Mr. Justice Avory delivered judgment to the same effect.

Mr. Justice Shearman concurred.

BENNETT v. EWENS.*

Gaming—Whist-drive—Charge for admission—Prizes—Offence—Betting Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict., c. 119), s. 1.

The holding of a whist-drive, with a charge for admission and the offer of prizes, is an offence against s. 1 of the Betting Act, 1853.

This was a case stated by Hampshire justices. The appellant, Mr. Sydney Bennett, a police officer, preferred an information charging Mr. Ivor Ewens, the respondent,

"That he on November 14, 1927, in a room in the Alexandra Hall, Bordon, unlawfully did use the said room for the purpose of certain money being received on behalf of the said occupier as and for the consideration of a certain assurance, undertaking, promise, or agreement to pay or give thereafter a certain valuable thing, to wit, a voucher on the happening of a certain event or contingency of and relating to a card game, to wit, whist, contrary to section 1 of the Betting Act, 1853."

On November 14, 1927, a notice outside the Alexandra Hall, Bordon, of which the respondent was the owner or occupier, advertised that a whist-drive would be held there that evening, that admission would be 1s., and that prizes would be given to the value of £5.

Two police officers attended, paid 2s., and received a card entitling them to play as partners throughout the evening. After each hand the partners moved so as to meet another pair of opponents. There were 39 or 40 tables, and after a certain number of hands had been played prizes of £3, £1, 12s., 6s., and 2s. were given in the form of vouchers on shops in the district.

After the whist-drive there was a "knockout competition," for which an entrance fee of 3d. was charged. In the first round three hands were played at each table, the losers then dropping out. In subsequent rounds one hand was played, till finally there was one pair undefeated, who received a voucher for £1. The losers in the final round received a voucher for 5s.

The appellant contended that the offence was proved, and that it was immaterial whether whist as played was a game of skill or not. He referred to Rex v. Peers and Brown (33 The Times L.R., 231), Peers v. Caldwell, Taylor v. Caldwell (32 The Times L.R., 190; [1916] 1 K.B., 371).

The respondent contended (1) that those cases related to automatic machines and were not applicable to a game of cards; (2) that a card game was not a game within the meaning of the Betting Act, 1853; and (3) that whist as played on this occasion was a game of skill.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The justices, being of opinion that the game of whist as played was not an event or contingency, and did not amount to a betting transaction within the Act, dismissed the information.

Mr. W. E. Lloyd appeared for the appellant; the respondent was not represented.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE (Lord Hewart), in giving judgment allowing the appeal, said that he thought the case was too clear for argument. The case showed that money prizes to the value of £5 were offered in the whist-drive itself, the entrance fee being 1s., and that in the supplementary competition the entrance fee was 3d. and the prizes amounted to 25s. The justices came to the conclusion that the game of whist as played was not an event or contingency within the meaning of the Betting Act, 1853. The offence was the promising to give a valuable thing on the happening of a contingency relating to that game—namely, victory or defeat. The case was covered by Peers v. Caldwell (32 The Times L.R., 190; [1916] 1 K.B., 371) and Rex v. Peers and Brown (33 The Times L.R., 231). It was clear that the justices misdirected themselves and that the case ought to go back to them to convict.

MR. JUSTICE AVORY agreed.

MR. JUSTICE SHEARMAN agreed. There were formidable arguments put before the Court in 1915 that this kind of thing was not within the Betting Act, 1853. The Court decided the other way, and frequent attempts were made, especially in Rex v. Peers and Brown (33 The Times L.R., 231), to upset the decision but without success. It was now too late, and those cases settled the law.

MORE v. WEAVER.*

Defamation—Libel—Privilege—Absolute privilege—Letter to solicitor from client.

Defamatory written communications made to a solicitor by a client for the purpose of obtaining professional advice and assistance are absolutely privileged.

This action was brought by Miss Kathleen Frances Mervin More, of Lancaster-street, W., who claimed from Miss Flora Gertrude Weaver damages for alleged libel which, she said, was contained in letters which the defendant had sent to her solicitor.

The defendant denied that the words complained of were defamatory, and pleaded that the letters were privileged.

The plaintiff appeared in person. Mr. Rayner Goddard, K.C., and Mr. O'Hagan were for the defendant.

Miss More gave evidence and called three witnesses.

Mr. GODDARD submitted that in so far as the statements complained of were libels, which he denied, they were privileged. He also contended that there was no evidence of malice. He said that there had been no decision on this particular point of privilege, but that the question of defamatory matter in letters written by a client to a solicitor had been referred to in several cases. He submitted that the letter in question was absolutely privileged, and that if it were held that the privilege was only qualified there was no evidence of malice.

His LORDSHIP, in giving judgment, said that although only a line or two had been abstracted from the defendant's letters, it was quite obvious that they were communications which she had made to her solicitor for the purpose of his advising and assisting her. In his opinion, by the law of this country, those communications were absolutely privileged. He thought that there was ample authority for that statement of the law to be found in the opinion of Lord Bowen in Browne v. Dunn (6 R., 67, at p. 80). He was fortified in his view that that was a correct statement of the law by a passage in "The Law of Libel," by the late Mr. Justice Fraser, at p. 190, where he suggested that the privilege in such a case as the present one was an absolute privilege, and that the decision in Morgan v. Wallis (33 The Times L.R., 495) would not now be upheld in the Court of Appeal.

In those circumstances he held that the communications in question were absolutely privileged, and that no action for defamation lay in respect of them. If he were wrong in that view, and those libels were the subject of a qualified privilege, then there was no evidence of any malice to destroy that privilege. In either event there was no case to go to the jury and the action failed. There would be judgment for the defendant with costs.

The plaintiff intimated that she would appeal.

BRISTOL CORPORATION v. VIRGIN AND OTHERS.*

Housing—Notice to repair premises—Service on owner of fee simple—Notice not complied with—Statutory charge—Priority to fee farm rentcharge previously reserved—Housing Act, 1925 (15 Geo. V., c. 14), s. 3 (3).

A charge conferred on a local authority in respect of repairs by section 3 of the Housing Act, 1925, is a charge on the whole of the proprietary interests of the premises, and therefore obtains priority over a fee farm rentcharge previously reserved on the grant of the fee simple.

Paddington Borough Council v. Finucane ([1928] W.N., 100) followed.

This was an appeal from a decision of his Honour Judge Parsons, sitting at the Bristol County Court, who had held that the statutory charge granted to a local authority by section 3 (3) of the Housing Act, 1925, in respect of repairs did not take priority over a fee farm rentcharge already granted by the owner of the premises.

Section 3 (3) of the Housing Act, 1925, provides: "Any expenses incurred by the local authority [on account of repairs] . . . may be recovered in a court of summary jurisdiction and until recovery of such expenses . . . the same shall be a charge on the premises. . . ."

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment of Mr. Justice Salter :—

By an indenture dated September 30, 1905, the defendant Mr. Joseph Horsey Cordeux (therein called the grantor) granted to the defendant Mr. Alfred Charles Virgin (therein called the grantee) the land and house then in course of erection, 57, Seneca-street, Bristol, to hold the said premises unto the grantee to the use that the grantor should have in fee simple a perpetual rentcharge of £3 issuing out of the said land and premises, and subject to the said rentcharge and to the statutory powers and remedies for recovering payment thereof to the use of the grantee in fee simple. The indenture contained a covenant by the grantee to pay the rentcharge, to complete the house, to keep it in repair, to insure it and to reinstate it if damaged by fire or tempest and gave a right of re-entry for non-payment of the rentcharge or other breach of covenant. The defendant Virgin afterwards mortgaged to the defendants Bevan Hancock and Co.

The premises being premises to which the Housing Act, 1925, applied, and having become out of repair, the plaintiffs served a notice to repair on the defendant Virgin under section 3 of that Act, and in default of compliance by him with such notice they did the work at a cost of £60 10s.

The plaintiffs sued in the Bristol County Court claiming, inter alia, a declaration that they were entitled under section 3 of the Housing Act, 1925, to a charge on the premises in question, and that such charge ranked in priority to the mortgage of the defendants Bevan Hancock and Co. and to the fee farm rent vested in the defendant Cordeux. The learned Judge held that the plaintiffs were entitled to the charge and that it ranked in priority to the mortgage, but not to the fee farm rent.

The plaintiffs appealed.

The Hon. R. Stafford Cripps, K.C., and Mr. R. Gilbert appeared for the appellants ; the respondents did not appear and were not represented.

The following considered judgment was read by Mr. Justice Salter [after stating the facts as set out above].—The plaintiffs are admittedly entitled to a charge on the premises, and the question is whether such charge ranks in priority to the rentcharge of the defendant Cordeux.

By the Law of Property Act, 1925, section 1 (2) (b), a perpetual rentcharge in possession issuing out of land is a legal interest in or charge over land. By section 205 (1) (xxiii.) rentcharge includes a fee farm rent. By section 121 remedies are given for the recovery of annual sums charged on land if such remedies might have been conferred by the instrument creating the charge, and such remedies include a right to distrain and a right to enter and receive the rents. By section 146 (5) (a) "lease" includes a grant at a fee farm rent.

Section 3 (3) of the Housing Act, 1925, provides that the expenses incurred by the local authority on account of repairs may be recovered from the owner, "and until recovery of such expenses and interest the same shall be a charge on the premises." In the absence of authority it might be suggested that Parliament did not intend that this charge should override existing charges, but that it should be such a charge as the defaulting owner could give. The decided cases make it clear that the words are not to be so restricted, and if it is admitted that the charge may give rights that the owner could not confer I see no ground on which it can be held that the plaintiffs' charge does not rank in priority to this rentcharge. There is only one reported decision on these words in this section, but there are decided cases on similar words in earlier statutes. In Tottenham Local Board of Health v. Rowell (15 Ch.D., 378) expenses had been incurred by the plaintiffs for street works, and the charge was created by section 62 of the Local Government Act, 1858, which provided that "such expenses shall be a charge on the premises in respect of which they were incurred." Lord Justice James said at page 390 : "There is a distinct statutory charge in respect of those expenses, and it is not an unreasonable thing, because the property is improved. The works were done for the benefit of the property, fitting the property for building, and the like, and therefore it is not at all unreasonable or surprising to find it declared in an Act of Parliament in default of other remedies, that the property which is improved, and which has had the benefit, must bear the onus. There are the words 'that such expenses shall be a charge on the premises in respect of which they were incurred,' and the premises, no doubt, mean the property which has been improved, and not any particular interest in the property." In Birmingham Corporation v. Baker (17 Ch.D., 782) the charge was to secure repayment of sewering and paving expenses and was created by section 257 of the Public Health Act, 1875. The defendant, a mortgagee, contended that the charge was only on the interest of the owner as defined by the statute and that her mortgage had priority. The words of the section are "and until recovery of such expenses and interest the same shall be a charge on the premises in respect of which they were incurred." Sir George Jessel, Master of the Rolls, said at page 785 : "The works in question are an improvement to the property, not to the interest of any particular owner of the property, but of every owner of the house ; and consequently there is no good reason in the world why there should not be a charge on the property, that is, on the respective interest of every owner of the property according to the value of his ownership." After citing Tottenham Local Board of Health v. Rowell (supra) he said : "I agree, it is most rational that the property which has been improved should bear the burden, and that all the houses in the street shall bear their burden in proportion. Now, the houses per se being inanimate, they cannot bear the burden. If there be a charge on the houses it is a charge on the total ownership—if I may call it so, on the proprietorship ; not on any particular section or portion of the proprietorship, but on the whole." In Tendring Guardians v. Dowton ([1891] 3 Ch., 265) the charge created by section 257 of the Public Health Act, 1875, was held by the Court of Appeal not to override a covenant restricting the use of the land charged for the benefit of an adjoining owner. Lord Halsbury, Lord Chancellor, cited with approval the judgment of the Master of the Rolls in Birmingham Corporation v. Baker (supra). Lord Justice Fry said : "I think there is nothing to justify a declaration that the charge overrides the restrictive covenant. All the Act does is to create a charge on the premises—that is, on the land—that is, on all the interests of the owners of the land."

The only reported decision on the present section is a judgment of Mr. Justice Russell in Paddington Borough Council v. Finucane ([1928] W.N., 100). The learned Judge said that the first point to be determined was what was the effect of section 3 of the Housing Act, 1925, as regards the charge it purported to give. Was it a charge upon all the proprietary interests in the property? On the authorities that had been cited there was no difficulty in saying that the section, when it conveyed a charge on the property, meant not a charge on the interest of the owner of the rackrent in the premises but a charge upon the entirety of the interests of the premises, the whole proprietary interests of the premises.

The interests in land which have been postponed to the statutory charge in the above cases have been interests created by grant. The interest of the defendant Cordeux is created by reservation. The learned county court Judge, if I apprehend his judgment rightly, relied on this distinction, but it seems to me immaterial. The language used in the cases cited above is studiously wide and general. I think that the interest of the defendant Cordeux under his rentcharge is part of the total ownership or total proprietorship. I think it is part of the interests of the owners of the land and part of the entirety of the interests in the premises and of the whole of the proprietary interests.

On the words of the statute and the authorities above cited I think that the plaintiffs' charge must rank in priority to the rentcharge of the defendant Cordeux. The appeal must be allowed and the declaration amended accordingly.

MR. JUSTICE TALBOT.—I am of the same opinion. I had prepared a judgment in this case but it follows so closely the judgment which has just been delivered that no useful purpose would be served by reading it.

I would only add that there are two cases which were quoted to us in argument, the case of Creed v. Creed (11 Cl. and F., 491, at p. 508), see the judgment of Lord Cottenham, and Pitt v. Lord Dacre (3 Ch. D., 295, at p. 299), which show that, apart from the special statutory enactments which have been referred to, such a rentcharge as this is an interest in the land itself and a part of the property, and, it may also be worth while to add, there is really no distinction other than a technical one between the position of an owner in fee subject to a term of 2,000 years, as in the case of Paddington Borough Council v. Finucane ([1928] W.N., 100) and that of the owner of the rentcharge in the present case.

Landlord and Tenant—Restrictions—Decontrol—Whole dwelling-house decontrolled—Part subsequently let—Whether decontrolled—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923 (13 and 14 Geo. V., c. 32), s. 2 (1).

Where a dwelling-house becomes decontrolled by reason of the landlord's coming into possession of the whole of it, and where the landlord subsequently lets part of that dwelling-house, the part so let remains decontrolled.

Cohen v. Gold (43 The Times L.R., 376; [1927] 1 K.B., 865) and Lloyd v. Cook (44 The Times L.R., 455) not followed.

Prout v. Hunter (40 The Times L.R., 868; [1924] 2 K.B., 736) and Finey v. Gougoltz (42 The Times L.R., 501; [1926] 2 K.B., 322) applied.

This was an appeal by a tenant from a decision of his Honour Judge Cluer, sitting at the Shoreditch County Court, in favour of a landlord who claimed possession of premises which were within the limits of the Rent Restriction Acts.

In February, 1927, the plaintiff, Mr. Morris Ratkinsky, had become the landlord of 80, Cazenove-road, Stoke Newington, N., by purchasing the house from his father, Mr. Barnet Ratkinsky. The latter had bought the house in 1917, and had let four rooms and a scullery to a Mr. Cohen, who vacated possession in February, 1926. Mr. Barnet Ratkinsky was then in possession of the whole house, and in May, 1926, he let to the defendant, Mr. Solomon Jacobs, four rooms at a rent of 30s. per week. Of those four rooms, three had formerly been occupied by Mr. Cohen, and one had been in the occupation of the landlord.

On November 21, 1927, the plaintiff served notice to quit on the defendant, who claimed to be protected under the Rent Restriction Acts. The plaintiff then brought an action for possession, and the county court Judge held that the premises were decontrolled under section 2 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, which provided:—

"Where the landlord of a dwelling-house to which the principal Act [the Act of 1920] applies is in possession of the whole of the dwelling-house at the passing of this Act, or comes into possession of the whole of the dwelling-house at any time after the passing of this Act, then from and after the passing of this Act, or from and after the date when the landlord subsequently comes into possession, as the case may be, the principal Act shall cease to apply to the dwelling-house. . . ."

The county court Judge made an order for possession.

The tenant appealed.

Mr. D. Weitzman appeared for the appellant; Mr. A. Jackson for the respondent.

MR. WEITZMAN contended that the premises in question had never become decontrolled. He relied on Cohen v. Gold (43 The Times L.R., 376; [1927] 1 K.B., 865) and Lloyd v. Cook (44 The Times L.R., 455) as showing that, to effect decontrol, it was essential that the landlord should have come into possession of the "dwelling-house" constituted by the four rooms let to the defendant. Possession of the larger structural house, out of which the new dwelling-house was carved, was not sufficient.

MR. JACKSON contended that the argument of the appellant involved the contradiction that the greater did not include the less. He submitted that the decisions in Cohen v. Gold (supra) and Lloyd v. Cook (supra) were inconsistent with the decisions in Prout v. Hunter (40 The Times L.R., 868; [1924] 2 K.B., 736); Brooks and Others v. Liffen (44 The Times L.R., 350; [1928] 1 K.B., 441); and Oakley v. Wilson (43 The Times L.R., 521; [1927] 2 K.B., 279). It was clear that the Acts applied to premises in rem. The question here at issue was what was the status of this house. That fact was decided in February, 1926, when Cohen vacated possession, and the house thereby became decontrolled. He referred also to Finey v. Gougoltz (42 The Times L.R., 501 ; [1926] 2 K.B., 322).

Mr. Justice Branson.—This is an appeal from a decision of his Honour Judge Cluer, who found for the plaintiff in the following circumstances. The plaintiff's father had been the owner of a house, 80, Cazenove-road, Stoke Newington. He had bought the house in 1917, and had let four rooms and a scullery therein to one Cohen, while he and his family resided in the rest of the house. Cohen left in February, 1926, and the plaintiff's father came into possession of the rooms occupied by him, and then had the whole house in his legitimate possession. In May, 1926, he let to the defendant three of the rooms which had been previously let to Cohen, and one room which he had previously occupied himself. In 1927 the father sold the house to the son, who was the plaintiff in the action before the county court Judge. Notice to quit was given by the plaintiff to the defendant, and the question in the action was whether the plaintiff was entitled to the possession of these four rooms as against the defendant or whether the defendant was protected by the Rent Restriction Acts. The county court Judge held that the plaintiff was entitled to possession. He said that it was admitted that three of the rooms now occupied by the defendant became decontrolled in February, 1926, and that he decided that the fourth room also was decontrolled, because at the time when the Act of 1923 came into operation it was in the possession of the landlord. He made an order for possession in three weeks, and gave the plaintiff the costs of the hearing. From that decision the defendant appeals, and the question is whether the county court Judge was right in holding that these four rooms were decontrolled, or whether he was wrong.

Mr. Weitzman for the appellant relies very strongly on the authorities of Cohen v. Gold (43 The Times L.R., 376 ; [1927] 1 K.B., 865) and Lloyd v. Cook (44 The Times L.R., 455), and I think it right to say that if those cases were rightly decided the county court Judge here was wrong. I see no means of distinguishing Lloyd v. Cook (supra) from the present case, though it might be possible to distinguish Cohen v. Gold (supra). If the matter rested there, I should be inclined to follow the practice of this Court and to say that, whatever my own personal opinion on the correctness of the decisions might be, I should feel it right to follow the decisions already given, but the position does not remain there. Authorities have been cited to us that are not consistent with either decision—authorities two of which are judgments of the Divisional Court and one a decision of the Court of Appeal. Those authorities are, taking them in order of date, Prout v. Hunter (40 The Times L.R., 868 ; [1924] 2 K.B., 736), Finey v. Gougoltz (42 The Times L.R., 501 ; [1926] 2 K.B., 322), and Brooks and Others v. Liffen (44 The Times L.R., 350 ; [1928] 1 K.B., 441).

There being, then, those two lines of authorities, which to my mind are inconsistent, it becomes my duty to express my own opinion on the construction of the statute, and to decide for myself the point raised.

The decision of the case depends primarily on the true construction of section 2 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923. [His Lordship read the subsection and continued.] Applying the language of that section to the facts of this case as found by the county court Judge, it appears that, in regard to the whole of the house with the exception of the four rooms let to Cohen, the owner was in possession at the date of the passing of the Act, and with regard to the four rooms let to Cohen, the owner and landlord came into possession after the passing of the Act—namely, in February, 1926. When Cohen had gone, therefore, the whole of the house was in the possession of the landlord, and it seems to me that unless one has got to depart from the ordinary meaning of the language used, the subsection applies exactly to the situation created, and the result is that the principal Act ceases to apply to that house. It was decided by the Court of Appeal in Prout v. Hunter (supra) that the Acts apply to things and not persons—that they operate in rem and not in personam. If that is correct, the Act, having operated in rem on that house has decontrolled that part which was in the possession of the landlord at the passing of the Act, and also has decontrolled that part which came into the possession of the landlord when Cohen left in 1926, and consequently the whole house has ceased to be subject to the application of the principal Act.

How is it suggested that that is not the true position ? It is said, in the first place, that one must not regard that part of the house which was occupied by the owner at the passing of the Act as a dwelling-house, because " dwelling-house " must mean a dwelling-house to which the Act applies, and inasmuch as that part of the house was not let to anybody, there was nobody who was a landlord of it so as to effect decontrol. For that proposition the authority of Cohen v. Gold (supra) is cited. That appears to have been a decision that a person cannot be said to be a landlord in respect of any part of a house which has not been let. I confess that, if that is the true meaning of the language of the subsection, I find it difficult to see how the first part of the subsection could have any application. That that is not the real meaning to be given to the language appears from the decision of the Divisional Court in Brooks and Others v. Liffen (supra). Mr. Justice Talbot, who was a party to the decision in Cohen v. Gold (supra), points out that the word " landlord " is used loosely in the subsection. Mr. Justice Salter says : " The word ' landlord ' must be loosely used in that subsection because, strictly speaking, there cannot be a landlord without a tenant and a tenure, and the subsection deals with a case where there is neither tenant nor tenure. ' Landlord ' clearly must mean nothing more than ' owner.' " If landlord means nothing more than owner, why was not that part of the house, which was in the possession of the plaintiff's father, decontrolled—or rather, let me say, taken out of the application of the principal Act ? That is my view of the decision in Cohen v. Gold (supra).

With regard to the case of Lloyd v. Cook (supra), as I understand the decision of the Court, it amounts to this. Three rooms which had been let to a tenant had come back into the possession of the landlord and had therefore ceased to be within the principal Act ; but two of them were subsequently re-let to another tenant, and thereby a new dwelling-house was created, which was not a dwelling-house erected or in the course of erection on April 2, 1919, or one which had been bona-fide reconstructed, so as to come within section 12 (9) of the Act of 1920 ; and, therefore, as soon as by the re-letting of the rooms a new dwelling-house had been created, that dwelling-house fell within the operation of the Act, and the rooms composing it, which had once been decontrolled, ceased to be so, and came again within the principal Act. In the first place, that decision seems to offend against the decision of the Court of Appeal in Prout v. Hunter (supra) by disregarding the principle there laid down that the Acts operate in rem ; and, secondly, it is contrary to the decision in Finey v. Gougoltz (supra). It is perfectly true that the particular point taken here was not taken and argued before the Court which decided Finey v. Gougoltz (supra) ; but still the fact remains that that decision must be wrong, if the decision in Lloyd v. Cook (supra) was right. I find it impossible to reconcile the two cases.

Considering, therefore, that the decision in Finey v. Gougoltz (supra), coupled with the decision of the Court of Appeal in Prout v. Hunter (supra) and my own view on the construction of the Act, lead me to the conclusion that the decision of the county court Judge was right, I think, in spite of other decisions to the contrary, it is my duty to hold that this appeal should be dismissed.

Mr. Justice MacKinnon.—I agree. At the date of the plaint the plaintiff was the owner of the whole of 80, Cazenove-road and all the rooms it contained. Four rooms therein were let to the defendant, and the plaintiff had served on the defendant notice to quit, and claimed possession of those four rooms. At common law there was no defence to the plaintiff's claim, but the defendant said that his four rooms constituted a "dwelling-house" within the meaning of section 12 (2) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, and therefore that, by reason of section 5 of that Act [re-enacted by section 4 of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923] no order for the recovery of possession could be made in respect of them. To that contention the plaintiff replied that the rooms were decontrolled by section 2 (1) of the Act of 1923. He agreed that the Act of 1920 did apply to them, but contended that as his father, who was his predecessor in title, was in possession of one of the rooms let to the defendant at the passing of the Act, and came into possession of the other three rooms after the passing of the Act by the departure of the former tenant Cohen, the Act of 1920 had ceased to apply to the dwelling-house for which the defendant claimed protection. The county court Judge decided that that rejoinder of the plaintiff was good and valid.

Apart from any authority, I should have thought that there could not be the slightest doubt that the county court Judge was right. It seems to me quite clear that where section 2 (1) of the Act of 1923 speaks of "landlord" and "tenant" it is referring to the two parties who will be protagonists before the Court in proceedings under section 5 of the Act of 1920. That section provides : "(1) No order or judgment for the recovery of possession of any dwelling-house to which this Act applies, or for the ejectment of a tenant therefrom shall be made or given," &c., and there are subsequent references to a "landlord" in various places, e.g., in clause (c). I think that in section 2 (1) of the Act of 1923 the terms "landlord" and "tenant" are not used technically, and that "landlord" is not used in the sense of a person who has let a dwelling-house to a tenant, so that there is a relation of tenure between them, but that "landlord" and "tenant" merely mean the parties to whom, but for that section, the provisions of section 5 of the Act of 1920 would apply. I am encouraged in that view by the consideration that section 2 (1) speaks of a landlord of a dwelling-house being in possession of the whole house at the passing of the Act. If "landlord" is there used in the technical sense, the landlord could be in possession of the dwelling-house at the passing of the Act only if he was in possession in defiance or in breach of the rights of the tenant. There could be no other occasion or means by which any landlord, using the term strictly, could be in possession of a dwelling-house at the date of the passing of the Act.

I am further encouraged in that view by the observations of Mr. Justice Salter in Brooks and Others v. Liffen (44 The Times L.R., 350 ; [1928] 1 K.B., 441) in the passage already cited by Mr. Justice Branson. Taking that view further, I think it perfectly clear that the plaintiff's contention in this case was right, and that the landlord was in possession of one of the rooms subsequently let to the defendant at the passing of the Act, and came into possession of the remaining three after the passing of the Act, and that from that date the principal Act ceased to apply to the four rooms or to any part of them.

It was argued on behalf of the appellant that that view was wrong, and reliance was placed principally on the decision in Cohen v. Gold (43 The Times L.R., 376 ; [1927] 1 K.B., 865), where, as I understand, the other view was taken, that the term "landlord" in this section has a highly technical meaning. Mr. Justice Talbot there said : "The Act does not apply to a case where possession by the person who is now in fact the landlord was not possession at the material time of a dwelling-house let separately, nor was possession by a landlord : and therefore there was no possession of the whole of the dwelling-house, that is at the passing of the Act of 1923." That followed on an observation by Mr. Justice Acton in the course of the argument. "How can you say that the plaintiff was 'landlord' of this dwelling-house at the passing of the Act of 1923, when there was no tenancy existing ?" Not only does there seem to me to be a contradiction and a difference between the reasoning in Cohen v. Gold (supra) and that referred to in Brooks and Others v. Liffen (supra), but the principle applied in Cohen v. Gold (supra) seems to me to be inconsistent also, first with the decision in Oakley v. Wilson (43 The Times L.R., 521 ; [1927] 2 K.B., 279), in which case the Divisional Court was constituted by the same two Judges, and, secondly, quite inconsistent with the decision in Finey v. Gougoltz (42 The Times L.R., 501 ; [1926] 2 K.B., 322). If Cohen v. Gold (supra) is right, Finey v. Gougoltz (supra) must, I think, be wrongly decided. Finey v. Gougoltz (supra) was referred to in the argument for the appellant in Cohen v. Gold (supra), but no reference seems to have been made to it in the judgments.

In these circumstances we are in the position of considering two lines of authority based on inconsistent reasoning, and it is unhappily our duty to say which seems to be correct. I have no doubt, speaking for myself, that the view expressed in Cohen v. Gold (supra) that "landlord" in section 2 (1) of the Act of 1923 has the highly technical meaning of a person who has a tenant, so that a relation of tenure exists between them, is not correct. I think that landlord there means "owner" or one of the two parties to the litigation contemplated by section 5 of the Act of 1920, and that therefore in this case the landlord was in possession or had come into possession of the whole house.

In my view, therefore, the decision of the county court Judge was quite correct, and this appeal ought to be dismissed.

Leave to appeal was granted.

BUSBY AND ANOTHER v. AVGHERINO AND OTHERS.*

Tithes—City of London—Rate prescribed by statute—Exemption from prescribed rate—Premises for which less paid before Act—Onus of proof—37 Henry VIII., c. 12.

By the Act 37 Henry VIII., c. 12, and a decree made in pursuance of it in the same year and having the force of a statute, the lessees of houses and all other hereditaments (with certain immaterial exceptions), situated in the City of London, are liable to pay a tithe of 2s. 9d. for every rent of 20s. by the year, "and so above the rent of 20s. by the year . . . by the rate aforesaid." The decree contained a proviso that in the case of premises in respect of which less sums had been accustomed to be paid for tithes before 1545, the date of the Act, the tithes should be paid only at the accustomed rate. In an action by the owners of tithes against the occupiers of premises in the City for tithe at the rate prescribed by the statute,

Held, that the onus was on the defendants to prove that the tithe paid before 1545 in respect of the premises was less than the sum prescribed by the statute, and (Lord Atkin dissenting) that they had not discharged that onus, and the action succeeded.

Appeal from decision of the Court of Appeal (43 The Times L.R., 367 ; [1927] 2 Ch., 33) allowed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (43 The Times L.R., 367 ; [1927] 2 Ch., 33) reversing a judgment of Mr. Justice Tomlin (43 The Times L.R., 91).

The appellants were the executors of the will of Mary Busby and, as such, were the owners of all the rectorial or freehold tithes issuing out of, or payable for or in respect of, such parts of 15, Great St. Helen's, in the City of London, as were situated in the parish of St. Helen's, Bishopsgate.

The respondents had for various periods since March 25, 1921, held and occupied portions of 15, Great St. Helen's, all of which were situated in the parish of St. Helen's, Bishopsgate.

The tithes were payable under and by virtue of the statute 37 Henry VIII., c. 12, "An Act for Tithes in London," and a decree made thereunder in the same year. By that decree the tithes were to be computed at the rate of 2s. 9d. upon every 20s. and at 1s. 4½d. upon every 10s. of the rent of the premises in respect of which the tithes were payable, but by clause 18 of the decree it was stated that where less sums had been accustomed to be paid for tithes, those tithes should only be paid at the accustomed rate.

The appellants claimed to recover as from March 25, 1921, tithes at the rate of 2s. 9d. for every 20s., or 1s. 4½d. for every 10s. of rent. The respondents alleged that the sum of 4s. 9d. a quarter, or 19s. per annum, was accustomed to be paid for tithes in respect of 15, Great St. Helen's at and before the date of the decree, and they admitted liability to that extent only and paid into Court the sum of £3 6s. 6d. to answer the tithes at that rate from March 25, 1921, to the beginning of the action.

It was admitted by the appellants that tithe at the rate of 2s. 9d. in the £ never had been paid in respect of No. 15, Great St. Helen's, but they contended that the onus was on the respondents to prove the alleged customary payment.

Mr. Justice Tomlin held that the amount of tithe payable had been in doubt over a long period, arrangements having been made from time to time between the titheowner and the tithepayer, and that it was not possible to infer that during the periods when there was no evidence of payment, 19s. per annum was paid rather than some other sum. He therefore held that the respondents were liable to pay tithe in respect of their premises at the rate of 2s. 9d. in the £.

The Court of Appeal (the Master of the Rolls, Lord Justice Sargant, and Lord Justice Lawrence) held, on the evidence, that 19s. was a customary payment within the meaning of the proviso in clause 18 of the decree, and that the action failed.

Mr. G. B. Hurst, K.C., and Mr. Collingwood appeared for the appellants ; Mr. Herbert Preston, K.C., and Mr. Lionel Cohen for the respondents.

VISCOUNT SUMNER.—My Lords : The rectorial and freehold tithes, payable in respect of 15, Great St. Helen's, E.C., are vested in the plaintiffs, whose title is not contested, and the defendants, as occupiers of that tenement, are bound in respect of it by 37 Henry VIII., c. 12, and by section 2 of the decree, which it incorporates, to pay or make payments in the nature of tithe at the rate of 2s. 9d. in the £ of yearly rent, unless section 18 applies, which by way of proviso enacts that "in places where less sum than after 2s. 9d. in the pound rent hath been accustomed to be paid . . . the said inhabitants shall pay but only after such rate as hath been accustomed." In principle the burden of establishing such a customary payment must rest on those who set it up, because it is a particular exception out of the general charging provision made for all cases where no such customary rate exists, and it has long ago been laid down in the decided cases that such a defence must bear the onus of proof (Bennet v. Trepass, Gwillim, 633 ; 4 Brown's Parl. Cases, 650; Warden, &c., of St. Paul's v. Kettle, 2 Ves. and B., 1). I need not elaborate them.

The burden is a very real and a heavy one. The impropriator is entitled to the statutory charge unless an accustomed rate can be proved applicable to the tenement in question, and existing in respect of it in A.D. 1545. We need not now trouble with the length of its anterior existence. If it can be carried back to the time when the Act passed, under the circumstances of this case that will do. We need not go back to Richard I.

Proof is required but it is hard to come by. The rules of evidence are liberal in matters of such antiquity, but they remain rules of evidence and, with every willingness to admit all such inferences as can properly be drawn, we must distinguish clearly between reasonable inference and plausible conjecture. The defendant must have the benefit of all legal presumptions, but he can take nothing by any resort to mere surmise, however ingenious, and his proof, though scanty, must still be "rational and solid," (per Lord Eldon, L.C., in Warden, &c., of St. Paul's, London v. Morris, 9 Vesey, 155, at p. 170).

It is not only the pedigree of the accustomed payment that must be proved, but its amount. The tithepayer has to pay something, whether on the footing of the statutory rate on his rental value or under section 18. It is for him to show what the sum is; otherwise he fails. I think there is a further material consideration in connexion with this burden of proof. The tithepayer cannot succeed merely by reason of the weakness of the titheowner's proof. In aid of his own affirmative case, he can make use of the barrenness of the claimant's, but if the claimant proved nothing, the occupier would still have to trace his accustomed sum back to 1545. It follows that a very different significance attaches to weak spots in the defendants' claim from that which at most can arise from gaps in the case of the titheowner. The latter is under no duty nor is it much to his interest to keep documentary records of transactions in the past. The statute of Henry VIII. is his charter, and, the more rental values have varied, the less can it matter to him what actual sums have been paid in particular past years. With the tithepayer it is otherwise. His interest has been all along to preserve documentary evidence of the continuous payment of an accustomed sum, and he and his predecessors have disregarded it at their peril. A dozen receipts at suitable intervals for 19s. (which is the sum to which the defendants pledge themselves), being the tithe as anciently "accustomed due from X. Y.," would have concluded the matter. Equivalent evidence will serve, but mere comment on the claimants' shortcomings avails nothing.

At the trial extracts from various books and papers, forming part of the Vestry archives, were produced, and they were to the following effect. In 1632 one Thomas Jennings paid, along with others, a sum for five years' tithe in advance, which makes his annual tithe 35s., and in 1654 he is entered as liable to pay the same amount in respect of a tenement, which, it is reasonably plain, included the site of what is now No. 15, Great St. Helen's. It is common ground that in these two entries Thomas Jennings is the same person and the 35s. is payable in respect of the same tenement. In 1705 Henry Durley appears as liable for an annual payment of 19s. The respondents' case is that his 19s. was arrived at because five houses, of which Thomas Jennings's house of 1632 was one, were so altered as to become six. This, in itself, it is settled, would not break the continuity or uniformity requisite to an "accustomed sum" within section 18 (Williamson v. Gosling, Gwillim, 902). The rearrangement of the sums payable is another matter. In 1714 the house is again entered as liable to the same payment, the tithepayer's name now being Jane Bowie. The record of 1714 was printed in 1795, but here Jane Bowie's payment is 16s. In 1822, on the occasion of a sale of the tithe, the particulars of sale show the house in the occupation of one Tottie, with 19s. as the sum payable, and it has been assumed, though I think without any direct evidence, that Tottie must actually have paid it, but for how long does not appear. Another statement got out from the records of the parish by two assistant overseers for the purposes of this case shows actual payments for this house, then occupied by a wine merchant named Page, from Midsummer, 1796, to Midsummer, 1807, of only 16s. per annum. There is no material to bridge the gap between 1807 and 1822 or between Page and Tottie, so far as extracts from original documents go, but a quotation from Cox's Annals of St. Helen's, which was admitted without objection, as were all the other documents in the Record, throws some light on it, if the author was well informed. It appears that about 1805 the Reverend Edward Cook bought these tithes for under £700 from a predecessor named King, who had bought them for £505 in 1795. He sold them in 1822 by public auction for £6,300. The tithe payable according to the records of 1714 and 1795, above mentioned, had been rather over £64 6s. per annum. On a comparable basis for the return from such an investment, it must have been increased to something like £560. The explanation is that Mr. Cook was a hard man and perhaps no great credit to his cloth. He screwed up the tithe; he bullied the tithepayers, and he spoke disrespectfully of Chief Barons of the Exchequer. It is not, however, necessary to suppose that he got more than his rights, or that the occupiers were forced by his resolution to abandon pretended but groundless claims to a customary payment. The erection of new buildings on ground never built on before or on the site of sheds, which were not liable to tithes, may explain it (Bramston v. Heron, Gwillim, 1314). In 1822 the particulars of sale state that there were 13 houses, of which No. 15 was one, in respect of which the tithe payments were called customary, but, adds the document, they were not all so admitted by the vendor. Extracts from statements of tithe for 1841, 1854, and for two later years, not named, show that in these years the sum of 19s. had been raised to 40s. This is stated to be "by composition" with the tenant at some date earlier than 1841. They distinguish between payments under composition and customary payments, and No. 15 now comes under the former and not under the latter head. The collector, who drew up the document of 1854, has a significant note:—

"Statement of the Tithes of St. Helen's parish, showing, as far as yet ascertained, what are payable under leases, agreements and compositions. The remainder, some being customary payments, the majority payments acquiesced in and received but subject to increase. It appears by the old payments they have varied as to a large portion. In these cases, therefore, there can be no customary payments."

With this extract there should be compared the document which shows how this series of parish records originated. Shortly before the Restoration the tithes were in the hands of one John Langham, who commenced proceedings by English bill in the Exchequer against Spurstowe and others. He alleged that they occupied premises for which, "either by custom some rate or customary payment or sum of money either according to the yearly rents or values" of those premises "or otherwise had been used to be yearly paid to the proprietors or farmers of the rectory or else according to the decree made for payment of tithes in London" in 1545. The Court then made an order for the trial of a feigned issue at law, in which Spurstowe and his co-defendants were put to proof of the custom and customary payments on which they relied in answer to the plaintiff's claim. This issue was never tried, but in February, 1662, an order was made by consent by which the defendants were to pay, according to the several rates and customary payments set forth in their several and respective answers, and the decree concluded, "and shall continue the payment of the same for the future accordingly for so long as the said plaintiff shall continue impropriator of the said rectory and the said defendants, each one respectively, shall continue inhabitants of their respective houses."

The recitals show that the plaintiff (how far truthfully we cannot tell) accused the defendants of conspiring to defeat his just claims by concealing from him in concert the true and improved rents of the houses and the alleged customary sums that they had been in the habit of paying and the ancient rents, according to which they claimed that their rates of payments should be fixed. It is accordingly not clear that the defendants' contention was rested under section 18 on sums "accustomed" in or before 1545 and not rather on ancient rents then and previously payable, to which, notwithstanding any increase in the value of the premises, they contended that the 2s. 9d. was alone applicable. Their respective answers are not forthcoming. Thomas Jennings was not a party to these proceedings at all. The suggested reason—namely, that he was a man too honest to conceal anything, who made a clean breast of his 35s. and so got its customary character acknowledged—strikes me as being ingenious but fanciful.

The Vestry, however, took the matter up, apparently considering this settlement, though only a personal one between the parties themselves, to be of general importance to the parish. The Old Register Book, dated 1705, contains a comparative tabular statement setting out for 1654 and 1705, respectively, along with the quarterly sums payable, the names of occupiers, far beyond those who were defendants in 1662, and adds indications of changes made, when the number of the houses was increased or diminished by alterations in them, which resulted in new allocations of payments. It is headed rather inaccurately, "A tithe book for St. Helen's parish, reduced to a settlement made by a decree in the Court of Exchequer, 9th February, 1662, in a cause between Sir John Langham and the parishioners of the said parish, defendants, as the same appears by tithe books bearing date 1653-1657, which were made exhibits in the said cause on behalf of the said parishioners."

My Lords, I think that from this it may reasonably be inferred that on some ground, now unknown, it was generally thought among the vestrymen of 1705 that the settlement of 1662 was valuable to them, as securing parishioners generally from increases in the sums payable in respect of tithe, and that an elaborate record was made up accordingly. On what this was founded we do not know. The personal settlement of the action is apparently relied on, for, rightly or wrongly, the actual named defendants are spoken of as if they had defended on behalf of all other parishioners; apparently, also, there were either no earlier records, except the list of 1632, or they did not carry matters so far as the decree did, nor is there anything before us to show that any information then existing with regard to the period before 1654 contained anything to connect the payments of that day with the customs of 1545, except by mere conjecture. At any rate the parish "Paper Book" for Vestry orders, which was first directed to be kept in 1558, has not yielded anything further for use in this case.

This history, extending over nearly 200 years, is in the amount of its information probably all that could have been expected. It was admitted at the hearing, though I do not know on what material, that payment of 19s. per annum had been made from 1705 to 1714. Of course, nobody supposes that some payments were not made in other years between 1632 and 1822, though it is equally improbable that there were no years in which the tithe for No. 15 went unpaid. This, however, is not the serious part of the case, for it is not non-payment but variable payment that must weaken and may destroy the defence to the titheowners' claim (Andrews v. Drever, 3 Cl. and F., 314; Payne v. Esdaile, 4 The Times L.R., 781; 13 App. Cas., 613; Esdaile v. City of London Assessment Committee, 3 The Times L.R., 770; 19 Q.B.D., 431, at p. 441).

So much for the positive side of the respondents' case. In view of this affirmative evidence the absence of evidence contra becomes negatively important. (1) There is no direct proof of any payment that can be shown to have been calculated at 2s. 9d. in the pound on any known rent. (2) Neither 35s. nor 19s. nor 16s. represents, at 2s. 9d. in the £, any rent exactly expressible in current coin of the realm without fractions. (3) No rent, but one, is directly proved for No. 15 or for Thomas Jennings's larger holding and that is £50, reserved by lease to John Page for 21 years from Christmas, 1789. An attempt was indeed made to show that £50 must also have been the rental value nearly 100 years before, when the first valuation was made for land tax. I think this failed. It rested on the assessment for Bishopsgate Ward for 1793, when £8 15s. "to pay" was attributed to Page, £50 being put opposite his name, almost certainly as the value on which that sum was payable. Why any value should be entered in 1793 does not appear. None is mentioned in such previous documents as we have. The suggestion was made that, though the record of the actual valuation for Bishopsgate Ward is missing, still as the original valuation to land tax in 1692 was the only one ever made, it must be supposed to have been repeated in all subsequent assessments, and that, as that valuation is stated by historians to have been careless and dishonest, £50 must be taken to have been too low a value even at the end of the 17th century, for all the mistakes must be deemed to have been made against the Crown. For my part I am not satisfied that £50 in the assessment of 1793 is meant to be the original valuation to land tax at all, and, if so, it carries us no farther. (4) Finally, from first to last there is no record or even evidence of any litigation between the impropriator of the day and the successive tenants of No. 15 or of the tenement of Thomas Jennings for the recovery of any sum for tithe. Whether they did not pay or did not pay enough, there is a complete absence of any proof that any attempt was made to collect more by process of law and, until the Reverend Mr. Cook came on the scene, there is no proof that the impropriator ever pressed for more than he was getting.

How far then, if at all, does this fall short of satisfying the burden of proof, which rests on the respondents? For the period from 1871 to the commencement of this action it is enough to say that nothing is proved either way. Tithe, as such, was not then being collected from tithepaying occupiers. Some family arrangement took its place, and the former position is unaffected. In the period before 1871—the period of the 40s. payments by arrangement, preceded by several years in which no payment is recorded at all—it is the surmise of the Court of Appeal that the tithepayer may have paid this greatly increased but still unimportant sum rather than go to the cost and expense of contesting it. That may be, but the same explanation applies equally in earlier centuries in favour of the titheowner and, unless the 19s. is established between 1545 and 1822, it leaves things as they were. Between 1714 and 1795 or earlier, he may have arranged to take 19s. for the time being, rather than go to law.

This was the explanation which commended itself to Mr. Justice Tomlin. Acquiescence, so explained, does not evidence an origin for the 19s. payment dating from 1537 or 1545.

In the period between 1705 and 1882 falls the period of years when 16s. was apparently the sum that was recognized. Prima facie it is evidence that the 19s. was not a uniform customary sum, but the tithepayer is at liberty to explain it, if he can. It might be due to compassion for the poor ; it might be due to simple error. It is the latter explanation that is selected and I will briefly point out how speculative it is.

The printed list of 1795 purports to be a correct copy of the list exhibited in the Vestry since 1714. It is not. Jane Dowie's payment is sixpence down ; Philip Sandford's is threepence up. The spelling varies ; sometimes for the better, sometimes for the worse. A careless printer is likely enough ; a careless Vestry, spending their money for the general information of those concerned and letting two slips in the figures pass, which might get the tithepayers into some trouble, is also possible, but both negligences have to be assumed. The error has then to be connected with the subsequent collection of 16s. only and the hypothesis is that the sale of the tithes, then said to amount to £64 10s. 6d. per annum, which took place in 1795, was based on this printed copy as the particulars of sale, and that the new impropriator, knowing no better, only asked Mr. Page for 4s. a quarter. This Page paid. He dissembled his satisfaction and held his tongue. How this impropriator settled the matter, when he sold out to Mr. Cook, we do not know, but of course in itself the sum was trivial.

My Lords, I cannot see on what ground it is to be assumed that this sale took place merely on the basis of the print of 1795. Most, if not all, of the names of the tithepayers had, as an examination of the land tax documents shows, been changed in the intervening 80 years. Wensley's house in 1796, afterwards Cooper's in 1822, was a composite of Bailey's and Best's houses of 1714. Barbara Drew's house of 1714 had been divided into two between Robinson and Rawlinson by 1796. The undated "Schedule of customary payments, with Mr. Cook's remarks," shows that he thought the print of the particulars was inaccurate with regard to Nos. 18 and 17, Ximenes and Debarry of 1714, the sums payable having been differently distributed between them. The significance of his list is this, that, according to him, the tithes of St. Helen's, which were "claimed to be customary payments pr. order of the Vestry of December 16th, 1714, but not admitted" by himself, were only Nos. 1 to 19, Great St. Helen's inclusive, out of all the 112 houses in the 1714 list. It would seem that either new building or his operations had cut down the claims to customary payments to about one-sixth of the whole, and, if he had remained owner a little longer, the present dispute might never have arisen.

My Lords, I think it very unlikely that a printed document, in which the names were all obsolete, would have been used as the sole basis for collecting the tithe after the purchase. The houses were not numbered, so far as we know, in 1795. Numbers first appear in Mr. Cook's schedule. Identification of the houses by the names of householders long dead would have been impossible. It is much more likely that by employing the former collector or by local inquiry of his own the new impropriator found out and got in what the parties had been recently paying. If so, the 16s. is not a payment in error but a payment varying from the 19s., which remains unexplained. It is not for the claimant to explain it. The occupier of No. 15 may have been impecunious or a bad payer. The latter is not unlikely, for I note that in 11½ years the then owner of the tithe only got 40 quarters' payment out of Mr. Page, and only about 35 out of Mr. Wensley. The underpayment may have been a "usurpation of a deficiency" (Shephard v. Payne, 16 C.B., N.S., 132) to which Mr. Cook refused to submit though his predecessors had done so. All I can say is that the evidence leaves the explanation in doubt, and by any doubt on the point the respondents must suffer.

The respondents must further trace the pedigree of their 19s. to and through Jennings and so back to 1545. The difficulty, which I think is unexplained, is this. Between 1654 and 1705, when or how we do not know, five houses, of which Jennings occupied one, became six. From 1705 onwards these six houses always appear in the same order with Richard Stert at one end and John Boteler (afterwards Anthony Bailey) at the other. They appear to have stood as a consecutive series. I judge from the respondents' tracing of a recent ordnance map that this block is almost an island site and is all but surrounded by thoroughfares for pedestrians. Accordingly, if these thoroughfares are ancient, as doubtless they are, the half-dozen houses were not built in a row but filled up the site in some other way. Still, as they had to open on to some thoroughfare, the natural way of arranging the names in order and eventually of numbering them would be by taking one door after another in sequence. Now Crew and Durley are two householders who between them make up most of Thomas Jennings's 35s. Stert makes up the residue. Boteler, Somaster, and Deane continue to pay as their predecessors did in 1654. How could Stert be the person on whom part of the 35s. was cast if it was a genuine reapportionment of an ancient accustomed sum ? Between Crew and Stert two other houses intervened, and they continue tithed as before. I find it very difficult to see how Durley's 19s. is identified, as it has to be for an old customary pedigree, with a part of the older 35s., for the break-up of the 35s. is only accomplished by something (it is not for me to say what) which is much more like some private arrangement than a mere consequence of turning Jennings's single house into two others. Nothing but conjecture is available to the respondents here. It is, indeed, contended that an actual and sufficient appropriation of 19s. to Durley's house may be inferred from the long uncontested payments of that sum without dissent on the impropriator's part, but I think that the payments themselves, except between 1705 and 1714, are too conjectural to found such an inference.

There remain the 87 years between the first appearance of the 35s. and the last date, 1545, in which an accustomed sum could have arisen under section 18. Whatever the circumstances under which the 19s. payment came into existence, they do not serve to show that the 35s. payment was a customary payment going back to 1545. The judgment in Foster's case in 1900 (unreported) was cited as authority for relying on tradition in a proper case. I do not dispute it, but is this such a case ? In a family the memory of a striking event may last for generations, and in public affairs for centuries. If Jennings had been shown to have belonged to a family resident at No. 15 for a century, a tradition that his grandfather had been burnt at the stake in one reign or drawn and quartered in another would be likely to persist even without the addition of a ribald ballad on the subject. Here, however, there is no question of one family but of a succession, probably numerous, of householders, not so far as we know connected together, and the fact to be remembered is neither public nor material, but is the prosaic circumstance, interesting only to the parties, that, beginning at latest in 1545, a precise sum, 35s., and no other had been payable, because it was accustomed in and before that year and did not rest on any other foundation. For this, I think, tradition is an impossible basis. I think it should also be borne in mind that, as between the impropriator and the tithepayer, the issue was not necessarily confined to 2s. 9d. in the £ of the rent, then payable, or else an accustomed lump sum. For a long time it was in dispute what the "rent" was on which the 2s. 9d. was to be reckoned. Long after the actual history of No. 15, Great St. Helen's begins, it was still being contended that the rent to be tithed was the old Tudor rent, and the right to reckon the rate on the improved rent for the time being was not fully established till Lord Eldon's time. (Ivatt v. Warren, Gwillim, 1054 ; Antrobus v. East India Company, 13 Vesey, 9, at pp. 24-25). This must be why in Langham v. Spurstowe the occupiers concealed the amount of their rents and, as above stated, sometimes rested their contention on a fixed sum and sometimes on a fixed rent. Even if an oral tradition is postulated, which handed down from tenant to tenant the fact that 35s. had always been the sum payable, this would still leave the origin of that sum to be supplied by memory, and this seems to me exceedingly problematical. Again, tradition is not very likely to have discriminated between an origin before 1545 and an origin after it. The numerous traces of some standing quarrel about the tithe on the buildings in Great St. Helen's and of the importance of adhering to traditional payments are just as likely to be due to resistance to payments based on improved rents as to insistence on a supposed accustomed sum payable since the time of Henry VIII. We are not informed whether the Great Fire extended to Great St. Helen's or not, but the time of acute dispute would come when the time of rebuilding began, then or afterwards. Till then medieval tenements might well lose value, as they aged, as fast and as much as the site itself grew more valuable, and thus leave the rent payable unchanged for generations, and it must be remembered that, as rent is tithed but fines are not, if a fine was taken on renewal and the old rent left, any increase of letting value would be accounted for.

My Lords, the Court of Appeal, sensible of the difficulty presented by their gap of 87 years, considered that there was a presumption of a legal origin for a state of things found to exist so long ago as the 17th century. As it was put to your Lordships at the Bar, it was said that that state of things must be deemed to have originated "in right and not in wrong." I think this application is fallacious. Such a presumption does not extend to presuming a date, nor are we here concerned with quieting title or giving validity to something which has been in long and uninterrupted use, nor is the presumption required to invest with legality something which otherwise would be unexplained and without the law, Jenkins v. Harvey, 1 C., M. and R., 877, at p. 894 ; Shephard v. Payne (supra). In the first place the origin would be equally legal whether it was before 1545 or after it, but if after that date it would be inefficacious. In the second, choice of an origin here does not lie between a right and a wrong, but between two legal origins, each, if established, equally good. Two shillings and ninepence in the £ on the rental or an accustomed payment of a lump sum would equally serve as a root of title for what is proved later on, but the difficulty is to know which it is to be. You cannot say that 35s. would be "in wrong" of the impropriator unless it is deemed to have been an accustomed payment in right of the occupier, until it is first certainly known that the 35s. could not itself be a payment arrived at on the basis of a rate—not necessarily the maximum rate—on an actual rent. I think it has been far too readily assumed that 35s. could never have been the sum payable on the basis of the impropriator's claim in and after 1545. Certainly 2s. 9d. is a rate often likely to lead to awkward fractions, either in the rent or in the payable tithe, but there is not much difficulty with 35s. An impropriator does not lose his rights altogether by accepting something less than his full due. On a rent of £12 15s. he could collect at 35s. his full 2s. 9d. tithe less only about three farthings, and that as a sensible man he would of course forgo. This is a likely legal origin for Jennings's payments, but at any rate I do not think that the respondents proved, either by evidence or presumption, that uniform and regular payment of a fixed sum which is necessary if they are to succeed. I think the appeal should be allowed and the judgment of Mr. Justice Tomlin should be restored, and so I move your Lordships.

Lord Warrington of Clyffe.—My Lords : The appellants, the plaintiffs in the action, are the lay impropriators of the tithe payable in respect of (amongst other hereditaments) the house known as 15, Great St. Helen's, in the City of London. The respondents, the defendants in the action, are the occupiers of various portions of the house. The title of the appellants and the liability of the respondents to the tithe, whatever be its legal amount, are not in dispute.

The question is whether the tithe is a customary sum of 19s. per annum or whether it is the full sum of 2s. 9d. for every £ of the annual rental of the house.

This question was decided in favour of the appellants by Mr. Justice Tomlin, but his judgment was reversed in the Court of Appeal. Hence the present appeal to your Lordships' House.

By a decree dated February 24, 1545, made by Thomas Lord Archbishop of Canterbury and others in pursuance of a statute of the same year, under which such decree has the same effect as an Act of Parliament, it was decreed that the citizens and inhabitants of the City of London should yearly pay their tithes to the parsons, vicars, and curates of the city and their successors after the rate following, to wit, of every 10s. rent by the year of all and every house and houses and so forth 16½d. and of every 20s. rent by the year of all and every such house and houses and so forth 2s. 9d. and so above the rent of 20s. by the year ascending from 10s. to 10s. according to the rate aforesaid. It was also provided that the tithe should be paid quarterly at Easter, St. John the Baptist Day, Michaelmas Day, and Christmas Day by even portions. The decree contained the following proviso (clause 18) : "Provided also and it is decreed that where less sum than 16½d. in the 10s. rent or less sum than 2s. 9d. in the 20s. rent hath been accustomed to be paid for tithes then in such places the said citizens and inhabitants shall pay but only after such rate as hath been accustomed."

It is now settled by authority (1) that the expression "places" includes individual houses; (2) that the custom referred to is not an immemorial custom, but it is sufficient if it be proved to have existed in 1545 and for eight years previously; speaking generally, in modern times, 1545 is taken to be the date as at which the custom must be proved to have existed; (3) that the custom may be inferred to have existed at that date from evidence of the regular payment in more recent times of a certain sum less than 2s. 9d. in the £ of the annual rent.

The respondents have pleaded that in their case the less sum payable in respect of their house is 19s. per annum or 4s. 9d. per quarter, and the question therefore is whether such sum was accustomed to be paid in respect of the house, No. 15, Great St. Helen's, in 1545 and the few previous years.

As to the onus of proof, it is, in my opinion, clear, on the form of the decree, that it is on those who seek to establish a special custom to pay a less sum than that made generally payable under the earlier part of the decree. But, however this may be, the question is settled by authority, and there is an end of it.

Does then the evidence adduced by the respondents bring to my mind the conviction that the sum of 19s. per annum, no more and no less, was accustomed to be paid in respect of the house in question in 1545 and the few preceding years. I have come to the conclusion, as did Mr. Justice Tomlin, that the evidence leaves the matter in doubt, and I am therefore compelled to hold that the alleged custom has not been established.

As to the house in question and its successive occupiers the following facts are, I think, found or admitted. In 1632 one Thomas Jennings was the occupier of certain houses of which one was the predecessor of No. 15. He was also the occupier of the same houses in 1654. In 1705 the house now represented by No. 15 was in the occupation of Henry Durley, and it and the other house or houses making up the total occupation of Thomas Jennings were included in the group of six houses appearing in the tithe book hereinafter mentioned. By 1714 Jane Bowie had become the occupier of No. 15 and the same name appears in a list of 1795. In 1796, however, and for 10 years thereafter we find the tithe being paid by one Page, and in 1822 by one Tottie. Since 1822 the house has been in the occupation of various tenants, whose names need not be mentioned.

I now come to the evidence of payment. In 1632 there is a document recording the payment by certain persons of "five years' tithe beforehand," beginning at Christmas, 1632. In this list is included the name of Thomas Jennings as making a payment of £8 15s., being five years at 35s. a year—namely, 8s. 9d. per quarter. There is no evidence on the question whether this is a payment in respect of what was then a single "place" within the meaning of the decree or whether it was the aggregate of payments in respect of several places. Assuming in favour of the respondents that it represents an alleged customary payment it cannot, for lack of evidence, be treated as the aggregate of several payments, but must, I think, be regarded as a single payment of 35s. in respect of the "place" occupied by Jennings.

The next material date is February 9, 1662, that of the decree of the Court of Exchequer on an English bill exhibited by Sir John Langham, the lay impropriator, against Sir John Lawrence and a number of other tithepayers, amongst whom the name of Thomas Jennings does not appear. The defendants by their answers set up claims to be entitled to make customary payments only, and the suit appears to have been compromised, for it was heard on bill and answer, and a decree was made by consent. The effect was that the several defendants were to make the alleged customary payments to continue for so long as the plaintiff should remain the impropriator, and the defendants should continue to be inhabitants of their respective houses and so forth. This, therefore, settled nothing; it shows that the existence of the alleged custom was then a matter of dispute.

The next document is dated April, 1705, and is entitled "A tithe book for St. Helen's parish reduced to a settlement made by a decree in the Court of Exchequer, 9th February, 1662, in a cause between Sir John Langham, plaintiff, and the parishioners of the said parish, defendants, as the same appears by tithe books bearing date 1653 and 1654, which were exhibits in the said cause on behalf of the said parishioners." Comparing this description of the decree with the copy of the decree itself the compilers of the book appear to have misconceived both the nature of the suit and the indecisive effect of the decree.

The book itself is divided into columns the left hand group of which purports to represent quarterly sums payable by a large number of persons in 1654, while the right hand group purports to represent the sums payable in respect of the same premises respectively by persons in 1705 with a final column for the annual sums representing the several quarterly sums. In the columns relating to 1654 there is a group of five persons of whom Thomas Jennings is one. The quarterly sum against his name is 8s. 9d. and the total of the several payments in the group is £1 0s. 6d. Under 1705 there appears a note "now six houses viz." and there follow the names of six persons including Henry Durley with 4s. 9d. against his name. The sums set against the six persons amount to the same total as those set against the five persons under 1654—namely, £1 0s. 6d. The entries in this book seem to me to confirm the view that in 1632 and in 1654 the 8s. 9d. was a single sum payable in respect of one house, that house being between 1654 and 1705 split up in some way, part, that which is now No. 15, being then occupied by Durley, and the residue being apparently as to the bulk occupied by Dudley Crew and a small portion added to Stert's occupation, the sum payable by him being increased by 6d.

This is the first appearance of the 19s. a year. As to how or by what authority the 35s. previously paid in respect of Jennings's holding got split up into 19s. for Durley's, 3s. 6d. for Crew's, and 6d. for Stert's there is not a particle of evidence. I might stop here, for, I think, on the facts already stated, there is no evidence of such a sum as 19s. being payable as a customary payment in or before 1545; if it really was a separate payment included in the larger aggregate of 35s. it was incumbent on the respondents to establish the fact. At present all we have is a payment in 1632 of 35s. per annum for property which included No. 15 with a statement that in 1705 a smaller sum of 19s. was payable in respect of No. 15 alone.

But from this, its first appearance, the 19s. has such a chequered career that I am driven as shortly as may be to say something of its history.

It is admitted by the appellants that it was in fact paid from 1705 to 1714 inclusive.

In the year 1714 it was ordered by the Vestry that the modes or accounts of tithes payable to the impropriator by the inhabitants of the parish be transcribed and hung up in the Vestry that the said inhabitants at any time may have recourse unto.

This order was apparently complied with by the preparation of the "Engrossment" printed at page 52 of the Appendix and hung up in the Vestry. In this engrossment the name of Jane Bowie, the tenant of No. 15, appears, and against it there is entered a quarterly sum of 4s. 9d.

In 1795 the engrossment was printed by order of the Vestry, and at the foot of the print is a statement, signed by the churchwardens, to the effect that it is a copy of the engrossment hanging in the Vestry "and which agrees as to the rates with the rental entered in the old Register Book amongst the records of the Parish."

In this print the quarterly sum set against the name of Jane Bowie is 4s., and that sum and no more was paid from 1796 to 1807 inclusive.

It is said that the entry in the printed copy of the engrossment of 4s. against the name of Jane Bowie was a mere printer's mistake. It may be so, but this is pure conjecture. Assuming it to be so, it is remarkable that, though the engrossment still hung in the Vestry, the payment of 4s. should have been regularly made, as it was, from 1796 to 1807. It at least shows that there was no certainty as to the amount of the alleged customary tithe.

The next date of importance is 1822. In that year there is a payment of 19s., and in that year also the tithes were sold by Mr. Cook, the impropriator, to one Alexander Macdougall.

The conditions of sale contained the following statements: —

"The tithes being payable under the statute of Henry VIII. which allows the impropriator to claim to the extent of 2s. 9d. in the £ on the rack rents of the houses and the tithes which are not customary payments will be capable of very considerable increase. . . .

"The following are claimed to be customary payments . . . but are not all admitted to be such by the vendor."

There follows a list of houses and names including: —

"Great St. Helen's
"Bottom
"House—Mr. Tottie—19s."

It is common ground that Tottie was tenant of No. 15.

There was also put in evidence a list in Mr. Cook's handwriting of uncertain date, but at all events of a date after that of the printed particulars, which are referred to therein. This list includes, in reference to No. 15, the name of Jane Bowie as the old occupier paying 4s. a quarter, and that of Mr. Vaile as the then occupier paying 19s. a year.

The particulars of sale are important only as containing mention of a claim to a customary payment of 19s. It contains no admission of the claim; on the other hand it does not state specifically that the claim was disputed.

The list does contain a statement that the sums mentioned were paid by the then present and former occupiers respectively, but the sums so paid are different in amount. It is another example of the uncertainty surrounding the present claim of the respondents.

After 1822 there is no evidence of any payment until 1834. From that date to 1870 there was paid a uniform sum of £2 per annum. This would appear from the records to have been the result of an agreement between the impropriator and the occupier. Assuming this to have been the fact, it shows that the impropriator did not admit, and the tithepayer did not insist on his claim; the matter was treated as a question in dispute.

From 1876 to 1918 there was a uniform payment of £7 10s. per annum in respect of No. 15 and £4 17s. 1d. in respect of No. 10, making £12 7s. 1d. in respect of the two together, and for the years 1918 to 1921 this sum was increased to £15. For the present purpose no importance attaches to these payments inasmuch as they were made not by the occupiers but by the owners of the houses and were the result of an arrangement between them and the then impropriators, who were relatives or connexions.

As already pointed out, the 19s. claimed to be accustomed to be paid in and before 1545 is not traced back farther than 1705 except as part of a larger sum, and no evidence is given of its separate existence prior to that date. But independently of this point, which would, in my opinion, be fatal to the respondents' claim, the respondents have in my judgment failed to prove the regular payments of a fixed certain sum from which alone a custom can be inferred.

In the view which I take of the evidence on the main question it is unnecessary to decide whether the respondents have proved that the 19s. a year was less than 2s. 9d. in the £ of rent. There is evidence that between 1789 and 1810 the rent was £50, but there is no further direct evidence of rent. The Land Tax records are not of much service, for at the best they only lead to a conclusion as to the assessed annual value and not as to the amount of the actual rent, and, even to arrive at the assessed annual value, there are unknown circumstances to be taken into account before a satisfactory conclusion can be arrived at from the sum actually paid for tax. If, however, it had been necessary to decide the case on this point I think I should agree with the view of the Court of Appeal upon it.

On the whole, in my judgment, the order of the Court of Appeal should be reversed and that of Mr. Justice Tomlin restored. The respondents must pay the costs here and below.

LORD ATKIN.—My Lords: The plaintiffs, claiming as owners of the rectorial tithe payable in respect of No. 15, Great St. Helen's, in the City of London, seek to recover from the defendants, the occupiers of those premises, the payments enacted by 37 Henry VIII., c. 12, the London Tithes Act of 1545. There is no question as to their title. The nature of the rights conferred by the Act has been frequently discussed in the Courts. Though the payments prescribed by the Act are called tithes, the term is a misnomer. The statute imposed the obligation upon occupiers of houses in the city to pay a sum based upon a rental in substitution for payments previously made by the citizens either voluntarily or in obedience to ecclesiastical decrees for the maintenance of the clergy. Possibly before the Act or its immediate predecessor, 27 Henry VIII., c. 21, such payments were civil obligations. They had existed for a long time. They took their source apparently in customary payments of ½d. for Sundays and feast days, and were patiently paid by city inhabitants until 13 Richard II., when the then Archbishop of Canterbury made an explanation of the constitution and obtruded upon the citizens of London 22 days more than were usual, which caused a constant struggle on the part of the citizens and a perpetual agitation between the ministers and citizens of London, the Court of Rome and in ecclesiastical courts. See the argument of Sir Thomas Coventry in Dunn v. Burrell and Goffe (Western, 44, at p. 77). It was to allay this agitation that the Act in question was passed. But, as Selden says, Tithes, Preface (ed. 1618), page viii., the previous payments "could not properly be reputed among tithes neither in regard of their value nor in respect of their nature." He points out that in value they are more than tithe and in nature they are not gifts of increase, and concludes: "What is called Tithes of Houses in London is rather called so only than is at all so." We have only to deal with the statute and the decree made under it, and the reference to previous payments is only of historical interest except in so far as it throws some light on the exception which is contained in the decree made under the statute and upon which the defendants rely. The exception is contained in clause 18: "Provided also and it is decreed that where less sum than after 16½d. in the ten shilling rent or less sum than 2s. 9d. in the twenty shilling rent hath been accustomed to be paid for tithes that then in such places the said citizens and inhabitants shall pay but only after such rate as hath been accustomed." Two points may be mentioned that have been the subject of decision on this clause.

(1) An accustomed payment does not mean a payment made in accordance with a custom that goes back to the time of legal memory. In Bennet v. Trepass (Western, 125) the Court of Exchequer held that if there were tithes by custom or agreement for eight years past they are within section 18 of that decree, and ordered an issue to be tried at law as to whether any sums less than 2s. 9d. in the 20s. rent had been accustomably paid by the defendants. This decision was upheld on appeal in the House of Lords (Western, 133). On the other hand, Lord Eldon, in Warden, &c., of St. Paul's v. Kettle (Western, 191, at p. 204) lays down that the construction is not that it must be a payment time out of mind, but if that payment has been usually made during such time as to have acquired in the ecclesiastical courts the character of a customary payment the statute operates upon it. This would require payment for 40 years in order to become customary. It is unnecessary to decide which of the two opinions is right, for no proof is forthcoming in this case or in any other case as to actual payments before the statute. The question is whether from facts proved to exist after the statute a customary payment before the statute should be inferred.

(2) The second point is that, though the clause appears to deal with customary payments in relation to places rather than individuals, yet the clause exists for the benefit of individuals who can prove such payments. Lord Eldon so holds in the passage above referred to. "If these individuals can prove that before this statute a sum of money was raised upon each house, so long before as to have acquired the character of a customary payment, to so many houses as it can be applied to it is in law applicable, though there is no such general custom through the place or parish." It is not irrelevant to this case to notice that the proof of a general usage in the parish will assist an individual parishioner to prove his own exemption.

The question in this case is whether the defendants show that they are within the exception in clause 18 of the decree, for I agree with the view expressed by Mr. Justice Tomlin and the members of the Court of Appeal that the onus is on them. There is, however, no special privilege attached to the position of a titheowner that exacts a higher standard of proof from persons resisting his claims than in other cases. The question is whether there is evidence that reasonably satisfies the tribunal that the defendants' allegations are true. It may be conceded that the mere fact that payments have not been demanded at all on analogy to cases of claims to tithes proper does not of itself afford a defence. And proof of payments less than the full statutory sum is in itself insufficient if the sums paid are so fluctuating in amount that they cannot lead to the inference that they were paid in pursuance of an obligation to pay what was before the statute a customary payment. I doubt whether in all cases it would be necessary to prove that the customary payment was a definite fixed sum. It would appear from the authorities that the customary payment might be a fixed rate or poundage less than the statutory poundage. But it is for the defendants to aver and prove the customary sum upon which they rely. In the present case the defendants aver a customary payment of 19s. per annum, and that certain sum they have to prove. It is evident that the exemption would be of little value if it only applied to the occupiers of houses actually in existence at the date of the statute in 1545. It is now well established that houses built on the site of houses which enjoyed the statutory exception are entitled to the exception. In Williamson v. Gosling (Western, 152), the defendants had owned several old houses for which customary payments had been made, had pulled them down and built two new houses on the site. On a bill for tithes by the lay impropriator claiming the full statutory payment upon both houses, the Court decreed payment according to three of the customary payments, and decreed payment of the full amount on the ground where the house called the "Gentleman and Porter" alehouse once stood. On the latter site, it is reasonably plain, no customary payments had been applied, and the case so understood is approved by Lord Eldon in Warden, &c., of St. Paul's v. Kettle (supra). See also the judgment of Sir William Grant, M.R., in Antrobus v. East India Company (Western, 225, at p. 227).

The defendants therefore will succeed if they prove that for the premises which they now occupy, or for the premises formerly occupying the same site, a customary payment of 19s. per annum was payable at the date of the statute. They can, of course, only prove this by showing facts in existence since that date which lead to the inference that such payments were made before that date. There is a volume of evidence in the case adduced by the defendants, and in my opinion it leads irresistibly to the inference required by the defendants. I will proceed to deal with it in chronological order.

In 1632 there is produced a list of payments for tithe of 46 parishioners who had paid five years' tithe in advance. It includes the name of Thomas Jennings, through whom the defendants trace occupation, who is recorded as paying a tithe of 35s. per annum. It may be remarked that payment of a sum five years in advance perhaps points rather to a fixed sum than a sum based on a rental which might increase in the course of five years, but the period is so short that I do not think the fact is entitled to much weight. Of more importance is the fact that of the 46 payments recorded only five appear to be a multiple of 1s. 4½d. or 2s. 9d., the statutory rates, and these are for sums of 11s., which may equally well be a customary payment. Jennings's 35s. cannot be arrived at by the statutory rate or the nearest round figure to it either to a shilling or sixpence, and several of the sums are expressed in shillings and pence. Moreover, such of the names as can be traced appear continuously afterwards in the documents hereafter to be mentioned recording customary payments of exactly the same amounts. As instances I refer to Backhouse at £3 a year (15s. a quarter) and Timothie Cruso at 30s. a year (7s. 6d. a quarter).

In the years 1658-62 there is evidence of litigation by the then lay impropriator, Sir John Langham, against the parishioners of St. Helen's, to the effect of which I venture to think sufficient importance has not yet been attached. In those years it appears that Sir John Langham sought by litigation to enforce the payment of tithes against what appears to be substantially the whole of the parishioners.

In 1659 there was a decree, dated April 21, 1659, (Record, p. 63) made in a suit in the Exchequer reciting that Sir John Langham filed his bill this term 12 months against Spurstowe and the other named defendants and others for the statutory tithes reciting that the defendants pleaded customary payments, which are set out, and directing an issue by a jury of the County of Hertford, at which some of the defendants are to insist only upon the custom set forth in their answer and directing that as to four of the defendants against whom the plaintiff did not proceed they should be dismissed without costs and without prejudice.

On December 6, 1660, the issue not having been tried, it was ordered that the issue should be tried next Hilary term before a Kent jury. There is no further record of any further proceedings.

On February 9, 1662, a decree was made in the Exchequer by consent which recites that Sir John Langham had filed his bill in Michaelmas term in the fourteenth year (1661) of the King against Sir John Lawrence and 58 named defendants "and several other defendants" for discovery of their true rents and alleged rents, and recites that each defendant had in his answer set up payment by custom time out of mind used of the certain or customary payment of named sums, and it decreed by consent that the defendants should pay to the plaintiff the several and respective sums of money according to the several rates and customary payments by them set forth so long as the plaintiff should be impropriator and the defendants should be inhabitants of their respective "houses, parts of houses, shops or warehouses." Before considering the effect of these proceedings it is desirable to mention two other documents.

On December 19, 1705, the vestry minutes record a resolution "That the decree relating to the tithes payable by the inhabitants of this Parish, dated February 9, 1662, and the rate now settled for the tithes shall be both entered in the book of Memorials and Bequests of this Parish and a note of reference to the same shall be set up in the Vestry."

And in a register book, dated April, 1705, there is to be found the document set out at page 76 of the record entitled "A Tithe book for St. Helen's Parish reduced to a settlement made by a Decree in the Court of Exchequer, 9th February, in the year 1662, in a cause between Sir John Langham, Plaintiff, and the Parishioners of the said parish, Defendants, as the same appears by tithe books bearing date 1653 and 1654, which were made exhibits in the said cause on behalf of the said Parishioners." The book then sets out the names of the parishioners with the amounts paid by them quarterly in 1654, and in a parallel column sets out the amounts payable for the same houses or substituted houses in 1705. In the former year there are about 98 names, in the latter about 114.

The list shows that where the houses remain the same, the same amounts are recorded as payable in both years. They are for sums ranging from 6d. to 15s. per quarter, and in only two of them can I trace a sum which is a multiple of 1s. 4½d. per annum.

The list further shows that the sums which the plaintiff admitted for his lifetime and for the tenancy of the defendants to be customary payments were being paid in 1654, eight years before the decree, and were being paid in 1705, 43 years after the decree, by persons who were successors to the defendants. It further shows that in the interval between 1654 and 1705 considerable changes had taken place in the actual houses affected. There are seven or eight cases of one house being converted into two, one case of one into four, four or five of two being converted into one, one case of four into six, another of five into two. The case with which we are concerned is one in which five houses are converted into six; one of the five being the house of Thomas Jennings referred to above as having paid five years in advance in 1632 at 35s., i.e., 8s. 9d. a quarter. He is recorded in 1654 as paying the same sum of 8s. 9d. a quarter.

In every case where there has been a change in the nature of the houses the same payment is recorded as due for the new houses as for the old, for which they are substituted. Thus the first entry is of:—

Four houses paying	Now six houses paying
s. d.	s. d.
8 6	2 6
15 0	2 6
1 0	3 4
6 8	3 4
31 2	31 2

One house at 4s. 3d. is now two houses, each paying 2s. 1½d.

Two houses paying 2s. and 3s. are now one house paying 5s.

In the case of the group of houses of which Jennings was one the figures are:—

	Five houses paying s. d.		Now six houses paying. s. d.
Halsey	4 0	Stert	4 6
Thorney	2 0	Somaster ..	2 0
Wild	2 0	Deane	2 0
Jennings ..	8 9	Crew	3 6
Mandevill ..	3 9	Henry Durley	4 9
		Boteler ..	3 9
	20 6		20 6

Durley, who pays 4s. 9d. a quarter, i.e., 19s. a year, is the predecessor in occupancy of the defendants. It appears to me that this list affords evidence that Durley was recorded as paying a fixed sum of 4s. 9d. as a customary sum: an apportioned sum of a larger customary sum paid by the occupiers of a group of five houses on part of the site of which Durley's house is built. That this was the legal consequence of building on the site of a formerly excepted house I have shown is established by authority. How the apportionment was made we do not know in this case, or in the other apportioned cases which appear in the list. It happens that if you compare the six new houses with the five old three (2s., 2s., and 3s. 9d.) pay the same, while two (4s. and 8s. 9d.) (Jennings) become 4s. 6d., 3s. 6d., and 4s. 9d. (Durley). Why they are so divided seems to me, with respect, to be quite irrelevant when it is found that the titheowner in fact was paid and received the sum of 4s. 9d., for it is admitted that such sum was paid from 1705 to 1714.

Either Durley was entitled to pay only 19s. per annum or he was bound to pay 2s. 9d. in the £ on his rent. The fact that the titheowner accepted 19s. seems to me to be conclusive that he accepted the position that Durley was not bound to pay 2s. 9d. in the £ and that there was only a customary sum due. Nineteen shillings does not represent 2s. 9d. or 1s. 4½d. or any multiple of £1 or 10s. The nearest approximate rent would be about £7 ; and if there were any doubt that the rent of this house in St. Helen's in 1705 would be more than that, it is fortunately conclusively dispelled by the evidence of assessments to land tax which will be considered later.

It appears to me that the reasonable conclusion to be drawn from the above facts so far is that the titheowner, who himself owned an important property in the parish, Crosby-square, knew of his rights under the statute, sought to enforce them by proceedings which included apparently nearly every member of this parish, failed to recover the statutory sum, was content to agree to the customary sums during his lifetime, and that the whole matter was put to rest on this footing, and, indeed, never disturbed at all until 1834, when for 36 years a sum of £2 was paid.

But the evidence of this claim to pay only a fixed sum of 19s. acquiesced in by the titheowner becomes still stronger as time progresses.

On December 16, 1714, the Vestry resolved, that the modes or accounts of tithes payable quarterly to the impropriator by the inhabitants of this parish be transcribed and hung up in the Vestry, that the said inhabitants at any time may have recourse thereto.

Accordingly a schedule entitled "A rental of the tithes in St. Helen's Parish, London, December 16th, 1714," was prepared and the original is produced. It has a note at the bottom, "This engrossment agrees as to the rates with the rental entered in the old Register Book among the records of the Parish," which is the list in double columns for 1654 and 1705 which I have described. The items number about 112. In the interval between 1705 and 1714 many of the occupiers have changed ; amongst them Henry Durley has been succeeded by Jane Bowie, but she is recorded as being due to pay 4s. 9d. a quarter just as Durley did. Several names are the same as in the list of 1705, and the amounts are the same. The list shows small sums payable quarterly, a very small proportion being multiples of 1s. 4½d. or 2s. 9d. It appears to me that the only explanation of this list is that it purports to show fixed customary payments as due from the parishioners. If they were bound to pay at the statutory rate on a rental, what conceivable use would it be to the parishioners to know what their predecessors paid in 1705 or they themselves were paying in 1714 ? The amount would then depend on the rent for the time being. But if there were fixed payments it would be a great convenience to have a public record "that the inhabitants at any time might have recourse thereto."

There is no direct evidence of the precise sum, if any, paid between 1714 and 1795. In the absence of such evidence, in view of the failure of the titheowner in the previous century to recover the statutory sum, and of the parish records above referred to, I should have drawn the inference that any sum paid did not exceed the sum expressed in the published parish schedule. But I think that there is the strongest evidence that those sums were in fact paid. In November, 1795, the tithes were sold, and in October, 1795, no doubt in view of the sale, a Vestry minute of October 8 records a resolution "That one hundred copies of the Table of the Tythes payable by the inhabitants of this parish be printed and distributed among such inhabitants." Accordingly 100 copies were printed, one of which is reproduced in the record. It is noteworthy that the resolution treats the table of tithes of 1714 as being a table of tithes payable by the inhabitants, by which I think is meant payable in 1795 as well as in 1714, and the only object of reprinting a list of the names of occupiers at the earlier date with the sums payable by them can be to enable their successors to know the precise sums payable now by them. In other words, it is only consistent with a certain sum being payable annually, and not with a sum varying with the rental. On November 12, 1795, the tithes were sold. We have the particulars of sale, "Particulars of the Freehold Tythes of St. Helen's, Bishopsgate Street, producing £64 18s. 6d. per annum." "The tythes are freehold and produce £64 10s. 6d. per annum, out of which is paid to the rector per annum, £20 ; land tax, £4. Net income, £40 10s. 6d."

Now the parish record published in the Vestry in 1714 and reprinted just before the sale in 1795 shows an annual total of about £64 12s. 6d. Can there be any doubt that the vendor was representing that he was actually receiving in gross income the amount of the scheduled payments and out of them paying the rector £20 and land tax £4, and was enjoying a net income of £40 10s. 6d. I infer therefore that between 1714 and 1795 the inhabitants were actually paying the customary sums and were paying no more. If any statutory payments were being asked for or made, it is to my mind impossible that such would not have been stated by the vendor. It seems to me, therefore, that we have convincing proof that in the period before 1795, as admittedly in the period 1705 to 1714, the defendants' predecessors in this house were paying the same fixed sum of 19s. per annum and were not paying a rate on the rental.

We now come to the evidence afforded by the land tax assessments. In 1705 Durley, who as we know was recorded as liable to pay and did in fact pay 19s. for tithes, was assessed to land tax for £11. In 1714, Jane Bowie, who succeeded Durley and is recorded as having to pay 19s. for tithe, is assessed at £5 10s., Thomas and Abraham Gooding being bracketed with him as being assessed at £6 for personal estate. In 1793 John Page, who is now the occupier, is assessed for land tax at £8 15s., and his rental valuation is given as £50. We know from a deed of release of November 1, 1793, that this was the true rental, for Page was occupying under a lease for 21 years from Christmas, 1789, at £50 per annum. It is well known that the assessments for land tax were low, but it is known that the amounts never exceeded 4s. in the £. In 1746 they were reported not to exceed 3s. in the £ in London on the true value : see pamphlet quoted in Bourdin on Land Tax (4th ed.), page 16. It is reasonably certain, therefore, that if one finds in 1705 and 1714 an actual levy of £11 or £5 10s. for the year it must be based upon a rental far in excess of those sums, and therefore far more than the £7 which would realize 19s. at the statutory rate. But the matter is made clear in 1793 when we know that the rent and the land tax valuation are £50, and the payment for land tax is £8 15s., which is 3s. 6d. in the £. If the titheowner had been collecting the tithes on the statutory basis he would have been entitled to £6 17s. from Page alone ; more than 10 per cent. of the whole income which he derived from tithe. It seems to me incredible that in these circumstances he would have sold on the footing of a gross income of £64 18s. 6d., if from one occupier alone he had a right to collect a further £6 per annum. The only explanation can be that both parties knew that the amounts exigible in law were the fixed payments recorded in the parish schedule. The facts above stated as to land tax assessments and the rental fixed by law in 1789 seem to show that Mr. Justice Tomlin understated the defendants' case when he held that there was nothing against which he could measure the rate of the annual payments actually proved.

I must now deal with a point which arises upon the printed copy in 1795 of the list of tithes of 1714. In the print Jane Bowie, the occupier of the house in question in 1714, is printed as paying 4s. per quarter and not 4s. 9d. After 1795 and up to 1807, Page, the then occupier of the premises, paid at the rate of 16s. per annum to the new titheowner. This fact is strongly relied upon by the plaintiffs as showing a deviation from the alleged fixed sum of 19s. and as being destructive of the continuous chain of proof on which the defendants seek to rely. My Lords, the facts appear to me to afford the strongest support to the defendants' case. I think that the only inference that can be drawn is that the difference between the print and the original is due to a misprint. The resolution of the Vestry which resulted in the print was that " Copies of the table should be printed and published." The print itself by a note on it states : " This is a copy of the engrossment hanging in the Vestry," and is signed by the two churchwardens. It does not purport to be a statement of the names and amounts as of 1795 but of 1714, 81 years before. What possible reason could anybody have for altering the amount which had appeared in the engrossment of 1714 against Jane Bowie's name, 4s. 9d., and which we know corresponded with the amount appearing in the double column list of April, 1705, into an amount of 4s. as paid by her in 1714 ? The idea of some deliberate change seems to me to be fantastic. It is reasonably plain that the print is made from a copy of the engrossment ; there is some slight correction of methods of spelling. There is one other instance of a mistake where " Phillip Sandford 3s." is printed " Philip Sandford 3s. 3d." Every other sum of money is identical. The mistakes are precisely what might be expected in copying a list of some 112 items, and as deliberate alterations they are unintelligible and contradict the known object of the document and its own express purport. I have not the least doubt myself that the difference is due to a mistake. But two important facts emerge. The first is that till 1805 Page paid, and the titheowner received, the 16s. The only explanation of this as it appears to me is that they paid and received on the footing that the printed copy purporting to be a copy of the engrossment represented the true legal relation, a fixed sum, and not a rate or the rental. No other explanation of a payment of 16s. can be suggested. Mr. Page's rental as we know was £50. The second important point is that when the payment of 16s. ceased, the occupier reverted to what ? A rental rate ? No ; but the original fixed rate of 19s. This fact seems to me to be of the greatest significance, for in 1805 the tithes were sold to the Rev. Ed. Cook, who we are told boasted that he knew the law of tithes as well as any Chief Baron of the Exchequer, and had set to work successfully to raise the tithe rental. But when he sold, as he did, in 1822, the conditions of sale represent the then occupier of the premises in question, Mr. Tottie, as still paying 19s. This seems to me to afford the strongest corroboration of the view that the payment of 16s. was a mistake and not deliberate, and that the Rev. Mr. Cook, a second Sir John Langham so far as his will to exact the limit from the tithepayer was concerned, was impelled to accept the position that 19s. was the fixed sum actually due.

The conditions of sale of 1822 are themselves significant. The sale is of the rectory and freehold tithes of the parish of St. Helen's payable for the whole of Crosby-square, the East India Company's St. Helen's Warehouses, St. Helen's-place, and for several houses on part of the east and west sides of Bishopsgate, now producing the annual sum of £404 6s. 6d. The conditions state : " The tythes being payable under the Statute of H. VIII., which allow the impropriator to claim to the extent of 2s. 9d. in the pound on the Rack Rents of the houses, all the tythes which are not customary payments will be capable of very considerable increase." The particulars then proceed to give a list of 33 houses in St. Helen's-place and Crosby-square amounting to £355 11s., and then give a list of further premises and payments under the heading, " The following are claimed to be customary payments amounting to about £50 per annum but are not all admitted to such by the vendor." Then follows a list of houses in 54 items amounting to £48 15s. 6d. and a note that " The tythes of such houses and warehouses in the Parish as are not included in this Particular are vested in the owners of the respective Premises." In the list making up £48 15s. 6d., Mr. Tottie is recorded as paying the now familiar 19s. and the remainder of such list conforms to the printed list and parish records so often referred to. It is significant, (a) that the reverend and learned vendor admits that there are some customary payments ; (b) that the sale is of the whole of the tithes of the parish now in existence, and that he has not succeeded in recovering any payments other than the alleged customary payments except for houses in St. Helen's-place and Crosby-square. The reason for the exception is not without interest. The houses in Crosby-square were built upon the land owned by the former impropriator, in respect of which no tithe, customary or other, had been paid. The houses in St. Helen's-place were recently built upon the site of the old Leathersellers' Hall (see Brayley and Britton's Beauties of England and Wales, Part III., London, Middlesex, by Rev. J. Nightingale, 1815, p. 167), which had been exempt from tithe by the exemption in Clause 16 of the decree of 1545, and such houses therefore had no claim to the benefit of customary tithe.

Having now brought the history of the tithe in relation to the premises in question down to 1822, and having shown a continuous record in public and other documents of a proved customary payment of 19s. from a period before 1705, up to 1822, it becomes possible to deal shortly with the subsequent period. From 1822 to 1834 though there appear to be accounts of the tithe collectors in existence there is no entry of a payment in respect of this house. From 1834 to 1871 a sum of £2 was paid not by the occupier but by the owner, and the entry is,

"This is a composition with Chapman." Who Chapman was does not appear. What we do know is that in 1837 the premises were assessed to poor rate at a valuation if £70 per annum, and in 1870 at £140. Thus in 1837 the statutory rate at 2s. 9d. would be £9 12s. 6d., and in 1870, £19 5s. per annum. After 1870 payments were made to a trustee for the owner of the property by his cestuis que trustent representing interest on the purchase price of the tithes which had been bought by the trustee apparently for his own account. The payments are called tithes but are obviously not, and apparently have nothing to do with the occupiers. As far as one can see no occupier has in fact made a payment for tithe since 1822. I can draw no inference from the payment of £2 instead of 19s. for the 37 years from 1834-71 which impairs the effect of the continuous payments of 19s. for over a century before. It is probably sufficient to say that £2 is so little more than 19s. and so much less than the statutory rate, as to support the defendants' view rather than the plaintiffs'. It certainly is not an admission that no customary tithe was payable.

What then is the legal conclusion from the facts above stated? My Lords, I should have thought that if there was one legal doctrine more firmly established than another it is that from long continued user of a right you are to infer a legal origin if possible. It is a doctrine upon which numerous titles depend. It is indeed the doctrine upon which the plaintiffs' right in this action probably depends, for it has been a moot question whether the decree annexed to the Act of 1845 was ever enrolled as was required by the statute. The point was not finally settled till the decision of the House of Lords in Macdougall v. Purrier (2 Dow and Clark, 135, at p. 165). Lord Eldon said: "What are we to say to the fact, that in the memory of all living men the citizens of London have paid the tithes under this Act? Are the citizens of London so fond of paying tithes, and so liberal as not to take advantage of their non-liability? Do they differ from all other persons in that respect? The fact of payment for two or three centuries is enough to justify your Lordships in presuming an enrolment, though it cannot now be produced. Many cases have occurred, and in some of them I have been professionally engaged, in which the rights of the clergy under this Act have been the subject of discussion, and yet this objection to the non-production of the enrolment has never before been taken, Judges and counsel being equally satisfied, from the long train of decisions, and from long existing usage, that the Courts must at the end of two or three centuries act upon the presumption that all things, which the Act rendered necessary to be done, had been rightly done at the time. If your Lordships were not to act upon such a presumption, you would shake the foundation of every title to property in the kingdom."

I will refer to one other well-known authority, the decision in Shephard v. Payne in the Exchequer Chamber (16 C.B., N.S., 132). It was an action to recover fees alleged to have been improperly demanded by the defendants as Registrars of the Archdeaconry Court of Colchester for attending the Archdeacon's visitation. The decision was given on a special case in which the question was whether the fees were legally payable and recoverable in amount. The Court had power to draw inferences of fact.

Mr. Justice Blackburn, delivering the judgment of the Court, said: "The facts stated in the case show, that from 1727 to 1801 visitation fees of the unvarying amount of 7s. 6d. and 4s. 6d. were uniformly received. From 1801 to 1857 (when the present dispute originated) fees of a varying amount, but always slightly in excess of 7s. 6d. and 4s. 6d., were received. The amount in excess of 7s. 6d. and 4s. 6d. is not now claimed; and, if it were, the uniform receipt for 71 (sic) years (from 1727 to 1801) of the amounts of 7s. 6d. and 4s. 6d. would be overwhelming evidence that the excess was a usurpation. But the modern usurpation of an excess does not affect the title to the original fees of 7s. 6d. and 4s. 6d. These have been received from 1801 to 1857 as much as from 1727 to 1801: so that the title to them depends on an unbroken perception as of right for 130 years. That does not in itself give any title: but, in favour of vested interests, and for the quieting of titles, the rule of evidence has been established, that, where there has been long-continued modern user of a right capable of a legal origin, the existence of that legal origin should be presumed, unless the contrary be proved. This presumption is not one juris et de jure, which cannot be rebutted; but neither is it one purely of fact, and only to be drawn when the jury really entertain the opinion that in fact the legal origin existed."

My Lords, the rule of evidence referred to cannot be confined to cases where the person setting up the right is seeking to enforce it in the litigation. It must be equally applicable where the defendant being sued on an alleged right of the plaintiff is setting up a right on his part to make a reduced or a different payment. In both cases the question for the decision is what is the legal right, and the rule is a rule of evidence to determine that question. I can hardly doubt that if the plaintiffs here were claiming only a customary payment of 19s. and adduced the evidence given in this case, they would have established their case. Shephard v. Payne (supra) seems conclusively to fit the facts of this very case, and in my opinion the same inference should be drawn in favour of the defendants.

There is, I think, authority for drawing the inference required by the defendants in cases involving the right to London tithes. In Warden, &c., of St. Paul's, London v. Morris (Western, 169, at p. 184) Lord Eldon said: "I admit, that where it is clear, that something, not 2s. 9d. in the £, has been paid, you are to endeavour to apply it, so as to fix the accustomed payment." As in that case the evidence was that there had been records of rates in 1672, 1676 and 1681 which varied, and a jury had decided against a customary payment, it is not surprising that Lord Eldon refused a new trial on the ground that evidence of a former decree had been rejected, which in his view would throw no new light on the matter. So in Warden, &c., of St. Paul's v. Kettle (Western, 191, at p. 205): "Whatever may be the probability that 2s. 9d. in the pound never was paid in this parish [St. Gregory] . . . yet I cannot regard that fact as more than negative evidence, strong negative evidence, if connected with material positive evidence, that there must have been some other payment due from the parishioners." He goes on to say that the onus is on the parishioners to show what that customary payment is. But he refused a new trial, as he says at page 209, "after two trials at bar, when it was admitted that through centuries there has been no customary payment, and no man has been able to say what it was."

I think that the observations of Lord Eldon indicate that if he had such evidence of a customary payment as is given in this case he would have found the customary payments proved. There is one further authority which appears to me to be of great weight, the decision of Lord Wrenbury, then Mr. Justice Buckley, in Foster v. Plumbers' Company (unreported), in January, 1900, which is set out in the record. It is a case on this very title to the tithes in this parish. The learned Judge found that the customary payment had been established. I have looked carefully at the judgment and I cannot see that the learned Judge had any evidence of actual payment of the alleged customary 19s. other than some of the very documents in this case except that Nottingham was a party to the suit of Langham v. Lawrence, where he set up a customary payment of 1s. 8d., which the Judge traced into the 19s. in question. The learned Judge (Record, p. 114), after discussing Lee Conservancy Board v. Button (12 Ch.D., 383), where the Court of Appeal had refused to presume one legal origin where another was possible, says : "I do not think that applies at all to a case, where as here you have got to choose between the liability to 2s. 9d. in the £ or a liability to the 19s. There might have been a perfectly good legal origin for 19s. It may have been a customary payment. You have not got to presume anything as regards that. It is simply a question of fact to be investigated whether the facts given in evidence lead the mind to the conclusion that the 19s. having been paid for so many years must have been paid and received because it was the sum payable, and if so you are entitled to carry that back to the earlier date, and say that you are satisfied that that was so before the statute was passed. Now the evidence does satisfy my mind that these payments which have been received during so many years are the proper payments, and that the 19s. is the sum payable."

My Lords, I entirely agree with that train of reasoning, and it appears to me that from before 1705 to 1822 19s. was paid and received, because it was the sum payable. Applying Lord Eldon's test, I would ask, Are lay impropriators in the City of London so fond of remitting tithes and so liberal as not to take advantage of their rights ? In this particular case we have two known owners, Sir John Langham and Mr. Cook at intervals of 150 years, both obviously prepared to exercise their rights to the full. The one has to admit customary rights in at least half the parish, and never appears to have collected the statutory rate at all. The other finding a payment by mistake of 16s. restores the payment to 19s., where the statutory rate would, as we know, produce at least £6 17s. Finding then that 19s. was paid and received because it was the sum payable I necessarily conclude that it was a customary payment. And, if so, Jennings's payment of 35s. must equally certainly have been a customary payment ; and so of each occupier back to a period before the statute of 1545.

In my opinion, therefore, my Lords, the defendants have established their defence, and I agree with the unanimous decision of the Court of Appeal. The contrary conclusion leads to the remarkable position that for the first time in 350 years the titheowner will receive the statutory rate. Fortunately it will also be the last, for the tithe has now been commuted under the Act of 1871.

In my judgment the titheowner has no legal right to the good fortune that has befallen him, and I would dismiss this appeal with costs.

GARDNER v. VICKERS, LIMITED.*

Master and Servant — Compensation for injury by accident—Basis—Average earnings for 12 months—Break in employment—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 84), s. 9 (2).

The appellant, who was employed by the respondents as a riveter on piecework, received notice, on September 3, 1926, owing to the coal strike of that year, that there was no more work available for him. He accordingly ceased to work till December 8, when he was re-employed by the respondents. On January 11, 1927, he met with an accident causing total incapacity. On an application for compensation, the county court Judge held that the interruption was a normal incident and that there was no break in the employment, and he awarded compensation on the basis of the appellant's earnings for the 12 months prior to the accident.

Held, that on the facts the interval was not one of the incidents of a discontinuous employment, and there was therefore a break in the employment, and the case must go back to the Judge to assess compensation on this basis.

This was an appeal by the applicant from an award of the Lancashire County Court Judge sitting as arbitrator under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925. The question was whether an interruption in the employment of the applicant by the respondents, Vickers, Limited, due to lack of work, resulted in a "break" in the employment. The decision affected the rate of compensation to be paid to the workman. The lack of work was caused by the coal strike of 1926.

The applicant was a riveter employed on piecework by the respondents, and he had been in their employment for about eight years. On September 3, 1926, he was informed that there was no more work available for him. He ceased to work for the respondents until December 8, and during this time he was unemployed and he received unemployment benefit. On December 8 he was re-employed on somewhat different work and earned higher wages. On January 11, 1927, he met with an accident arising out of and in the course of the employment.

It was admitted that compensation was payable on the footing of total incapacity, and the only question was the basis on which his compensation should be computed. Evidence was given that, out of 176 riveters in the respondents' employment, only five were continuously employed during the whole of 1926 without suspension.

For the applicant it was contended that his average earnings for the purpose of assessing compensation must be ascertained during the period between December 8, 1926, and January 11, 1927. For the respondents it was said that the employment was continuous and that his average earnings must be ascertained for the period January 11, 1926, to January 11, 1927.

* Reported by H. C. Garsia, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The county court Judge held that there was no break in the employment and awarded compensation on the latter basis. He held that an interruption in the employment was a normal incident of the employment although, in this particular case, it had been long in duration.

The workman appealed.

Sir Henry Slesser, K.C., and Mr. Arthur Henderson appeared for the appellant ; Sir Walter Greaves-Lord, K.C., and Mr. Derbyshire, K.C., for the respondents.

The COURT allowed the appeal and remitted the case to be re-heard by the county court Judge.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS, in giving judgment, said that the question which arose was as to the rate of compensation to be paid to the workman. That was to be estimated in accordance with sections 9 and 10 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925. Section 9 (2) provided that :—

"The rules for calculating the weekly payment in the case of total incapacity shall be—(i) The weekly payment shall . . . be a sum not exceeding 50 per cent. of the workman's average weekly earnings during the previous 12 months, if he has been so long employed by the same employer, but if not, then for any less period during which he has been in the employment of the same employer. . . ."

That at once raised the question how long the workman had been employed. Had he been employed by the respondents for 12 months ? It was plain that he was not in receipt of any earnings from September 3 to December 8. Was he during that time in the employment of Vickers, Limited ? He thought that the right test to apply was that laid down by Lord Justice Vaughan Williams in Jones v. Ocean Coal Company, Limited (15 The Times L.R., 339 ; [1899] 2 Q.B., 124), when he said :—"If there is a period of time during which that"—i.e., that the workman if called upon to work will do so or that the employer, if asked to give employment, will allow the man to work—"could not be truly assumed, then the relation of master and servant will have to come to an end. . . ."

What was the relation between the workman and Vickers, Limited ? The man was free to engage himself to another employer. The county court Judge found that the man had the option of getting employment elsewhere and then, if he were offered a better job at Vickers, to give up his existing job and return to Vickers. Did that connote that the relationship of employer and workman still remained ? He could not think so. It was impossible to say that the employment was continued during a time when the man had complete freedom and was neither working for nor receiving earnings from Vickers.

Then it was argued that this was a question of fact for the county court Judge. It was true that there might be employments which were discontinuous in their nature. There might be employments in which this discontinuity was incidental to the employment. But here the county court Judge had said that, while he recognized that in the case of a man on piecework there might be intervals when there was no work available, here the period was considerably beyond the normal. He (his Lordship) thought that that finding negatived the view that the interval was one of the incidents of a discontinuous employment. There was therefore a break in the employment and the case must go back to the county court Judge for re-hearing.

The judgments in the group of cases reported under the name of Perry v. Wright (24 The Times L.R., 186 ; [1908] 1 K.B., 441) really dealt fully with the problems which the county court Judge would have to consider. The appeal must be allowed and the award set aside.

LORD JUSTICE SANKEY said that the only question to be determined by the county court Judge had been the amount of compensation to be awarded for total incapacity. For this purpose section 9, subsection 2 (i), of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, applied, and section 10 prescribed rules for determining the average earnings. The question here was whether the workman had been continuously employed by the respondents during the preceding 12 months or whether there had been a break in the employment from September 3 to December 8 so that the man's employment from December 8 must be treated as a new employment. The question whether there was a break was in most cases a question of fact, so that if it was sought to disturb the county court Judge's award it must be on the ground either of misdirection or of absence of evidence to support the award. Here the appellant succeeded on both grounds. He (his Lordship) did not propose to lay down any general rule, but he thought the passage read by the Master of the Rolls from Jones v. Ocean Coal Company, Limited (15 The Times L.R., 339 ; [1899] 2 Q.B., 124), was helpful. He was not prepared to say that in a case of a day to day contract, such as that in the present case, a workman's employment ended from the moment when his work ceased. That point had been dealt with by Lord Atkinson in Price v. Guest, Keen and Nettlefolds, Limited (34 The Times L.R., 494 ; [1918] A.C., 760, at p. 771), when he said : "In some cases, such as that of dock labourers, the man is, I believe, employed for the day and paid off at night. There is a new contract of service entered into each morning ; but a continuous and unbroken succession of such contracts as these for three years might form the basis of an employment for three years." So, too, as pointed out by Lord Justice Fletcher Moulton in Perry v. Wright (24 The Times L.R., 186 ; [1908] 1 K.B., 441, at p. 461), periods of enforced idleness might be an incident of the particular employment.

In this case, however, there was, in his view, a break in the workman's employment from September 3 to December 8. That period of absence from work was not a normal incident of the employment, in view of the county court Judge's own finding that it was due to the coal strike and considerably longer than usual. It followed that the case must go back to the county court Judge to determine the compensation, having regard to the fact that there had been this break in the employment. It would be for the county court Judge to say whether he could properly arrive at the average earnings by reference to the short period of employment from December 8 to January 11, or whether he must resort to the mode of ascertaining the average earnings from the earnings of some other man in the same employment provided by section 10.

LORD JUSTICE RUSSELL said that he agreed that the case must go back to the county court Judge for a new trial. The learned Judge had dealt with the case as one falling within the first part of section 9 (2) (i) on the ground that there had been no break in the employment. In his (his Lordship's) opinion, that finding of fact was not justified by the evidence, nor did it accord with another finding of the learned Judge that the period during which the man was unemployed was longer than usual. He (his Lordship) would have been surprised by any other finding. It was hard to see how it could be said that it was a normal incident in a man's employment that he should be without work for a quarter of the year owing to a strike in another trade. In his opinion, there had been a break in the employment. He could understand that it might be said that a man's work continued if the contractual obligation continued ; or he could understand that there might be continuous employment without a continuous contractual obligation, if there was continuous work. But he was unable to see how there could be continuous employment without either continuous work or continuous contractual obligation. It followed that there had been a break in the employment in this case and that it fell within the second part of section 9 (2) (i). The case must go back to the county court Judge to compute the average earnings as best he could, having regard to section 10.

WEST WALES JOINT BOARD FOR THE MENTALLY DEFECTIVE v. EVANS AND ANOTHER.*

Landlord and Tenant—Restrictions—Non-occupation by tenant—Whole premises sub-let by tenant—Claim for order for possession against tenant—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 17), s. 5 (1) (5).

Where there has been no default by a tenant within section 5 of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 [as re-enacted by section 4 of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923], no order for possession or ejectment can be made in respect of premises protected by the Act, so long as they are lawfully occupied; and, therefore, the fact that a tenant, who has sub-let the whole of the premises and is not in occupation of any part thereof himself, has received notice to quit is not a ground for an order for possession being made against the tenant.

Gidden v. Mills ([1925] 2 K.B., 713) explained and followed.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of his Honour Judge Davies, sitting at the Llandilo County Court, who had given judgment in favour of the defendants in an action for possession of a dwelling-house known as North Lodge, Pantglas, Carmarthenshire. The case raised the question of the effect of non-occupation by a tenant on his right to be protected under the Rent Restriction Acts against an order for possession.

The plaintiffs, the West Wales Joint Board for the Mentally Defective, were a local authority consisting of representatives from the counties of Carmarthen, Pembroke, and Cardigan. Their duties were to provide for the mentally defective, and in order to carry out their duties they had acquired a mansion and stables, with living accommodation over them, at Pantglas, and also the premises known as North Lodge. North Lodge was let to the defendant, Colonel Delme Davies Evans, before the plaintiffs were constituted as a Board and while the mansion was empty, on a yearly tenancy at a rent of £2 10s. per annum.

Colonel Evans interested himself in the breeding of horses and required North Lodge to house a stud-groom. The groom, who was the second defendant, was Mr. Dan Phillips, and it was a condition of his service that he should live at North Lodge and pay a rent for the premises, the rent being deducted from his wages. At the time of the action the plaintiffs received only female patients, and their indoor staff was female. The plaintiffs desired, however, to obtain possession of North Lodge in order to have a man available near the mansion to deal with emergencies that might arise which could not be adequately dealt with by the female staff. They had such a man in their employment at the time living in the village of Llanfynydd, but he lived too far away to perform his services adequately.

The plaintiffs, accordingly, served a notice to quit, expiring September 29, 1925, and subsequently brought an action against Colonel Evans and his groom, Mr. Phillips, for the possession of North Lodge. They contended that the defendants were not entitled to the protection of the Rent Restriction Acts; but that if either of them were so protected the cottage in the village of Llanfynydd occupied by the plaintiffs' male employee was "alternative accommodation" available for the defendant Mr. Phillips. The County Court Judge found as a fact that the cottage in question was not "alternative accommodation," and he held that Mr. Phillips was protected by the Acts as a sub-tenant lawfully in occupation ; and that it would not be reasonable to make an order for possession against Colonel Evans while granting protection to his servant. He further held that, if the Rent Restriction Acts did not apply, the plaintiffs had waived their notice to quit by accepting rent afterwards. He gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. C. J. Farwell, K.C., and Mr. Edgar Dale appeared for the appellants; Mr. Humphrey Edmunds for the respondents.

Mr. Farwell admitted that the order of the County Court Judge, in so far as it related to the defendant Phillips, could not be disputed ; but he contended that an order for possession should have been made against Colonel Evans, inasmuch as he was not himself in occupation of the premises at all. The general object of the Rent Restriction Acts was to prevent persons living in a house from being evicted. By expressly affording protection to a sub-tenant in occupation, the Acts must have contemplated an order for possession being made against a non-occupying tenant. [He referred to Hicks v. Scarsdale Brewery Company ([1924] W.N., 189), Keeves v. Dean (40 The Times L.R., 211 ; [1924] 1 K.B., 685), Prout v. Hunter (40 The Times L.R., 868 ; [1924] 2 K.B., 736), and Ebner v. Lascelles (44 The Times L.R., 460)].

Mr. Edmunds contended that no order should have been made against Colonel Evans. For the purpose of section 5 of the Act of 1920 the Acts did not apply to persons, but in rem. When once the Act applied to premises, no order for possession could be made, unless one of the conditions laid down in section 5 was fulfilled. This was the basis of the decision in Gidden v. Mills ([1925] 2 K.B., 713). In Prout v. Hunter (supra) the Court refrained from making an order on the ground of non-occupation by the tenant, and made it on the ground that the de facto use of the house brought it outside the Acts altogether. In making an order for possession against the tenant a Court would be ordering him to get rid of his sub-tenant, which he had no right to do.

Mr. DALE replied.

MR. JUSTICE SALTER.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the learned Judge of the Llandilo County Court. The matter arises under the Rent Restriction Acts. The action was one by landlords for possession of a cottage, which was required in fact for a stud-groom. The premises in question had been let to the defendant Colonel Evans. Colonel Evans used them as a dwelling for his stud-groom, the defendant Phillips. Phillips paid Colonel Evans a rent for the premises, which was deducted from his wages, and it must be taken that Phillips was a tenant from Colonel Evans of this cottage. I will refer to the plaintiffs as the landlords, Colonel Evans as the tenant, and Phillips as the sub-tenant.

The landlords, having duly determined the tenant's tenancy by a notice to quit, took these proceedings in the County Court. They were obviously framed under section 138 of the County Courts Act, 1888, as proceedings by an ex-landlord against an ex-tenant, whose tenancy had expired, and persons claiming under him. The learned Judge entered judgment in favour of both defendants. The plaintiffs appeal.

So far as this Court is concerned, the plaintiffs do not challenge the judgment in favour of the defendant Phillips, but they say that they are entitled to judgment for possession as against the defendant Colonel Evans. The case appears to me to be governed by the case of Gidden v. Mills ([1925] 2 K.B., 713). The facts are precisely the same. A dwelling-house to which the Acts apply has been let by landlords to a tenant, and sub-let as a whole by the tenant to a sub-tenant. The tenant is not in occupation of any part, and the sub-tenant is in possession of the whole. The tenancy having been duly determined, the landlords take proceedings against the tenant and the sub-tenant, and the question is whether they are entitled to an order for possession against either.

I think myself that the short answer in this case, and the correct way to deal with it, is the way in which the matter was dealt with in my judgment in Gidden v. Mills (supra). Reference should be made to section 12 (2) and section 5 (1) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920. The latter has been re-enacted by section 4 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923. Section 12 (2) shows that the premises now in question are a house to which the Acts apply, if let for purposes of habitation, and it is admitted that they are a dwelling-house. Then section 5 (1) imposes what has been called a fetter. It is in the following terms : "No order or judgment for the recovery of possession of any dwelling-house to which this Act applies, or for the ejectment of a tenant therefrom, shall be made or given unless," &c. The administration of the Rent Restriction Acts is confided to the County Court, and this last section is obviously framed on the County Courts Act, 1888. The material sections are section 138 and section 59. Section 138 gives a remedy to an ex-landlord where the term has been duly determined, and enables him to proceed against an ex-tenant and persons claiming under him. Section 59 deals with the action of ejectment, by which proceedings may be taken either against an ex-tenant or against a mere trespasser. With reference to actions under section 138, they are forbidden altogether by section 5 of the Act of 1920. With reference to actions under section 59, such actions are thereby forbidden against a tenant, but not against a mere trespasser. I think it is sufficient to say that since the premises in question are a dwelling-house to which the Act of 1920 applies, no order such as is sought in this case can be made so long as the premises are lawfully occupied.

There has been much discussion of the judgment in Gidden v. Mills (supra) delivered by Mr. Justice Greer, as he then was, and particularly of the following sentence, on page 725 : "I agree with Mr. Justice Swift"—(that is a reference to the decision in Hicks v. Scarsdale Brewery Company ([1924] W.N., 189)—"that a tenant who has sub-let the whole of the premises let to him is outside the protection of the Act, but I do not think a judgment for possession can be given so long as the premises are in the occupation of any person who is entitled by the Act to remain in occupation." Now with regard to the first part of that sentence and the reference to Hicks v. Scarsdale Brewery Company (supra), I am not sure that Mr. Justice Greer would have expressed himself quite in that way if the attention of the Court had been called to section 5 (5) of the Act. That subsection provides : "An order or judgment against a tenant for the recovery of possession of any dwelling-house or ejectment therefrom under this section shall not affect the right of any sub-tenant to whom the premises or any part thereof have been lawfully sub-let before proceedings for recovery of possession or ejectment were commenced, to retain possession under this section, or be in any way operative against any such sub-tenant." I take that to mean this : suppose there has been default under section 5 by a tenant, for example, in regard to non-payment of rent, and the landlord takes proceedings against the tenant, claiming an order of ejectment against him, then if this default is proved and if the County Court Judge thinks it reasonable, the landlord would be entitled to an order against the tenant ; but this subsection provides that the order shall not be operative against the sub-tenant. The subsection deals with cases where there is a sub-tenant of part or of the whole of the premises, and therefore contemplates a case where an order is made against the tenant under this section and where, the whole premises having been sub-let, the tenant is not in occupation of any part. In such a case an order is made under the section, although the premises are lawfully occupied by the person entitled under the Act to be there, and I think the words in the second part of the sentence of the judgment of Mr. Justice Greer to which I have referred, though perhaps right in regard to that particular case and to the present one, would be too wide in a case where default under section 5 had been made by a tenant. I think section 5 (1) means that, where no default is made under section 5, the dwelling-house cannot be the subject of any order for possession or ejectment so long as it is occupied by a person lawfully entitled to be there. With regard to the reason given by Mr. Justice Greer for the decision that no order should be made—namely, that it would be useless, having regard to the position of the sub-tenant—I am not quite sure whether his attention had been called to section 5 (5).

In my view this is a very simple case and falls within the principle laid down in Gidden v. Mills (supra). In a case where there has been no default under the Act, no order for possession can be made so long as the sub-tenant Phillips is lawfully there.

I desire to add two further observations. The first is that I doubt whether proceedings under section 138 of the County Courts Act, 1888, could in any case succeed on these facts. So far as they were proceedings against Phillips, they were not proceedings against a person claiming under a tenant. Phillips was claiming his statutory right to be protected. So far as they were proceedings against Colonel Evans, I doubt whether he could be said to be a person who had refused to give up possession. He had no lawful right to claim possession himself, and therefore could not give it.

Secondly, a point was discussed with regard to acceptance of rent by the plaintiffs after giving notice to quit. That discussion proceeded on the footing that the Rent Restriction Acts did not apply to the premises, and that the whole matter was under the common law. In view of my decision that the Acts apply, it is not necessary to discuss that point at all. In the result, therefore, this appeal fails and must be dismissed.

Mr. Justice Talbot.—I am of the same opinion. We have no alternative here but to follow the decision in Gidden v. Mills ([1925] 2 K.B., 713). There is, certainly, some little obscurity in one or two passages in the judgment of Mr. Justice Greer in that case, which, no doubt, arises from the fact that section 5 (5) and section 15 (3) of the Act of 1920 do not appear to have been brought to the notice of the Court.

K.B. Div. (Wright, J.) 1928. May 14.

CLAN LINE STEAMERS, LIMITED v. BOARD OF TRADE.*

Ship—Collision—War or marine risk—Meaning of "warlike operation."

A steamer belonging to the claimants was requisitioned by the British Government during the War on the terms of a charterparty by which the Government undertook responsibility for loss of the vessel owing to a warlike operation, while the claimants remained responsible for loss by ordinary marine risks. In May, 1918, the claimants' vessel was in a convoy and was carrying from the United States to France steel billets for making shells, but the bulk of her cargo consisted of cereals for the French civilian population. Owing to a defect in her steering gear she collided with an American vessel, which was also in the convoy and was carrying war stores exclusively and was admittedly engaged in a warlike operation. The result of the collision was that the claimants' vessel sank. There was no negligence on the part of either vessel. The Government refused to pay for the loss on the ground that it had not been caused by a warlike operation.

Held, that the claimants' vessel was not engaged in a warlike operation, and, as the collision was caused by her sudden departure from her proper course, the American vessel being merely the instrument and not the cause of the loss, the loss was not caused by a warlike operation, and the British Government was not liable.

This was a special case which raised again the question whether the loss of a vessel during the War was due to a warlike operation. The Clan Line Steamers, Limited, were the owners of a steamship, the Clan Matheson, which was requisitioned by the British Government during the War on the terms of the well-known charter, T.99. Under clause 19 thereof the Government, in effect, undertook responsibility for loss of the vessel owing to a warlike operation, while the shipowners remained responsible for loss by ordinary marine risks.

In May, 1918, the Clan Matheson was one of 35 vessels sent in a convoy from the United States to France. On the night of May 22-23, 1918, the weather was fine and there was a bright moon. The Clan Matheson, owing to some defect in her steering gear which had never been explained, suddenly swung out of line and came into collision with a steamer, the Western Front, which was also in the convoy, with the result that the Clan Matheson sank.

The Clan Line claimed the value of the steamer, which was agreed at £265,000 at the time of the loss, but the Government refused to pay on the ground that the loss had not been caused by a warlike operation. The dispute was referred to arbitration, as required by the terms of T.99, and the arbitrator awarded that the claim succeeded, subject to a decision of the Court on a special case, because the loss was the result of a warlike operation.

Mr. Raeburn, K.C., and Mr. Russell Davies appeared for the Crown; and Mr. Langton, K.C., Mr. A. T. James, K.C., and Mr. J. MacMillan appeared for the shipowners.

Mr. Raeburn, in opening, said that the convoy was proceeding from New York to two French ports, St. Nazaire and Nantes. The Western Front, an American steamer, was carrying exclusively war stores, and, on the authorities, he could not dispute that she was engaged in a warlike operation. The Clan Matheson was carrying some steel billets which would have been made into shells, but the rest of her cargo consisted of cereals, part of which was intended for the civil population and only a small part of which was going to the troops in France. The arbitrator, in view of the fact that 84 per cent. of her cargo was going to be used for civilian purposes, held that she was not engaged on a warlike operation; the question in this case, therefore, was what was the result where a vessel, not engaged in a warlike operation, was sunk in collision with a vessel which was engaged in such an operation.

The arbitrator found as a fact that the Clan Matheson was not guilty of negligence, and it was admitted that the Western Front was not in any way negligent. To succeed here the claimants would have to show that a collision between a warship and a merchant ship, resulting in the loss of the merchant ship, caused that loss to be a loss by a warlike operation whatever the merchant ship might have been doing at the time. If, for instance, a warship was lying at anchor and a merchant ship was driven by the weather down on to her bow and was sunk, the claimants would have to show that the loss was due to a warlike operation. But the mere fact that one ship concerned in a collision was a warship did not make the collision a result of a warlike operation.

Mr. Raeburn referred to the St. Oswald case, British and Foreign Steamship Company, Limited v. The King (34 The Times L.R., 546; [1918] 2 K.B., 879); the Petersham case, Britain Steamship Company, Limited v. The King (36 The Times L.R., 791; [1921] 1 A.C., 99); Attorney-General v. Ard Coasters, Limited (37 The Times L.R., 692; [1921] 2 A.C., 141); the Warilda case, Attorney-General v. Adelaide Steamship Company, Limited (39 The Times L.R., 333; [1923] A.C., 292); Charente Steamship Company, Limited v. Director of Transports (38 The Times L.R., 148, 434). The real point in this case, said counsel, turned on the fifth and sixth findings of fact of the arbitrator, which were as follows:—

"(v.) The sinking of the Clan Matheson was proximately caused by the impact of the Western Front moving in the course of a warlike operation which she was then carrying out.

"(vi.) The sheering of the Clan Matheson to port was not the real or proximate cause of her loss within the meaning of Clause 19 of the said charterparty."

Mr. Justice Wright referred to Ionides v. Universal Marine Insurance Company (14 C.B.N.S., 259, at p. 286), and said that the case turned on the meaning to be given to the words "proximate cause." Suppose that the circumstances had been exactly the same, but that the Western Front had sunk instead of the Clan Matheson, would the loss have been due to a warlike operation?

Mr. Raeburn submitted that it would not. The mere fact that the damage was caused by the impact of a vessel engaged in a warlike operation did not make the damage to be caused by a warlike operation.

Mr. Langton, for the shipowners, submitted that the Warilda case (supra) relied on by the Crown was distinguishable because one of the vessels in that case was negligent. The closest authority for the present case was the Ard Coasters case (supra). If two vessels were in collision, one of them on a warlike operation and neither of them negligent, the damage to either ship must, on the authorities, be the result of a warlike operation. The Clan Matheson was carrying 1,200 tons of war material to a war base. If the proportion of war material on board was to decide whether a ship was on a warlike operation or not, at what proportion must the line be drawn?

Mr. Justice Wright delivered the following considered judgment:—This is a claim by the Clan Line Steamers, Limited (herein referred to as the shipowners), against the Board of Trade (herein referred to as the Government) for the sum of £265,000 as the value of the steamship Clan Matheson, of which they were owners, on the ground that the Clan Matheson was lost as a consequence of warlike operations within the meaning of the pro forma charterparty under the terms of which she had been requisitioned by the Government in September, 1917. The Clan Matheson sank after collision with an American steamship, the Western Front, on May 23, 1918, while under the requisition. The pro forma charterparty contained an arbitration clause, under which the question was submitted to the arbitrator, Mr. H. Claughton Scott, K.C., who has made his award in the form of a special case for the opinion of the Court, which now comes before me.

The clauses of T.99 which are material for this case are clauses 18 and 19, which are in the following terms. Clause 18: "The Admiralty shall not be held liable if the steamer shall be lost, wrecked . . . . by or in consequence of dangers of the sea or tempest, collision . . . . or any other cause arising as a sea risk." Clause 19: "The risks of war which are taken by the Admiralty are those risks which would be excluded from an ordinary English policy of marine insurance by the following but not more extensive clause:—Warranted free of capture, seizure or detention and the consequences thereof, or of any attempt thereat, piracy excepted, and also from all consequences of hostilities or warlike operations, whether before or after the declaration of war. Such risks are taken by the Admiralty on the ascertained value of the steamer, if she be totally lost, at the time of such loss." These clauses must obviously be construed in accordance with the principles of marine insurance. The arbitrator has found that the loss of the Clan Matheson was a consequence of warlike operations within these clauses, but subject to the opinion of the Court on the question whether in law on the facts the loss was so caused and did not arise as a sea risk.

At the time of the casualty the Clan Matheson was sailing in convoy; the convoy consisted of 35 to 40 vessels in columns; the Clan Matheson was the third ship from the front in the second column from the port side; the Western Front was in the corresponding position on the port column, the regulation distance between them being 800 yards; the convoy was under the escort of cruisers, and each ship was required to keep in line and maintain her proper distance. The Clan Matheson was carrying a cargo of about 7,500 tons, including 363 tons of steel for shells, and about 919 tons of oats intended for the military authorities; the rest of her cargo was intended for the civil commissariat—that is, about 84 per cent. by weight of the cargo was for the civil commissariat and about 16 per cent. for the military authorities: she was bound for Nantes, which was admitted by the pleadings to be a war base, but was also, as the arbitrator finds, an ordinary commercial port. The arbitrator finds that the Clan Matheson was not at any material time engaged upon or carrying out a warlike operation within clause 19 of the charterparty. Mr. Langton has asked me to say that this finding is wrong in law. I have considered the relevant authorities, in particular the case of the Geelong, Commonwealth Shipping Representative v. Peninsular and Oriental Branch Service (39 The Times L.R., 133; [1923] A.C., 191), but I can see no ground to justify me in holding that on the facts stated the arbitrator is wrong in law in so finding. The cargo destined for the military authorities was a comparatively small portion of the whole and was of a character not directly referable to use or immediate use in war; the steel would need to go to a munition factory to be made into shells, and the oats intended for the military authorities might be used for feeding horses or mules far from the lines; the term "warlike operations" is not capable of precise definition, and "does not include all operations in war or even all operations for the purpose of war" (per Lord Cave, Lord Chancellor, in the case cited, at page 198). In any case the character of the cargo and the port of destination were predominantly civil. Questions such as this must mainly be questions of fact and degree. I accept the arbitrator's finding on this point (if indeed it is left to me on the case), and I proceed on his finding that the Clan Matheson was not engaged on a warlike operation.

On the other hand, it is both admitted in the pleadings and found that the Western Front was engaged upon and carrying out a warlike operation within clause 19 at all material times. No question arises on the point.

On the night of the collision the convoy was proceeding at about 9 to 9½ knots ; the wind was about force 5 ; the sea was rough with a considerable swell ; the convoy was sailing without lights, but it was a moonlight night, visibility was good, and other vessels in the convoy could easily have been seen. About 1 a.m. the Clan Matheson was found to be sheering to port, and, though the wheel was put hard-a-port, the sheer continued. Every effort was made on the Clan Matheson in the brief moments available to correct her course, but she swung seven points off her course, across the bows of the Western Front, by which she was struck about amidships approximately at right angles ; she sank in about two hours and became a total loss. It seems clear that some defect had developed in the patent hydraulic steering telemotor gear with which she was fitted ; the steering gear was of a well-known and widely used make, and it does not appear that there was any reason to suspect any defect in it. The arbitrator finds that there was no breach of any warranty of seaworthiness on the part of the shipowners in respect of the Clan Matheson, and no negligence on their part or on the part of those in charge of her. He does not find whether there was any negligence on the part of those in charge of the Western Front in not avoiding the collision when the Clan Matheson swung across her bows. I should have sent the case back to the arbitrator for a finding on this point, but both counsel said that negligence on the part of the Western Front had not been and was not suggested ; that is to say, the Western Front could not avoid striking the Clan Matheson as she did when the Clan Matheson swung out of her course and across the bows of the Western Front.

At first sight there could not well appear to be a clearer case of damage by a collision arising simply as a sea risk, and as such recoverable under an ordinary marine policy. Sailing in convoy is not in itself a warlike operation quoad the convoyed steamers such as the two in question, the Matiana case, Green and Others v. British India Steam Navigation Company, Limited (36 The Times L.R., 791 ; [1921] 1 A.C., 99), where Lord Sumner thus summed up the decision of the House of Lords at page 129 : "In brief, sailing with convoy is only sailing in company and is no more a warlike operation than sailing alone." Sailing without lights in war time is not in itself a warlike operation, the Petersham case, Britain Steamship Company, Limited v. The King (36 The Times L.R., 791 ; [1921] 1 A.C., 99), but, even if it had been, the fact would have been irrelevant because the steamers were in easy sight of each other. The weather was not bad, the speed was moderate, there was abundant sea room ; the casualty simply occurred because the Clan Matheson instead of keeping line and position suddenly swung out across the bows of the Western Front, thus rendering collision inevitable by reason of the sudden developing of a latent defect in her steering gear. The shipowners' case, however, is that the collision was caused in consequence of warlike operations because one of the colliding steamers, the Western Front, was admitted and held to be engaged on a warlike operation in the somewhat artificial sense that she was carrying for the United States Government under charter to that Government a full cargo of war supplies to St. Nazaire, then being used by that Government as a war base. The Western Front was accordingly, for the purposes of this case, engaged upon a warlike operation ; the question remains whether the loss of the Clan Matheson was caused by that warlike operation, in the sense appropriate in marine insurance law. Overwhelming by the sea is prima facie a sea loss, recoverable as a loss by perils of the sea under an ordinary marine policy. Where, however, there is an excluding clause such as is set out in Clause 19 of T.99—which is usually known as the f. c. and s. clause—questions may arise whether a loss prima facie within the policy is not taken out of it by the f. c. and s. clause ; the onus of establishing that it is thus taken out is on those who so allege ; for this purpose it is necessary to look beyond the cause immediate to the loss in time. In such a case as the present this cause immediate in time is the fortuitous incursion of sea water into the ship, causing her to sink, and it is necessary then to ascertain how the misfortune occurred that was the cause of it. As Lord Dunedin said in Leyland Shipping Company, Limited v. Norwich Union Fire Insurance Society, Limited (34 The Times L.R., 221 ; [1918] A.C., 350, at p. 363), "This class of competition between causes can only truly arise when you have to deal with an exception." Lord Shaw in the same case (at page 368) said : "But the idea of the cause of an occurence or the production of an event or the bringing about of a result is an idea perfectly familiar to the mind and to the law, and it is in connexion with that that the notion of proxima causa is introduced. . . . What was it which brought about the loss, the event, the calamity, the accident ? And this not in an artificial sense, but in that real sense which parties to a contract must have had in their minds when they spoke of cause at all. To treat proxima causa as the cause which is nearest in time is out of the question." Indeed it is clear that where there is a competition of causes, which involves a choice between them in order to determine whether the loss falls within the general body of the policy or within the f. c. and s. clause, the difficulty can only be solved by deciding which is the dominant cause, according to what "the common sense of mankind would assert in such a case," to use Lord Haldane's words in the same case at page 361. To the same effect, Lord Sumner in Becker, Gray and Co. v. London Assurance Corporation (34 The Times L.R., 36 ; [1918] A.C., 101, at p. 112), speaking of the rule of proximate cause as truly applied in marine insurance cases, says : "Cause and effect are the same for underwriters as for other people. Proximate cause is not a device to avoid the trouble of discovering the real cause or the 'common sense cause.'" If then it is necessary, as it must be in the present case, to go behind the bare fact of the Clan Matheson being sunk by the inrush of water through a casualty and to consider the whole event and the totality of circumstances under which the accident occurred, the dominant fact is, in my judgment, that the Western Front came into contact with the Clan Matheson only because of the sudden departure of the Clan Matheson from her proper line and position, and because by an extraordinary and unanticipated motion the Clan Matheson put herself directly in the way of the Western Front. Collision was thereby inevitable. If ships can be personified, as in language they always tend to be, the collision was in no sense the voluntary act of the Western Front, but was simply and solely the act of the Clan Matheson, and her loss was "due to her own fault," to use the expression of Lord Sumner in the Warilda case, Attorney-General v. Adelaide Steamship Company, Limited (39 The Times L.R., 333; [1923] A.C., 292, at p. 304), in a passage to which I shall refer more fully later. On the facts of the case the collision followed directly and by necessary sequence because of the sheer taken by the Clan Matheson, and that event was in my judgment, in marine insurance law and according to the true construction of clauses 18 and 19 of T.99, the cause of the loss of the Clan Matheson. But that cause was in no sense connected with warlike operations. No doubt the Western Front was engaged in a warlike operation, and, if her stem had not run into the Clan Matheson, the Clan Matheson would not have sunk, but that was, to use a convenient if inelegant expression, the causa sine qua non, the necessary condition of the loss occurring, not the real or dominant or efficient cause. In my judgment the loss was accordingly not due to the warlike operation of the Western Front, namely, in proceeding on her voyage which was the warlike operation, but to the fortuitous motion of the Clan Matheson, which was in no sense a warlike operation. The Western Front in my judgment was the instrument but not the cause of the loss.

This conclusion does not depend on whether there was (or there was not) any negligence on the side of the Clan Matheson, either in fitting her out or in navigating her. The question is simply what courses, as a matter of fact, did the vessels take? The extraordinary manœuvre of the Clan Matheson in throwing herself across the bows of the Western Front might be due, for instance, to carelessness of the helmsman, but equally to a sudden physical seizure, disabling him and putting the vessel off her course before help could come; it might be due to a mechanical defect due to bad design or workmanship, or a mechanical defect purely latent. In any such case, for the purposes of this question, the result would be the same, the objective motions of the ship being the only relevant consideration; these constitute the event on which the shipowners' rights depend. Negligence and kindred questions are in this and similar cases of marine insurance only material as explaining how the eccentric departure from the ship's proper course occurred. In certain cases so far decided, where collisions have occurred between merchant vessels and vessels engaged on a warlike operation, the question of a collision caused by negligent navigation of the merchant vessel has been discussed by way of observation, the real object of the discussion being to determine whether the loss was due to the act of the merchant vessel. I rely on these observations as supporting my conclusion in this case. The whole matter is fully discussed by Lord Sumner in the case of the Warilda, Attorney-General v. Adelaide Steamship Co., Limited (supra, at pp. 304 and 305). He quotes Mr. Justice Bailhache as saying in the Ardgantock case, Ard Coasters, Limited v. The King (35 The Times L.R., 604, at p. 605), that "if negligence on the part of the Ardgantock [the merchant vessel] was the effective cause of the loss, the case would be one of loss by marine risk." Lord Sumner adds: "Literally this was right, though it is not easy to see what is meant by negligence, as such, being the cause; but no doubt what was meant was that if the loss of the Ardgantock was proved affirmatively to be due to her own fault, it would not be caused by the warship and its warlike operations." He further quotes, and, as I read it, with approval, the view of Mr. Justice Roche in Charente Steamship Company, Limited v. Director of Transports (38 The Times L.R., 148), that in a collision between a merchantman and a ship engaged in warlike operations, during the war, but showing no lights, if the merchantman was solely to blame the collision would not be the result of the other ship's warlike operation. Lord Sumner thus sums up the matter: "When damage is done by two ships coming into collision, one being engaged in a warlike operation and the other on an ordinary commercial voyage, the collision is a risk falling on the marine policy, unless it is taken out of it by being proved to be caused by warlike operations, and this proof fails when it is shown to be caused by the action of the officer in charge of the commercial operation, all the more so if his action is negligent and blameworthy; but I think the result would be the same if his action was only an error of judgment or wrong but excusable in what is called the agony of the moment, so long as it is his action that causes the collision effectively and proximately, for the ship engaged in the warlike operation may play a minor part, since it takes two to make a collision." I think these observations in effect cover the case, when it is borne in mind that the action of the ship's officer is only natural when the question arises in connexion with some movement in so far as it changes the course of the ship, a change which may be equally caused with the same fatal result by a mechanical breakdown of the ship's steering gear.

The essential conclusions of the learned arbitrator, for whose opinion I have the greatest respect, though in this case it differs from my own, are embodied in paragraph 16 (iv., v., and vi.) of his award, of which (v.) is the most vital and is in these terms:—

"16 (v.). That the sinking of the Clan Matheson was proximately caused by the impact of the Western Front moving in the course of a warlike operation which she was then carrying out." The language appears to be almost literally repeated from a passage in the judgment of Lord Justice Atkin in Ard Coasters, Limited v. The King (36 The Times L.R., 555) quoted by Lord Finlay from the Appendix in that case in the House of Lords, Attorney-General v. Ard Coasters, Limited (37 The Times L.R., 692; [1921] 2 A.C., 141, at p. 148). The language was aptly used in reference to the facts of that case, where a destroyer on patrol duty swung at full speed in the dark in the course of its duty and ran into the merchant vessel, which was, without negligence on her part, navigating without lights in such a fashion that the destroyer executing her warlike operation without negligence must run into her. For the reasons which I have given, I do not think the language can be correctly applied to the facts of the present case. Indeed, in all these cases up to the present, there has been no ground for ascribing the loss to the act of the merchant vessel rather than to the vessel engaged on warlike operations. In the Warilda case, Attorney-General v. Adelaide Steamship Co., Limited (supra), where the vessel engaged in warlike operations had caused the collision by her faulty navigation, it was held that a warlike operation was still a warlike operation if negligently conducted; in the other cases, while no blame attached to either vessel, the vessel engaged in the warlike operation ran into the merchant vessel because the warlike operation compelled her to proceed at speed in the dark without lights, and the merchant vessel was similarly unlighted. In none of these cases could it be said with truth, as it can in my judgment be said here, that, to use Lord Sumner's phrase, the vessel engaged in warlike operation "played a minor part" or, to put it differently, was an instrument and not a cause. This can be said, I think truly, in this case, because it was the merchant vessel which acted individually outside the course of correct navigation so as to render the collision unavoidable: whether that action was due to negligent navigation or mechanical breakdown appears to me to be irrelevant; it is the actual behaviour of the vessels which is to decide the issue.

The present case, coming for decision so many years after the war, though no doubt the delay can be well explained, is the first in which the question to be determined has been directly raised for decision. For the reasons given I hold that the arbitrator's award is not right, but should take effect in the alternative form of clause 18 of the award.

WAY v. BISHOP.*

Solicitors—Partnership—Covenant not to practise within defined area after termination—Acting as solicitor's managing clerk—Whether breach of covenant.

The Court held that a solicitor who had covenanted, upon termination of a partnership, not to practise within a certain borough for 10 years, did not commit a breach of the covenant by acting as managing clerk to another solicitor within the prohibited area.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Clauson.

The plaintiff and defendant had practised as solicitors at Portsmouth, and the plaintiff, who had admitted the defendant to partnership after a long term of service as an employee, gave notice to determine the partnership on December 31, 1927. The defendant then entered the service of Mr. Wadeson, a solicitor practising at Portsmouth and Gloucester, as managing clerk, and the plaintiff brought this action to restrain him from doing so, under a covenant in the deed of partnership by which the defendant covenanted "not to practise in the Borough of Portsmouth or within five miles thereof for a period of ten years from the date of the termination of the partnership." The defendant contended that acting as managing clerk to another solicitor was not "practising" within the purview of the covenant.

Mr. Justice Clauson decided in favour of the plaintiff and granted an injunction to restrain the defendant from acting for Mr. Wadeson. The defendant appealed.

The Court of Appeal decided, as a preliminary point, that the partnership had been determined upon reasonable grounds, and then dealt with the main issue.

Mr. F. K. Archer, K.C., and Mr. Wynn Parry appeared for the appellant; Mr. Gavin Simonds, K.C., and Mr. van den Berg for the respondent.

* Reported by G. T. Whitfield-Hayes, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Archer contended that any covenant which might in any way prevent a man making his living ought to be construed strictly against the covenantee. In Palmer v. Mallet (3 The Times L.R., 760: 36 Ch.D., 411) a person in the position of the appellant had been restrained under a similar covenant from practising, but that was the case of a surgeon, and a surgeon or doctor could not practise in a subordinate capacity in the same way as an admitted solicitor employed by another solicitor as clerk. A solicitor's managing clerk would not come into contact with the clients in the same personal way. He was not "a solicitor . . . in the action or matter," Reg. v. Oxfordshire County Court Judge (10 The Times L.R., 547; [1894] 2 Q.B., 440).

Mr. van den Berg for the respondent relied upon Palmer v. Mallet (supra) and Robertson v. Willmott (25 The Times L.R., 681).

The Master of the Rolls said that in the partnership deed the appellant and respondent had agreed to carry on "the business of solicitors," and that if the partnership were determined the respondent would have the option of continuing "the business." The appellant, on the other hand, was not "to practise." Mr. van den Berg had contended that the word "practise," should be interpreted in a broad sense, in order to preserve the business into which the respondent had admitted the appellant, but the Court now could hardly go into the grounds which had induced the partnership, and must confine itself to the construction of the covenant. The words in the covenant were few, and there were no words such as "either directly or indirectly be engaged in the business of a solicitor or as a managing clerk," or other words not uncommon in partnership agreements of the sort. The only words here were that the appellant was not "to practise." It was, however, worthy of note that the parties had used a word significant in the solicitor's profession, for in the Stamp Act, 1891, section 43, there were penalties imposed upon a person who "directly or indirectly acts or practises as a solicitor," and, further, the right to practise was limited to those who had taken out a practising certificate. It seemed to him (the Master of the Rolls) that if Mr. Way, the respondent, had wished to safeguard himself in the manner asserted by Mr. van den Berg, he ought to have done so in plain terms. Mr. van den Berg's contention really amounted to this, that the Court ought to re-write the agreement between the parties, and embrace within the single word "practise" a number of operations which were not necessarily included within it. Palmer v. Mallet (3 The Times L.R., 760; 36 Ch.D., 411) did not really seem germane to the present case, for there were words there which did not appear in the present covenant. If it were really necessary for the appellant to resign his position, on account of the covenant, then it would mean that every managing clerk to a solicitor ought to be qualified, and ought to take out a certificate, because he would be "practising" as a solicitor.

He (Lord Hanworth) thought that there was a substantial difference between practising as a solicitor and acting as a clerk to a solicitor. The covenant did not justify the restriction sought to be placed upon the appellant, Mr. Bishop, and the appeal must be allowed, with costs.

Lord Justice Lawrence, in agreeing, said that the profession of a solicitor differed from all other professions in this: that a practising solicitor had to take out an annual certificate; and so the term "practise as a solicitor" had acquired a well-known, but somewhat technical and limited meaning, and it seemed to him (the Lord Justice) that the parties, in framing their agreement, must have had that meaning in mind. It was not for the Court to extend their language, or to seek to enlarge the expressions used. It might be quite true that the appellant's action would injure the respondent's business, but that had nothing to do with the Court, whose only duty was to construe the covenant as the parties themselves had framed it. In his (Lord Justice Lawrence's) opinion, the mere employment of a managing clerk, although he might be a solicitor and in a position to practise as a solicitor, did not constitute the clerk himself "practising as a solicitor." If he held a certificate which entitled him to practise, it might be difficult to say in certain cases whether he was himself practising as a solicitor, but probably the test there would be whether the relationship of solicitor and client was constituted between him and the person for whom he was acting. Counsel for the respondent had relied upon two cases. In Mallet's case (3 The Times L.R., 760; 36 Ch.D., 411), however, the words used were wider than in the present case, and in Robertson v. Willmott (25 The Times L.R., 681), the case of an architect, the terms of the agreement were held to be similar to those in Mallet's case (supra). Whether those decisions were right or wrong, he (Lord Justice Lawrence) thought that the word "practise" had a narrow effect or meaning in the present case, because of the peculiar position of the profession of a solicitor.

Lord Justice Russell said that the covenant being prima facie in restraint of trade, ought not to be unduly stretched in favour of the covenantee. In his view, "practising as a solicitor" meant that the appellant would not act as a solicitor in such circumstances that the relationship of solicitor and client would arise as between himself and the persons whose affairs he was transacting. "Practising as a solicitor" connoted a person who was a principal, who had clients, who had a practice. The words were not applicable to describe the position of a person who was acting as the servant of another. He (Lord Justice Russell) thought that the decision in Robertson v. Willmott (25 The Times L.R., 681) could be distinguished from the present case, and he agreed that the appeal should be allowed.

BARTRAM v. BROWN AND OTHERS.*

Landlord and Tenant—Restrictions—Decontrol—Grant of lease to the tenant—Meaning of "the tenant"—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923 (13 and 14 Geo. V., c. 32), s. 2 (2).

The words "the tenant" in s. 2 (2) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, refer to the particular person who is the tenant at the time when the lease referred to in the subsection is granted and to no other person.

This was an appeal by the defendants from a decision of his Honour Judge Bairstow, sitting at the Clerkenwell County Court, in favour of the plaintiff. The case involved the interpretation of section 2 (2) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, which provides:—

"Where, at any time after the passing of this Act, the landlord of a dwelling-house to which the principal Act applies grants to the tenant a valid lease of the dwelling-house for a term ending at some date after the 24th day of June, 1926, being a term of not less than two years, or enters into a valid agreement with the tenant for a tenancy for such a term, the principal Act shall, as from the commencement of the term, cease to apply to the dwelling-house. . . ." This Act was passed on July 31, 1923.

In March, 1922, the defendant, Mr. Cecil Brown (now deceased), and his wife took over the residue of a long lease of premises known as 32, Stroud Green-road, Finsbury Park, N. In May, 1923, the Browns sublet the whole premises to a Mr. Griss for a period of 22 years from March 25, 1923, on terms by which Mr. Griss was prohibited from subletting without his lessor's consent. Without obtaining that consent, Mr. Griss, in May, 1923, sublet two rooms on the top floor to a Mrs. Simpson. Mr. Griss never paid any rent, and, shortly after subletting, disappeared from the premises, Mrs. Simpson remaining in possession of her two rooms.

In September, 1923, the Browns sublet the whole of the premises to a Mr. Redman for a period of 21¼ years at a rent rising from £150 to £160 per annum. Mr. Redman took over Mrs. Simpson as his sub-tenant.

Early in 1926, Mr. Redman vacated possession, and on June 14, 1926, the Browns sublet the whole premises to the plaintiff, Mr. Frank Bartram, on a yearly tenancy at a rent of £160 a year. Mr. Bartram subsequently got into arrear with his rent, and on August 16, 1927, Mr. Brown caused a distress to be levied on the premises. Mr. Bartram entered into an agreement with the sheriff's officers, who withdrew, but he was unable to abide by the terms of that agreement, and the distress was renewed on September 7. No leave had been obtained from the Court for the levying of that distress, and Mr. Bartram subsequently brought an action against Mr. Brown and Messrs. Odell, Hibbard, and Co. (the sheriff's officers) for damages for illegal distress.

In the County Court the plaintiff contended that the distress was illegal in that the premises were protected by the Rent Restriction Acts, and that no leave for the levying had been obtained from the Court, as required by section 6 of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920.

The defendants contended, inter alia, that the premises had been decontrolled under section 2 (2) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, by virtue of the long lease granted by Mr. Brown to Mr. Redman in September, 1923.

The County Court Judge held that the words "grants to the tenant a valid lease" in section 2 (2) must be construed as "grants to the sitting tenant a valid lease," that a lease to a person who was not already tenant of the premises could not effect decontrol, and that therefore the premises continued to be protected under the Acts. He gave judgment for the plaintiff for £35, the agreed amount of the damages.

The defendants appealed.

Mr. J. H. Critchley appeared for the appellants; Mr. Phineas Quass for the respondent.

Mr. Critchley submitted that the defendant, Mr. Brown, had come into "actual possession" of the premises within the meaning of section 2 (1) and (3) of the Act of 1923, despite the fact that he had not turned Mrs. Simpson out of the rooms which she occupied, as he might have done. Secondly, decontrol of the premises had been effected by section 2 (2) of the Act. Any lease beyond the period prescribed by that section was sufficient to cause decontrol, and the words "the tenant" in that section meant "any tenant," and were not to be construed as referring only to "the sitting tenant."

* Reported by T. R. F. Butler, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Quass was not called upon to argue.

MR. JUSTICE ACTON.—This is an appeal from a decision of his Honour Judge Bairstow, by which he gave judgment for the plaintiff for an agreed sum of £35 damages and costs in an action brought to recover damages for what was alleged to have been an illegal distress. The ground on which it was contended for the plaintiff and on which it was ultimately decided by the Judge that distress had been illegally levied was that the premises in question were premises to which the Rent Restriction Acts applied and, that being so, the necessary leave had not been obtained for the distress.

The facts are not in dispute, and were stated by Mr. Critchley in his very clear and careful opening. On June 16, 1921, a lease of the premises in question had been granted by a Mr. Pitts to a Mr. Hunter for a term of 24 years commencing from December 25, 1920, at a rent commencing at £70 and rising to £80 per annum. On July 18, 1921, Mr. Hunter assigned the remainder of the term to Messrs. Robinson and Fox. On January 23, 1922, Messrs. Robinson and Fox, in their turn, assigned to a Mr. Goring. On March 6, 1922, Mr. Goring assigned to Mr. and Mrs. Brown, who paid £800 for the remainder of the term. The premises were then vacant, and Mr. and Mrs. Brown went into occupation in March, 1922. They used the premises for a butcher's business till March 24, 1923, and no one but the manager of the shop lived and slept there. On May 25, 1923, they sublet the whole premises to a Mr. Griss for a term of 22 years from March 25, 1923, on the condition that he was to be prohibited from subletting without their consent. He occupied the premises both as business premises and as a dwelling-house. A short time afterwards Mr. Griss, without asking for or obtaining the consent of his lessors, sublet two rooms on the top floor to a Mrs. Simpson. Mr. Griss paid no rent at all; he occupied the premises for about three months, and then abandoned possession, so that he thenceforth disappears from this case, but left Mrs. Simpson in occupation of the two rooms on the top floor. Mr. and Mrs. Brown, as the lessors of Mr. Griss, found the two rooms on the top floor in the occupation and possession of Mrs. Simpson, and there seems to have been an interview terminating in nothing definite, though apparently a statement was made by Mr. Brown to Mrs. Simpson to the effect that Mrs. Simpson had no right to be there. No definite steps were, however, taken to remove her. In September, 1923, Mr. and Mrs. Brown sublet the whole premises to Mr. Redman, who took over Mrs. Simpson as his sub-tenant and recognized her as such. Rent had been accepted by the Browns from Mrs. Simpson. The lease to Mr. Redman was for 21¼ years from September, 1923. Mr. Redman remained until early in 1926, when he too abandoned the premises, and on June 14, 1926, Mr. and Mrs. Brown sublet the whole premises, including the two rooms on the top floor, which were still in the occupation and possession of Mrs. Simpson, to the plaintiff Mr. Bartram on a yearly tenancy at a rent of £160 per annum. Mr. Bartram used the premises both for the purposes of his business and as a dwelling-house, and it is a fact, though no importance seems to attach to it, that Mr. Bartram took in other sub-tenants in addition to Mrs. Simpson. He got into arrears with his rent, and on August 16, 1927, a distress was put in by Mr. Brown, which the plaintiff contrived to get rid of by entering into an agreement with the sheriff's officers, but he was unable to perform the terms of that agreement, with the result that the sheriff's officers again came into the premises on September 7. Thereupon this action was launched by the plaintiff for damages for illegal distress, and the distress was alleged to be illegal on the ground that it had been levied without the leave of the Court, which was necessary if these were premises to which the Rent Restriction Acts applied.

The question before the County Court Judge was whether such leave was necessary, and behind that lay the fundamental question whether these were premises to which the Rent Restriction Acts applied. The Judge decided that they were, and that the leave of the Court was necessary for the distress, and that therefore the plaintiff was entitled to succeed. This appeal raises two points. The first point, taken on behalf of the appellant, was that in September, 1923, when Mr. Griss had left, Mr. Brown had come into possession of the premises, and that the fact of his not turning out Mrs. Simpson did not prevent him from having come into possession of the whole premises within section 2 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923. The second point taken was that, by virtue of the grant of a lease of the whole premises to Mr. Redman for a period beyond the period of expiry required by the Act—namely, June 24, 1926—the principal Act had ceased to apply to the whole premises. Although Mr. Critchley formulated his points in that order, the point which he argued and relied on with the greatest insistence and confidence was the second one. It involves a very simple question. [His Lordship read section 2 (2) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, and continued]: According to the judgment of the County Court Judge and the argument addressed to this Court, there is no question that these premises are premises to which the principal Act did originally apply, and the real question now raised is whether the words "grants to the tenant a valid lease," &c., mean "grants to the person who is then the tenant, and that particular person only," or whether they may be construed sufficiently widely to relate to "a tenant" or "any tenant to whom such a letting may be made," quite apart from the question whether such person is the sitting tenant.

If the meaning contended for by Mr. Critchley be the true meaning, it is almost impossible to imagine more inapt words than the words used by the draftsman of this section, for, as Mr. Critchley says, the apt and appropriate words would be "grants to a tenant" or "to any tenant" or, indeed, the meaning might well be expressed by leaving out altogether the words "to the tenant" or "to a tenant" or "to any tenant," and allowing the sub-section to read "grants a valid lease of the dwelling-house," &c.

In my opinion, the use of the definite article "the" indicates, as clearly as anything under these Acts can be indicated, that the person intended by these words is the particular tenant who is the tenant of the landlord at the time when the lease therein mentioned is granted to him, and no other person whatsoever. I cannot conceive that any other meaning can be attributed to the use of the definite article "the" as opposed to the indefinite article "an" or the indefinite adjective "any" or the entire omission of the word "tenant." On that point I think the County Court Judge came to a correct conclusion, and one with which it is impossible for us to interfere.

The other point, which was argued less confidently, seems to me to have no substance in it. The County Court Judge in his judgment said: "I cannot find that at any time after the letting to Griss, which was prior to the passing of the 1923 Act, the landlord was in actual possession of any part of these premises. As to the whole it is clear beyond question that Mrs. Simpson went into possession of the two rooms referred to in May, 1923, and continued in possession thereof until some time after this distress was levied. Her possession was at no time the possession of the Browns. It is contended that Mrs. Simpson was originally a person to whom the premises were not lawfully sublet, but it is clear that each of the lessees of the house in turn regarded her as a person lawfully there and received rent from her, and before the lease to the present plaintiff the Browns themselves had received rent from her. But the question as to the nature of her possession does not seem to me to be material. She was in fact in possession and such possession makes it impossible that the landlord, as landlord, could be in actual possession of that part of the premises, and he clearly, therefore, could not be in possession of the whole of the premises in question." I apprehend that the question is primarily one of fact, subject to the Judge not misdirecting himself on any point of law applicable to it. However the matter may be regarded, I think that the conclusion at which the Judge arrived was perfectly correct, and that there is no reason for interfering with it.

For these reasons I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed.

MR. JUSTICE FINLAY.—I agree, and have nothing to add.

Court of Appeal. (Scrutton, Lawrence, and Greer, L.JJ.) 1928. May 15.

SINANIDE v. LA MAISON COSMEO.*

Copyright — Original literary work—Phrase in advertisement—Beauty "a social necessity" —Copyright Act 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V., c. 46), s. 1.

The plaintiff, an electro-therapist, used in his advertisements of face treatment a phrase which he claimed to have invented—namely, that beauty was "a social necessity, not a luxury." The defendant, who carried on the business of a beauty specialist and was in the habit of advertising his beauty treatment, then began to use in his advertisements the words, "A youthful appearance is a social necessity." In an action for breach of copyright,

Held, that the plaintiff's phrase was not an "original literary work" within s. 1 of the Copyright Act, 1911, and the action failed.

Decision of Humphreys, J. (44 The Times L.R., 371), reversed.

This was an appeal by the defendant from the decision of Mr. Justice Humphreys (44 The Times L.R., 371) in an action tried by him without a jury, which raised the question of an alleged infringement of copyright.

The plaintiff, Dr. Oreste Sinanide, of 53, Sloane-street, an electro-therapist, contended that the defendant, Mr. Charles Francis Medlicott Abbott Brown, trading as La Maison Cosmeo, of 49, South Molton-street, W., who carried on the business of a plastic and cosmetic surgeon, had adopted in his advertisements a phrase which he (the plaintiff) had invented as a slogan for various advertisements connected with his work.

Since 1925 the plaintiff, who had obtained diplomas in medicine and higher clinical training in the Universities of Athens and Paris, had dealt mainly with the treatment of the human face, and it had been necessary for him to advertise to a considerable extent in connexion with that treatment. He claimed to have invented a slogan in regard to those advertisements. The phrase was: "Beauty is a social necessity, not a luxury," and it was in respect of the words "a social necessity, not a luxury" that copyright was claimed.

The defendant had also been advertising his beauty treatment for some time, but had not adopted a phrase similar to that used by the plaintiff before May 29, 1926, when he inserted in the Illustrated Sporting and Dramatic News an advertisement in these words: "A youthful appearance is a social necessity." Before that date his usual slogan had been "Beauty is the best letter of introduction." The plaintiff's contention was that the defendant's phrase was taken from that adopted by the plaintiff, and therefore constituted a breach of copyright.

Mr. Justice Humphreys held that the plaintiff's phrase was an "original literary work" within section 1 of the Copyright Act, 1911, and was a good subject of copyright, and that, as the defendant had unconsciously taken the phrase from some advertisement of the plaintiff, the latter was entitled to an injunction and nominal damages.

The defendant appealed.

Mr. Cartwright Sharp appeared for the appellant; Mr. H. St. John Field for the respondent.

MR. CARTWRIGHT SHARP, in opening the appeal, said that both the plaintiff and the defendant were engaged in the practice of improving the human face, and were sometimes styled "beauty doctors." Their methods, however, were quite distinct. While the plaintiff carried out his improvements by ointments, lotions, &c., the defendant was more concerned in removing ugliness in features, and he relied on delicate surgical operations. The defendant had been in business since 1905, and he adopted various advertisements. His method was not to repeat the advertisements each week but to have a series of advertisements. On May 29, 1926, he added to his series the following advertisement, which appeared in the Illustrated Sporting and Dramatic News: "A youthful appearance is a social necessity." That advertisement was repeated in August, 1926, and it was that repetition which first attracted the attention of the plaintiff.

MR. SHARP asked leave to call fresh evidence, which was not available at the trial, of advertisements by another advertiser in the Tatler and other journals from 1917 to 1921, which contained words similar to those in question in this case.

Mr. FIELD contended that the evidence was not admissible. The different phrase used in the earlier advertisements did not assist the Court in the present case. Moreover, it would be wrong to admit that evidence because the defendant, by the simplest inquiry, could have discovered the facts before the trial. He referred to Brown v. Dean ([1910] A.C., 373); Hip Foong Hong v. Neotia and Co. ([1918] A.C., 888); Shedden v. Patrick (L.R., 1 H.L.Sc., 470).

The COURT admitted the new evidence.

Mr. SHARP referred to Dicks v. Yates (18 Ch. D., 76) and said that, the new evidence having been admitted, the case was conclusive against the plaintiff. Even apart from that evidence there could be no copyright in one single sentence. The language of the Copyright Act, 1911, was plain. The true test of infringement was that there must be a substantial part of the literary work reproduced; that is, substantial not as meaning merely "quantity" but as meaning something "distinctive"—some distinctive feature.

Mr. FIELD contended that there was copyright in the phrase in question and that it was not lost merely because someone else had already used a somewhat similar phrase. The defendant had taken a substantial part and the really distinctive feature of the plaintiff's advertisement. He referred to Maple and Co. v. Junior Army and Navy Stores (21 Ch. D., 369); Lamb v. Evans ([1892] 3 Ch., 462; 9 The Times L.R., 87; [1893] 1 Ch., 218); and Harold Drabble, Limited, and Another v. Hycolite Manufacturing Company and Others (44 The Times L.R., 264).

LORD JUSTICE SCRUTTON, in giving judgment, said that the dispute was one between two beauty specialists whom he did not propose to advertise by mentioning their names, and who traded upon the knowledge that there were people who had plenty of money and no brains who were prepared to spend that money in improving the faces that Providence had given them.

The plaintiff claimed to have the sole right to use the phrase "Beauty is a social necessity, not a luxury," or anything substantially like it. There might be certain ways in which a plaintiff might succeed in preventing other people from using what counsel called "his slogan" or some catchphrase used in connexion with his goods. He might bring a passing-off action. It was admitted that there was no possibility of succeeding in a passing-off action in this case. Another way in which a catchphrase might conceivably be protected was by a trade mark action, but that, again, was hopeless in the present case. The plaintiff was, therefore, driven to say that the defendant's advertisement was an infringement of his copyright.

The additional evidence which had been admitted on the appeal had rendered it perfectly hopeless to contend that there was an original literary work in the words used by the plaintiff, because it appeared from that evidence that another man had previously said that "a youthful appearance was a modern necessity." Consequently, the only originality, if any, in the plaintiff's phrase was the substitution of the word "social" for the word "modern." The plaintiff's phrase, therefore, was not an original composition and no injunction should have been granted in respect of it.

Even if the new evidence had not been admitted it would have been impossible to support the judgment appealed from. There might be a copyright in an advertisement. Maple's case (21 Ch.D., 369) had shown that. But to quote a bit of a sentence from a literary work was too small a matter to afford ground for an action for infringement of copyright. This case was similar to Dicks v. Yates (18 Ch. D., 76). Therefore, on two grounds, (1) that on the new evidence it was perfectly hopeless to say that the plaintiff had any copyright, and (2) that apart from the new evidence the matter in which the copyright was claimed was too small for the Court to attach any value to it, the appeal must be allowed and judgment entered for the defendant, with costs.

LORD JUSTICE LAWRENCE and LORD JUSTICE GREER concurred.

SKIDMORE v. BULLOCK, LADE, AND CO., LIMITED.*

Master and Servant—Compensation for injury by accident—"Workman"—Exception—Employment in non-manual labour—Remuneration exceeding £350 a year—Part of salary agreed to be for expenses—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 84), ss. 3 (2), 10 (iv.).

The appellant, a traveller employed by the respondents, who were distillers, had been engaged at a salary of £450 a year, but subsequently the respondents by a letter agreed at his request to show his remuneration as being £150 salary and £300 for expenses. The appellant met with an accident and applied for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925. The County Court Judge found that the agreement in the letter was a thing done for income-tax purposes and that the appellant's earnings must be treated as £450 a year, and that therefore he was not a workman within the meaning of the Act.

Held, that as there was no evidence as to what the appellant's expenses in fact were, the County Court Judge's decision was right.

This was an appeal by the applicant from a decision of the City of London Court, and it raised the question whether the applicant, who was employed by the respondents as a commercial traveller, was a workman within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925.

The respondents were distillers, and in December, 1925, they employed the applicant as a traveller. By the terms of the letter of December 7 engaging him, he was employed at a salary of £450 a year, and the employers agreed to provide him with a small two-seater motor-car, the applicant to be responsible for its upkeep.

Subsequently the employers wrote a letter, dated April 28, 1926, saying that they agreed to show his remuneration as £150 salary and £300 for expenses.

* Reported by H. C. GARSIA, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

That was done at the request of the applicant, and, as the County Court Judge found, for income-tax purposes.

The applicant met with an accident in getting out of his car and broke his leg. He applied for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925. Section 3 (2) of that Act excepts from the definition of a workman "any person employed otherwise than by way of manual labour whose remuneration exceeds £350 a year"; and section 10 provides that:—

"For the purposes of the provisions of this Act relating to 'earnings' . . . the following rules shall be observed:—

"(iv.) Where the employer has been accustomed to pay to the workman a sum to cover any special expenses entailed on him by the nature of his employment, the sum so paid shall not be reckoned as part of the earnings. . . ."

The County Court Judge held that the applicant's earnings must be treated as £450, and that he was not, therefore, a workman within the meaning of the Act.

The applicant appealed.

Mr. C. T. Williams and Mr. I. F. Reuben appeared for the appellant; and Mr. Eastham, K.C., and Mr. Geoffrey C. Hutchinson for the respondents.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS (Lord Hanworth), in giving judgment, said that the appeal must be dismissed. The question had been raised whether section 10 (iv.) applied in determining the "remuneration" for the purpose of section 3 (2). It appeared to him that the provision in section 10 (iv.) rightly found its way into rules for determining the earnings of a workman for the purpose of assessing compensation. But it was another matter to say that the same principle applied when considering the remuneration under section 3 (2). There was no provision splitting up remuneration in section 3 (2) corresponding to that relating to earnings in section 10 (iv.).

He did not, however, think that it was necessary to determine what was or was not remuneration for the purpose of section 3 (2). The evidence before the County Court Judge was that the applicant's remuneration was £450 a year, as shown by the letter of December 7, 1925, setting out the terms of his remuneration.

There were items which might be taken as deductions from that sum, such as hotel expenses while the applicant was travelling round his area. But the applicant had given no evidence of the expenses that he actually incurred. Instead of giving that evidence he relied on a document dated April 28, 1926, in which the employers agreed to show his remuneration in their books at £150 a year and £300 as being paid for expenses. The County Court Judge said of that document, and no doubt quite rightly, that it was prepared at the request of the applicant and at a time of year when it would be useful to the applicant for revenue purposes. In it it was not intended to express the actual relation between employer and employed nor to give the true measure of expenses. What the employers did was to agree to return those figures in that way to give the applicant material to put before the income-tax authorities. If the result had been that the employers had been held liable under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, they would have only had themselves to thank for it.

He (his Lordship) desired to call the attention of the revenue authorities to that letter of the employers. He hoped that in future some means would be found to defeat such modes of reducing the apparent earnings for income-tax purposes. For the purpose of the case it was necessary to deal with the true facts, and not those speciously put forward. There being no evidence of what the expenses in fact were, the County Court Judge was right in holding that the applicant was not a workman within the meaning of the Act. The appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

LORD JUSTICE SANKEY and LORD JUSTICE RUSSELL gave judgment to the same effect.

WATSON v. BIRMINGHAM GOVERNMENT INSTRUCTIONAL CENTRE.*

Master and Servant—Compensation for injury by accident — "Trainee" at instructional centre—Whether a "workman."

The Court held that a "trainee" at a Government Instructional Centre was not a workman within the Workmen's Compensation Acts.

This was an appeal by the Government Instructional Centre, Birmingham, from the Birmingham County Court, and it raised an interesting question whether an unemployed person receiving instruction at a Government training centre could claim to be a "workman" so as to be entitled to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Acts.

In April, 1927, Wilfred Watson, a miner, 19 years old, was unemployed and was receiving unemployment benefit at 18s. a week. He applied for training at the Government Instructional Centre, Birmingham, and, after filling up and signing two forms, was accepted and put to do metal work of various kinds. He performed the work to the satisfaction of the instructors who were put over him. He and others who were training were called "trainees." They were "clocked in" in the morning, but they could give up their training at any time they chose and the instructional authorities could dismiss them at any time without giving a reason. Some of the articles made by the trainees during their training were sold by the centre.

During his training Watson was paid 18s., his unemployment benefit, plus a personal allowance of 2s. 6d. a week, and a travelling allowance of 3s. a week. He was also given a midday dinner.

On August 19, 1927, his hand was caught in an emery grinding machine and the top of his left thumb was torn off. He afterwards obtained work at £2 15s. per week, but he brought arbitration proceedings, claiming that as a partially incapacitated man he was entitled to a declaration of liability. The Instructional Centre accepted liability (if any) on behalf of the Minister of Labour, but contended that the applicant was not a "workman" under the Workmen's Compensation Act at all and not entitled to make any claim.

The County Court Judge stated in his judgment: "The inference which I draw, and the fact which I find, is that, notwithstanding that the dominant idea or aim of those relations was that the applicant should be instructed and trained as an industrial worker, the relations between the applicant and the respondents were those of workman and employers, and that there was here a contract of service." He therefore made the declaration of liability.

The Instructional Centre appealed.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL (Sir Boyd Merriman, K.C.) and Mr. T. S. SANDERSON, for the appellants, contended that the relations between the parties were not consistent with those of employer and workman. They referred to Broome v. Minister of Labour (43 The Times L.R., 133); Gilroy v. Mackie and Others (2 B.W.C.C., 269); and Porton v. Central (Unemployed) Body for London (25 The Times L.R., 102; [1909] 1 K.B., 173.

Mr. D. L. FINNEMORE, for the respondent, contended that the respondent was a trainee and a workman at the same time. The two important factors here were—first, that the respondent was remunerated; secondly, that there was a sale of, or a right to sell, the articles he had made.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS (Lord Hanworth), in giving judgment, said that it was impossible to give a general precise definition of "workman" or "service," but it was not impossible to come to a conclusion as to a particular case. In the present case it was true that the man was employed on work which had some economic value, and that he sometimes made things which could be sold, and it was said that as the fruits of his labour had an economic value he was in employment. Reference, too, was made to the regular habits enforced and to the discipline. But those facts might equally apply to educational establishments, where control and discipline were equally enforced.

A test which was useful, if not exhaustive, was that which he had himself suggested in Broome v. Minister of Labour (43 The Times L.R., 133)—namely, was there, or was there not, a contract of service? In applying that test, he looked at the conditions in regard to the present appeal. On the very face of the forms which the respondent had signed there were statements inconsistent with a contract of service. That the man was available for employment elsewhere whenever he could obtain it, and that he was still receiving his unemployment benefit of 18s. a week, were conditions which seemed to negative the contention that he was a "workman" employed by the appellants. The appeal must be allowed with costs.

LORD JUSTICE SANKEY said that the learned County Court Judge had been influenced in his decision by certain cases, Gilroy v. Mackie and Others (2 B.W.C.C., 269) and Porton v. Central (Unemployed) Body for London (25 The Times L.R., 102; [1909] 1 K.B., 173) which really did not apply. To him (Lord Justice Sankey) it seemed that the object of the appellants was not to provide work, but to equip for work; not to employ men, but to render them fit for employment.

It was a significant fact that the respondent here was still receiving his unemployment benefit, and, as regards the personal allowance, that did not seem to have much to do with the contract of service. Perhaps it was an inducement to young men to take up the course. The appeal must be allowed.

LORD JUSTICE RUSSELL said that, in his opinion, the relationship was not that of employer and workman, but rather that of teacher and pupil.

IN RE WILTS AND SOMERSET FARMERS, LIMITED.*

Industrial Society — Rules — Amendment — Validity.

A rule of a society registered under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893, originally provided: "Individual members shall hold at least one share for every 20 acres or fraction of 20 acres farmed by them up to 500 acres, and at least one share for every 40 acres or fraction of 40 acres above 500. . . ."

By successive amendments the words "one share" were altered to "shares of the nominal value of £5." The respondents had become members of the society before the date of the last amendment, and they took no steps for the purpose of dissenting from it. On the society going into liquidation a summons was taken out by the liquidator for the determination of the question whether, in settling the list of contributories, the amended rule was to be taken as binding on the respondents.

Held, applying Biddulph and District Agricultural Society, Limited v. Agricultural Wholesale Society, Limited (42 The Times L.R., 761; [1927] A.C., 76), that the rule as amended was binding on the respondents.

His LORDSHIP delivered a considered judgment in this summons, which was taken out by the liquidator of the Wilts and Somerset Farmers, Limited (a society registered on March 23, 1910, under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893), for the determination by the Court of certain questions which had arisen on the settling of the list of contrubutories of the society.

The substantial question was whether certain changes in the rules of the society by which existing members came under a liability to acquire further shares were binding on members who did nothing after the alterations, and whose assent, it was alleged, could be inferred.

Rule 12 of the society provided as follows:—

"Shares to be held by members.—Individual members shall hold at least one share for every 20 acres or fraction of 20 acres farmed by them up to 500 acres, and at least one share for every 40 acres or fraction of 40 acres above 500. . . . Milk retailers shall hold at least six shares for every churn of 17 gallons retailed daily by them."

Rule 12, as amended on November 14, 1921, stated:—

"Rule 12.—Rescind the whole rule and substitute therefor:—Individual members shall hold at least five shares for every 20 acres or fraction of 20 acres farmed by them up to 500 acres, and at least three shares for every 40 acres or fraction of 40 acres above 500. . . . Milk producers shall hold shares on the above acreage basis, or shall hold at least five shares for every dairy cow owned by them, whichever shall be the greater number of shares."

* Reported by J. L. DENISON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Rule 12, further amended on March 25, 1922, stated :—

"Strike out the words 'five shares' in the two places in which they occur and substitute therefor:—'Shares of the nominal value of £5.'"

Rule 23 provided :—

"Repayment on cessation of membership.—If by transfer or otherwise, the number of shares held by a member becomes less than the number required by Rule 12 to be held by him, the amount paid up on the shares shall be repaid and the shares cancelled, and the member shall cease to be a member."

Rule 23, as amended on November 14, 1921, provided :—

"Rule 23, line 4.—Strike out the word 'shall' and substitute 'may at the discretion of the Committee.'"

Mr. Wilfrid Greene, K.C., Mr. Rowland Thomas, and Mr. Renfield appeared for the liquidator ; Mr. Gavin Simonds, K.C., and Mr. A. Andrewes-Uthwatt, Mr. Vaisey, K.C., and Mr. H. S. G. Buckmaster, and Mr. Alan Ellis, for the various respondents.

Mr. Justice Romer, in the course of his judgment, said that the answer to be given to the main question depended on the validity of Rule 12 and certain amendments to that rule which had been made from time to time. In Dibble v. Wilts and Somerset Farmers, Limited (39 The Times L.R., 174 ; [1923] 1 Ch., 342)—an action in which the plaintiff was a member of the society—Mr. Justice P. O. Lawrence (as he then was) held that both the original Rule 12 and the amended Rule 12 were invalid. Having regard, however, to the fact that that decision had been, in terms, overruled by the Court of Appeal in Agricultural Wholesale Society, Limited v. Biddulph and District Agricultural Society, Limited (41 The Times L.R., 470 ; [1925] Ch., 769), though the matter was res judicata between Mr. Dibble and the society, the liquidator was advised that it was his duty, so far as regarded other members of the society, to treat them as bound by the amended rules. Hence the present summons, to which five contributories had been made respondents, all of whom joined the society before the amendment to Rule 12 was made in March, 1922.

The question was whether that amendment was binding on them. It was not contended, and, after the decision in Biddulph and District Agricultural Society, Limited v. Agricultural Wholesale Society, Limited (42 The Times L.R., 761 ; [1927] A.C., 76), it could not be contended that Rule 12 in its original form was invalid. He was of opinion that he was bound to hold that the alterations made to Rule 12 in the present case were binding on the respondents.

It only remained to deal with two comparatively minor points taken by the respondents. It was said that the liability to acquire further shares was incapable of enforcement, inasmuch as by Rule 23, as amended, they ceased to be members when they failed to acquire such shares within a reasonable time after the liability arose. He could not assent to the contention that a member to whom the rule applied ceased to be a member whether the committee did or did not repay the amount paid up on his shares and cancel them. If the committee decided that they should not be cancelled it could not have been intended that the member should nevertheless cease to be a member. It seemed to him to be the more natural construction of the rule to treat the words at the end of it as meaning "and shall in that case cease to be a member."

The respondents, finally, contended that Rule 12 and its amendments were void for uncertainty, but he could not accept that view.

In the circumstances he must hold that the respondents should be placed on the list of contributories in respect of the number of shares shown opposite their respective names in the schedule to the summons.

NEAL v. GUY.*

Hackney Carriages—Omnibus—Number of passengers — By-law — Whether applicable to motor-omnibuses.

This was a case stated by Durham justices. The respondent, Mr. Albert William Guy, was charged before a Court of summary jurisdiction at Bishop Auckland, at the instance of the appellant, Mr. Frederick Neal, a hackney-carriage inspector, with carrying 55 persons on an omnibus licensed to carry 39, contrary to by-law No. 14 of the by-laws of the Urban District Council of Bishop Auckland.

The by-laws in question were made in 1901, and were duly approved by the Local Government Board.

By-law 14 was as follows :—

"Every proprietor, driver, or conductor of an omnibus shall comply with the following provisions for regulating the number of persons to be carried by omnibuses. No greater number of persons shall be conveyed in any omnibus than will admit of the provision of adequate seating accommodation [of specified width and depth for each person].

The remaining paragraphs specified the number of persons who might be carried in an omnibus drawn by one, two, or three horses respectively.

The appellant contended that by-law No. 14 regulated in general the number of persons to be carried by omnibuses plying for hire in the area ; that the first paragraph applied to motor-omnibuses ; and that the fact that the subsequent paragraphs contained references to horses was immaterial. The respondent contended that the by-laws were obsolete, as they were obviously intended to apply only to horse-drawn vehicles and not to mechanically propelled vehicles.

The justices held that the by-laws were obsolete and did not apply to motor-omnibuses, and they dismissed the information.

Mr. Davenport appeared for the appellant ; the respondent was not represented.

The Lord Chief Justice (Lord Hewart), in giving judgment, said that it was a very clear case. The question was whether the justices were right in law in holding that the particular by-law was meant to apply to horse-drawn vehicles only and did not apply to motor-omnibuses. The case found as a fact that this omnibus was licensed to carry 39, and in fact carried 55. There was no reason at all for thinking that the first part of the by-law referred only to horse-drawn vehicles.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

MR. JUSTICE AVORY agreed. The fact that some of the by-laws were not applicable to motor-vehicles was no reason for thinking that this one was not.

MR. JUSTICE SHEARMAN agreed.

IRONMONGER AND CO. v. DYNE.*

Execution — Evidence — Bankers' books — Account of person other than the debtor— Bankers' Books Evidence Act, 1879 (42 Vict., c. 11), s. 7.

Where, under s. 7 of the Bankers' Books Evidence Act, 1879, an order is made for the inspection of a judgment debtor's account with a banker, the Court has power to make the order extend to the banking account of a person other than the debtor if the account of that other person was controlled by the debtor and was used by the debtor for his or her own purposes.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs, Messrs. Ironmonger and Co., from a decision of Mr. Justice Wright affirming the order of the Master giving them access to and inspection of the accounts from 1920 of Messrs. Coutts and Co. with Mrs. Bradley Dyne only. Messrs. Ironmonger and Co. claimed an order under the Bankers' Books Evidence Act, 1879, for inspection of the accounts of Messrs. Coutts and Co. with both Mr. and Mrs. Bradley Dyne as from 1909, the year they were married.

Mr. Clayton, K.C., and Mr. St. John Field appeared for the appellants; Mr. Blanco White for Mr. and Mrs. Bradley Dyne; and Mr. Monckton for Messrs. Coutts and Co.

MR. CLAYTON said that a judgment (affirmed by the Court of Appeal, 44 The Times L.R., 497) had been obtained against Mrs. Bradley Dyne for £38,938 in respect of dealings in foreign currency, and for costs, which were taxed at £1,503. No part of those amounts had been paid. On February 26, 1928, an order had been made for the examination of Mrs. Bradley Dyne as to means. A summons was then taken out by the plaintiffs for liberty to inspect the accounts of Messrs. Coutts and Co. with both Mr. and Mrs. Bradley Dyne from 1909. It was that order which the plaintiffs now sought to obtain on this appeal.

There was clearly jurisdiction to make the order asked for against a person not a party to the action in which the judgment had been obtained: Howard v. Beall (23 Q.B.D., 1) and South Staffordshire Tramways Company v. Ebbsmith (12 The Times L.R., 32; [1895] 2 Q.B., 669). But it was laid down that that jurisdiction should be exercised with great caution, and that a prima facie case of a mixture of the two accounts must be made out.

Mrs. Bradley Dyne had speculated with Messrs. Ironmonger and Co. for many years, and had during one year made as much as £40,558. Having thereafter lost £38,938 to them, she failed to pay. There was grave suspicion that that £40,558 had passed into her husband's account. The affidavits showed grounds for grave suspicion that she had transferred to him £35,704 in cash, and securities to the value of £25,154, making an aggregate of £60,858. At the trial of the action the defendant had herself admitted that she had paid sums of money and transferred securities to her husband, but she said that that was done in payment of debts owing to him.

The reason why an order against Mr. Bradley Dyne had been refused was because it was thought that Hood Barrs v. Heriot ([1896] 2 Q.B., 338) was directly in point. But that was a case dealing with an application under Order XLII., Rule 32, and related to an application for examination as to means. The plaintiffs were not seeking to examine Mr. Bradley Dyne as to means, but only to obtain inspection of his banking account.

Counsel suggested that the sums transferred to Mr. Bradley Dyne by his wife were really held on trust for her. The special facts of each case had to be considered. Here the evidence showed that securities to the value of over £20,000 were transferred to her husband just before she was becoming liable to the plaintiffs for large losses.

Counsel was stopped.

Mr. BLANCO WHITE contended that the application, so far as it related to Mr. Bradley Dyne's accounts, was properly not granted, because the inspection of the books was asked for with regard to an examination of Mrs. Bradley Dyne (the debtor) before the Master as to means, and before the Master the only admissible evidence was that of the debtor. Section 7 of the Bankers' Books Evidence Act, 1879, was passed in substitution for the old procedure of subpœna duces tecum, and it followed that an order could be made under section 7 only in a case where the subpœna duces tecum would have been issued (In re Marshfield, 32 Ch.D., 499). A subpœna duces tecum could not be issued for the purpose of an inquiry as to means before the Master: Hood Barrs v. Heriot (supra).

But whatever the legal position was, an order ought not to be made on the facts of the present case. It was true that over one period Mrs. Bradley Dyne had made about £40,000, but before that she had lost £35,000, which her husband had paid, and in making a transfer to him she was repaying him. Further, securities belonging to her husband had got into her name, as she was the business person and he was an artist. After matters had been nearly squared up he forbade her speculating further, and when she disobeyed and he returned to this country he required her to transfer those securities into his name.

An order under the Bankers' Books Evidence Act, 1879, could be made against a third party only when the third party's account was really that of the litigant: Pollock v. Garle (14 The Times L.R., 16; [1898] 1 Ch., 1). Here nothing of the kind had been shown. Further, the plaintiffs could ascertain from the husband's account no relevant fact that they had not already ascertained from the wife's account.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS (Lord Hanworth), in giving judgment, said that the appeal must be allowed. While it was determined in Howard v. Beall (23 Q.B.D., 1) that there was power to order inspection of the account of a third party, yet it was said in South Staffordshire Tramways Company v. Ebbsmith (12 The Times L.R., 32; [1895] 2 Q.B., 669) that it was of great importance that the power should be exercised with great caution lest it might be a cause of great hardship. It was then pointed out by Lord Esher that :—

"If the Court were satisfied that in truth the account which purported to be that of a third person was the account of the party to the action against whom the order was applied for, or that, though not his account, it was one with which he was so much concerned that items in it would be evidence against him at the trial . . . then they might order the inspection."

The only point which they had to decide was whether there was evidence which ought to make the Court exercise its power. In his judgment there was. They had been told that before her marriage Mrs. Bradley Dyne was a woman of little or no means, and there was evidence that Mr. Bradley Dyne was a man of only moderate means. What had to be considered was whether the husband's account which the plaintiffs desired to inspect was one over which Mrs. Bradley Dyne had control and which she used for her own purposes.

The facts established that in the account of Mrs. Bradley Dyne with the plaintiffs for the year 1926 the first debit item against her for £3,530 13s. occurred on December 16, 1926. On December 9 Mrs. Bradley Dyne transferred to her husband's account £3,586 13s. 1d. It also appeared that on December 15 she transferred to her husband's credit a number of securities, some of which were bearer securities. Then on January 21, 1927, there appeared an entry against her with Messrs. Coutts : "Fee for valuation of securities account herself and Mr. B. Dyne" ; and finality was reached on April 4, 1927, when she transferred £2,215 14s. 9d. to her husband's account and closed her own account.

Thereafter Mrs. Bradley Dyne, who was described as the "man of business" rather than her husband, had no further banking account. It appeared to him (his Lordship) that this was a case exactly falling within the test laid down by Lord Esher. It followed that the appeal must be allowed and an order made varying the Master's order by including in the order the account of Mr. Bradley Dyne. But inspection against that account as against Mrs. Bradley Dyne would be limited to the period specified by the Master—namely, 1920 and onwards.

LORD JUSTICE SANKEY gave judgment to the same effect, and LORD JUSTICE RUSSELL concurred.

FRENKEL v. MAC ANDREWS AND CO., LIMITED.*

Ship—Bill of lading—Deviation clause—Loss by perils of the sea—Exceptions clause—Loss on usual route—Shipowners protected.

The plaintiff at Malaga shipped, on a steamer of the defendants, goods to be carried from Malaga to Liverpool. The bill of lading contained clauses excepting the shipowners from responsibility for (inter alia) loss, damage, or injury by perils and risks of seas or for any risk which might be an insurable one. It also contained a deviation clause : "with liberty to touch at any ports whatsoever although they may be outside the route without it being considered a deviation." For some years the defendants had been taking, from Malaga to Liverpool or other ports of this country, two distinct routes for the vessels of their line, one "via Levante," which meant going north-east up the coast of Spain with calls at various ports, and then coming back from the farthermost port down the Mediterranean and through the Straits to this country, and the other, "Directo," coming directly from Malaga to ports of this country. The plaintiff knew, when he delivered to the ship the goods to be carried under the bill of lading in this case, that the route for that particular ship would be "via Levante." In this case the ship on leaving Malaga went north-eastward with the intention of picking up cargo at Cartagena before going to Liverpool. Between Malaga and Cartagena the ship met with bad weather, and some of the plaintiff's goods were lost. The plaintiff claimed damages, but the defendants relied on the exceptions clauses in the bill of lading. The plaintiff answered that the steamer had deviated from the contract voyage and that therefore the exceptions clauses did not apply.

Held, that no question of deviation arose, because at the time of the loss the ship was on one of the known and usual routes, and therefore on an agreed route, towards Liverpool. Accordingly, the defendants were protected by the exceptions clauses in the bill of lading.

Decision of Rowlatt, J. (44 The Times L.R., 329), reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Rowlatt (44 The Times L.R., 329).

The plaintiff claimed a sum of £2,293 in respect of the loss of olive oil sent from Malaga to Liverpool on a steamship, the Cervantes, belonging to the defendants.

The plaintiff was the owner of 134 barrels of olive oil shipped on the defendants' ship Cervantes at Malaga under two bills of lading dated April 11, 1927, one for 110 barrels for delivery via Liverpool to Bradford and the other for 24 barrels for delivery at Liverpool.

The defendants' ship Cervantes, after sailing from Malaga on April 11, 1927, with the barrels of oil on board, met a gale on April 12 and owing to the violent motion of the vessel the barrels broke loose and could not be secured and some of the oil was lost, and the defendants pleaded inter alia that the damage, if any, which was not admitted, was caused by perils of the sea and that they were protected by the exceptions clause in the bills of lading. The plaintiff, however, pleaded that after loading the plaintiff's cargo the Cervantes, without justification, deviated from the contract voyage and the perils of the sea were met with after the unauthorized deviation, and therefore the defendants could not rely on the provisions of the bills of lading.

The facts are fully stated in the judgments.

* Reported by T. W. MORGAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt held, following a decision of Mr. Justice Hill in T. M. Duché and Sons v. Owners of Steamship Maria (3 Ll.L., 184), that the loss occurred after an unauthorized deviation on the part of the defendants' ship and that therefore the defendants were not protected. He accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendants appealed.

Mr. G. P. Langton, K.C., and Mr. Cyril Miller appeared for the appellants; and Mr. Dunlop, K.C., Mr. Harold Stranger, and Mr. Geoffrey Hutchinson for the respondent.
